Preceding an absence of two weeks during which time the Boston Symphony orchestra will perform in 11 cities of the South and West, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program of exceptional interest for the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first number he will revive Chausson's Symphony, which has tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident when even greater things were expected of him. A new work, which will have its first performance, is "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a setting of Coleridge's poem by Charles P. Griffes. The rather important piano obbligato to the piece will be played by Alfred De Voto. Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number. As the soloist for this pair of concerts, Mme. Louise Homer will sing "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's Aria from the opera "Xerxes," from which the popular "Largo" was derived; Bach's Aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos."

Traveler

NOVEMBER 22, 1919—

LOUISE HOMER WITH SYMPHONY

Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, is to be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week. She will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from "Xerxes" (the so-called "Largo"), Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos." The symphony will be Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat. The program will also include the first hearing at these concerts of Charles T. Griffes's musical setting of Coleridge's "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Mme Homer Coming

Louise Homer, contralto, will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concert. She will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," the aria "Ombra mai fu," popularized as "Handel's Largo"; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Verdi's "O don Fatale." The orchestra will play Chausson's eloquent Symphony in B flat, favorably remembered from several performances in recent years. The other numbers will be an interesting novelty, a tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," and a revival, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Several works by Mr Griffes are being performed by the various orchestras in this country during the current season. This tone poem, after Coleridge's familiar poem, will be the first of his works to be performed at Boston Symphony concerts.

American Nov 22

LOUISE HOMER SOLOIST

For the regular Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday (to be followed by a two-weeks' absence during which the orchestra will tour a number of cities in the South and West, Pierre Monteaux has arranged the following interesting program: Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music; Charles F. Griffes' musical setting of Coleridge's poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (the first performance of this work by the talented and much-talked-of young composer); finally, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." Madame Louise, the perennial favorite among contraltos, will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from "Xerxes" (the so-called "Largo"), and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Verdi's "Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos" should disclose the diva's more intensely dramatic powers.

m N. Y. COMMERCIAL dress: New York
NOV 22 1919 58
te

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat. For the matinee Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer Albeniz.

m EVENING MAIL
dress: New York City
NOV 22
te

The farewell concert to America of the Vatican Choirs under the personal direction of Maestro Raffaele Casimiri will be given Tuesday evening December 2d, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 4th, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Noble symphony in B flat major.

ESTABLISHED 1851
NOV 23 1919
From Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony's next New York concert, on Dec. 4, will present Chausson's symphony in B flat and Charles Griffes's setting of Coleridge's

"Kubla Khan," together with Balakireff's "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree."

m EVENING GLOBE
dress: New York City
NOV 20 19

'CATALONIA' TO BE PLAYED

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town it will introduce to New York an orchestral work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, hitherto known here by his piano pieces. It is a symphonic poem entitled "Catalonia," and unless meantime Mr. Damrosch gives a hearing to "La procesion del Rocio" by Turina, it will seemingly be the first orchestral work by a Spaniard to be performed in New York.

It will be played at the Saturday afternoon concert on Dec. 6, completing a programme that will begin with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony and include also Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome."

The programme announced for the Thursday evening concert, Dec. 4, comprises Chausson's symphony in B flat major, a new work by Charles T. Griffes suggested by Coleridge's poem "Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree fantasque."

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

'CATALONIA' TO BE PLAYED

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town it will introduce to New York an orchestral work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, hitherto known here by his piano pieces. It is a symphonic poem entitled "Catalonia," and unless meantime Mr. Damrosch gives a hearing to "La procesion del Rocio" by Turina, it will seemingly be the first orchestral work by a Spaniard to be performed in New York.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City
Date

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, December 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's Symphonic Poem "Tharmar" and Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

COMMEMORATION BRINGS ALSO INNOVATION

Closed Doors Upon a Symphony as Possible Precedent for the Future—Music of Schubert in a Beauty and Passion Worthy of an Unusual Occasion—Vigorously Dramatized Beethoven—The Impossible Task of an Exacting and Hastily Prepared Concerto

SCHUBERT'S Unfinished Symphony began the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon as first item in a programme designed to honor the memory of the late Mr. Higginson as founder of the orchestra in 1881, as financial sustainer of it until it was reorganized in the autumn of 1918. Between the two movements—for the first time in the longest memory at Symphony Hall—the doors were not opened for the tardy, though they received a somewhat longer grace than usual in a late beginning. Thus, only a brief pause separated the two divisions of the fragment; the music flowed, as the composer designed it, in virtually continuous stream; neither players nor hearers were disturbed by late-comers trooping down the aisles to their seats, saluting acquaintances along the way and finally "settling themselves" for the afternoon. In fact, the whole audience, timely warned of this departure from routine on an unusual occasion, was in its place before Mr. Monteux lifted his stick for the first measure. Such uninterrupted performance clearly heightened for all concerned the pleasure of the music and the performance.

According to the management, the innovation was only an incident of the day; but if it is possible for the audience to assemble promptly on one occasion, why should it not do likewise on others, and why should not that management gently, yet persistently persuade it to such courtesy? It is Mr. Monteux's custom, as it was Dr. Muck's before him, to set the symphony of the afternoon at the beginning of the concert. After the first movement the tardy are wont to provide a noisy interlude sometimes three or four minutes long; after the succeeding movements these intermezzi gradually diminish until by the end of the whole symphony the whole audience is seated. Obviously these delays and intrusions hamper the continuity and illusion of music and performance, vex the conductor intent upon his task and sensitive withal, distract and irritate not a few eager and absorbed listeners.

Now, once upon a time, it was the custom to wear hats and bonnets at the Symphony Concerts. There were rumors that the management was about to insist upon the removal of coverings for the head. "How dare it?" was the retort of many august dames and damsels. It dared quietly, politely persisted, finally prevailed. Probably like good fortune would reward it did it insist upon unopened doors through the first number upon the programme, even though it were a symphony thirty or forty minutes long. Grumbling would die away into submission; submission would fructify into habitual promptness; and no superfluous interludes would disturb the progress of symphony or suite. To write these things, moreover, is not to forget the unforeseen and unescapable delays that may befall any of us, however foresighted and well-intentioned, on our way to Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday. They, however, like most incidents of living, are the luck of the day, to be taken casually, amusedly.

Another departure from routine begun yesterday, likewise abates a long-standing and increasing irritation about which the management has recently received much complaint. It has been the custom of the tardy to beguile their waiting with lively, high-pitched, amusingly intimate conversation and seemingly to place themselves for that diversion as near as possible to the closed doors. In a single afternoon those sitting near them within the hall have readily learned that John's "flier" in the stock market was not too lucrative and that Jane's conduct toward eligible suitors leaves something to be desired. Moreover, when Josepha confides these mischances to Antoinette, "you dear old thing," her tones are often shrill and by no means keyed to the symphony by Schumann or d'Indy in progress on the other side of none too thick doors. So much has this annoyance increased of late on the fringes of the auditorium, so resentful has been complaint about it, that over every entrance now stands a sign: "Silence Requested." These signs are there to stay. For within the velvet glove of the management of the Symphony Concerts is the firm hand that seeks the ways of perfection. And little things do count in weekly pleasure to the audience, in weekly zest in conductor and orchestra.

Designed as has been said to honor the memory of Mr. Higginson, the concert of yesterday in itself was rather a rite of mourning and remembrance than a public performance of symphonic music in the usual sense of the words, in the ordinary course of the season. At the request of his family and his intimates the programme traversed two pieces which, as many frequenters of Symphony Hall knew, he heard with endless pleasure before he forsook the concerts—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Between them stood a third music to which, it seems, he listened almost as gladly—Brahms's concerto in B-flat for piano and orchestra. These numbers, of course, displaced the programme which Mr. Monteux had proposed and partially prepared the week, compelled him to revise materially the lists of pieces arranged for [illegible] concerts the orchestra is to undertake in other cities, and exacted strenuous rehearsal of the concerto and the two symphonies from conductor and players. Since the concert was a ceremony of mourning and since it was made ready under difficult circumstance, it were unbecoming to record and test it in the usual terms and processes of reviewing.

Yet it would be as unbecoming to leave unnoted the renewed, the enhancing beauty with which conductor and orchestra clothed Schubert's fragments. For the time they regained the golden tone, sensitive and supple, rich, euphonious and translucent, which of old was a chief glory of the band; while Mr. Monteux himself plied upon the music the divination which is the conductor's crown—enkindling force upon his men, transporting illusion upon his audience. At his hands, the music spoke with manifold and exalted voice—in serene and songful flow, in shadowed melancholy, in impatient and passionate intensity, in the warm glow, the penetrating strangeness of romantic vision. Nowhere has Schubert written more moody a music, nowhere a symphonic music of such sustained yet diverse emotion. From it springs the beauty of instrumental song that was the fountain of his youth. From it also rises the power and passion that, had death relented, might have poured through his maturity. In this music, which Mr. Higginson cherished above all other, in a performance worthy of the zenith of the orchestra, sounded his true funeral rite in the concert hall.

Again it were duty to orchestra, to conductor, to hearers and to that fetich which is called "the record" to note the vigor of progress, the incisiveness of rhythm and accent, the largeness of phrase, the high pitch of tonal emotion, the sustained dramatizing energy with which Mr. Monteux projected Beethoven's symphony upon his hearers. There have been performances in easy memory which achieved a deeper beauty, which more abounded in imaginative stroke and shading, which sought and maintained a loftier voice. These distinctions lie well within Mr. Monteux's abilities, as he had proved, half an hour before, upon Schubert's music. For Beethoven's he preferred another way—a way that cost the transition into the finale not a little of its throbbing mystery, that made the slow movement seem short-breathed and a little impatient, but a way also that wrought the first movement into a tumult of passionate outcry and bore the finale to surging climax. Beethoven of the theatre, if the hearer chose, but Beethoven also dramatizing and dramatized in tones.

Between the symphonies, Brahms's concerto—a wholly unreasonable, an almost impossible task for conductor, orchestra and pianist in two or three days of preparation—came lengthily and went dryly in as lucid and painstaking performance as such circumstance permitted. When pianist after pianist had declined the solo part or foregone it because of other engagements, Mr. Félix Fox undertook it. His willingness as well as his accomplishment praise him. Equally diligent but equally hard-pressed was Mr. Monteux. And in this baffling music "the readiness" is by no means "all." The munificence, the sense of obligation, the just ambition of Mr. Higginson indeed founded the orchestra and for thirty-odd years sustained it. Through all those years, his devotion to the highest standards of repertory and performance never flagged. When he laid down the orchestra it was at the zenith of a deserved and unsurpassed fame. For once a founder and sustainer, a succession of conductors, an orchestra variously renewed had held fast to a single ideal and in its sign conquered. To ask of leader, band and pianist the impossible feat of Brahms's concerto made ready in two or three rehearsals was neither to honor Mr. Higginson's memory nor to maintain his standards. The maintenance of these ideals in even artistic course best commemorates, best perpetuates him.

H. T. PARKER

MUSIC A TRIBUTE TO HIGGINSON

Symphony Program Made Up of Favorite Numbers of the Founder

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

Program.

Schubert. Unfinished Symphony.
Brahms. Second Piano Concerto. Soloist, Mr. Felix Fox.
Beethoven. Fifth Symphony.

The program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening was changed into a tribute to the memory of Major Higginson, for it was made up of three works which were his especial favorites. These works are not new to Boston and certainly require no analysis. It was a feast of classical music of the purest type.

The unfinished symphony was read with more of shading and finesse than romance. It probably contains the best melodies that were ever put into this form, for Schubert's symphonies were really songs in disguise and were never very powerful on the development side, although the andante contains some of the best figure treatment that Schubert ever achieved. Still, the melodies are the chief charm of both movements and the work can bear some degree of sentiment.

Beethoven's fifth symphony is also clear sailing, both for conductor and audience, and made up in its development what the Schubert work lacked.

MEASURING THE STANDARD.

The surprisingly effective performance of M. Rabaud with this orchestra was, however, not rivalled. Not that there are faults to find. M. Monteux is probably blameless in the matter. But there was a time when our orchestra was far ahead of every other organization of its kind, while now it is but one of a half a dozen good American orchestras. In such works as these two one can make comparisons with ease and surety, and measured by such a yard-stick, the superiority of our band is not as clearly evident as it used to be.

The chief figure of the first movement was sometimes ragged and the work was often boisterous. Even the strings did not shine in the andante, where there used to be a most perfect ensemble. It is possible that the sudden change of program caused a lack of rehearsals and that the men had not become used to the difference of reading from the former performances.

The Brahms concerto was far more complex than the symphonies before and after it. Yet the present writer recalls a remark of the late Professor Carl Baermann about this concerto: "When I first took it up I studied its difficult passages as a duty. But afterwards I began to see that each of these had a definite artistic purpose that could not have been expressed differently."

Mr. Felix Fox, our estimable resident pianist, was the soloist, and he conquered the difficulties which beset the thorny path with considerable success. It is a work which may have appealed to Major Higginson, who was a trained musician, but it certainly can never be an appeal to the general public; it was too abstruse for that.

FOX WAS THE FEATURE.

The pianist, too, can never shine here as in a Liszt or a Rachmaninoff concerto, for the soloist must frequently abnegate his prominence and must sink into the ensemble, as if he were but a single tone-color in a symphony. This Mr. Fox bravely did, and he deserves credit for his careful attention to the ensemble effects. He never attempted to make a solo out of this eminently orchestral work.

And the orchestra and M. Monteux seconded him well, so that, for the musician, this became the chief number of the concert. It was the most ambitious work that this pianist has ever done before a Boston public and we are glad to pronounce it successful.

The pianist did not play the work from memory, but had the music before him. This is unusual, but it is sensible, for it is certainly better that the music, rather than the performer, should be upon the rack. Mr. Fox was recalled with much enthusiasm at the completion of his task.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At next week's Symphony concerts Mr. Monteux will revive Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat. A new work which will have its first performance here is "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a musical setting of Coleridge's poem by Charles P. Griffes. The piano obligato will be played by Alfred de Voto. Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number.

Mme. Louise Homer, the contralto, will sing three songs.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Preceding an absence of two weeks, during which time the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform in 11 cities of the South and West, Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of exceptional interest for the regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first number he will revive Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The Symphony has its tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his musical career. Attention will doubtless be attracted by a new work which will have its first performance upon this programme. "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a musical setting of Coleridge's poem by the talented and highly praised young composer, Charles P. Griffes. The rather important piano obligato to the piece will be played by Mr. Alfred De Voto. Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number.

As the soloist for this pair of concerts, Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, will sing three perennially beautiful songs. "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's aria from the opera "Xerxes," from which the popular "Largo" was derived, and Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful."

CHILDREN'S CONCERT

Concerts

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Notably Interesting Programme for the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Heifetz Anew—Mr. Maier's Recital for Children—The Boston Quintet for Chamber-Pieces—Mrs. Littlefield in Songs—The First of the "Morning Musicales"—Other Entertainments

A NOTABLE new piece to be played for the first times anywhere, a long overlooked show-piece, and a piece from the "standard" repertory of the Symphony Concerts fill the orchestral part of Mr. Monteux's programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The new piece is a tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan," suggested by fragments of Coleridge's half-forgotten verse and written by Charles T. Griffes, one of the younger and more imaginative American composers. As yet he is known in concert-halls only by songs, piano-pieces and a "Poem" for flute and orchestra while for the theatre he has arranged sundry Japanese dances for Michio Itow. Through nearly all his music flows a fantastical, visionary, quasi-Oriental vein that should be quickened by Coleridge's dream-steeped poetry. The show-piece is Mottl's arrangement for orchestra of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a glorified and transmogrified dance originally written for the piano and comparable in rhythmic vivacity and blaze of color with the composer's familiar "Espana." Not for long has it been played at the Symphony Concerts. The "standard" piece is Chausson's symphony in B-flat, lofty of mood, grave of voice, austere yet penetrating, worthy to companion Franck's symphony or d'Indy's in modern French music. For interludes Mme. Homer, the familiar and applauded alto singer, will assist the orchestra. Her numbers, nearly all of which she has already sung here, are the air from one of Bach's cantatas, "My Heart Ever Faithful"; the air from Händel's opera, "Xerxes," best known in orchestral transcription as his Largo; Beethoven's swelling song, "Nature's Adoration," and an air, "O Don Fatale," from the sombre opera, "Don Carlos."

Mme Homer Coming

Louise Homer, contralto, will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concert. She will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," the aria "Ombra mai fu," popularized as "Handel's Largo"; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Verdi's "O don Fatale." The orchestra will play Chausson's eloquent Symphony in B flat, favorably remembered from several performances in recent years. The other numbers will be an interesting novelty, a tone poem by Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," and a revival, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Several works by Mr Griffes are being performed by the various orchestras in this country during the current season. This tone poem, after Coleridge's familiar poem, will be the first of his works to be performed at Boston Symphony concerts.

LOUISE HOMER SOLOIST

For the regular Boston Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday (to be followed by a two-weeks' absence during which the orchestra will tour a number of cities in the South and West, Pierre Monteaux has arranged the following interesting program: Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music; Charles F. Griffes' musical setting of Coleridge's poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (the first performance of this work by the talented and much-talked-of young composer); finally, Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." Madame Louise, the perennial favorite among contraltos, will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from "Xerxes" (the so-called "Largo"), and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Verdi's "Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos" should disclose the diva's more intensely dramatic powers.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Preceding an absence of two weeks during which time the Boston Symphony orchestra will perform in 11 cities of the South and West, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program of exceptional interest for the concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first number he will revive Chausson's Symphony, which has tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident when even greater things were expected of him. A new work, which will have its first performance, is "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a setting of Coleridge's poem by Charles P. Griffes. The rather important piano obbligato to the piece will be played by Alfred De Voto. Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" will be the closing number. As the soloist for this pair of concerts, Mme. Louise Homer will sing "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's Aria from the opera "Xerxes," from which the popular "Largo" was derived; Bach's Aria, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos."

NOVEMBER 22, 1919—

LOUISE HOMER WITH SYMPHONY

Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, is to be the soloist at the Symphony concerts next week. She will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from "Xerxes" (the so-called "Largo"), Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's "O Don Fatale" from "Don Carlos." The symphony will be Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat. The program will also include the first hearing at these concerts of Charles T. Griffes's musical setting of Coleridge's "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Kahn" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL
Address: New York
Date 1919 58

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat. For the matinee Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer Albeniz.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date

The farewell concert to America of the Vatican Choirs under the personal direction of Maestro Raffaele Casimiri will be given Tuesday evening December 2d, at the Metropolitan Opera House.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 4th, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Noble symphony in B flat major.

ESTABLISHED 1851 NOV 23 1919

From Times
New York City

The Boston Symphony's next New York concert, on Dec. 4, will present Chausson's symphony in B flat and Charles Griffes's setting of Coleridge's

From

"Kubla Khan," together with Balakireff's "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree."

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City

'CATALONIA' TO BE PLAYED

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town it will introduce to New York an orchestral work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, hitherto known here by his piano pieces. It is a symphonic poem entitled "Catalonia," and unless meantime Mr. Damrosch gives a hearing to "La procesion del Rocio" by Turina, it will seemingly be the first orchestral work by a Spaniard to be performed in New York.

It will be played at the Saturday afternoon concert on Dec. 6, completing a programme that will begin with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony and include also Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome."

The programme announced for the Thursday evening concert, Dec. 4, comprises Chausson's symphony in B flat major, a new work by Charles T. Griffes suggested by Coleridge's poem "Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree fantasque."

From EVENING GLOBE
Address: New York City

'CATALONIA' TO BE PLAYED

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town it will introduce to New York an orchestral work by the Spanish composer Albeniz, hitherto known here by his piano pieces. It is a symphonic poem entitled "Catalonia," and unless meantime Mr. Damrosch gives a hearing to "La procesion del Rocio" by Turina, it will seemingly be the first orchestral work by a Spaniard to be performed in New York.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City
Date

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, December 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's Symphonic Poem "Tharmar" and Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

Synod m[illegible]

Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 22 1919

To open the second Boston symphony concert of this season at the Academy on Monday evening, December 1, Conductor Monteux has chosen Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar." The closing number will be Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." Louise Homer will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular "Largo" was made; Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

Homer Boston Symphony Soloist

As soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, will sing the following perennially beautiful songs: Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's Aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was derived, and Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful;" also Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos." Pierre Monteux has chosen for the same concert Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his artistic career. For the rest, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," of ballet fame, and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

From
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 23

To open the second Boston Symphony concert of this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Pierre Monteux, the noted conductor, has chosen Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his artistic career. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's darkly and sensuously colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," which he also made famous in danced version when conducting the Russian ballet. The closing number will be Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, will sing the following perennially beautiful songs: Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was made, Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 22 1919

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy on Monday evening, December 1, will be Madame Louise Homer. The symphony will be Chausson's in B flat, and the other numbers Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 23 1919

—To open the second Boston Symphony Concert of this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Ernest Chausson's noble symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's darkly and sensuously colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," which he also made famous in dance version when conducting the Russian Ballet. The closing offering will be Chabrier's Bourree Fantastique. Louise Homer, contralto, will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera, "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was made; Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos."

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 22 1919

The second concert of the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will take place at the Lyric on the evening of December 3, when the assisting artist will be Louise Homer, the distinguished Metropolitan contralto. The orchestra will play the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" symphony and Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome" suite with its concealed chorus of female voices, and Mme. Homer will sing the "O Don Fatale" aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos;" "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera of "Xerxes."

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

To open the second Boston symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 3, Pierre Monteux has chosen Tschaikowsky's masterpiece the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Florent Schmitt's Suite from his Mimo-drama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto, will be the soloist of this concert.

STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, December 3d, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama, and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely-discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madam Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," the original form of the so-called "Largo."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 24 1919

Under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, and as then constituted, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its indicated policy were—in the true sense of the much-abused term—a "revelation," upon the recent opening concert of the orchestra's present Baltimore season, a revelation of high values.

Opportunity for duplication of this many-sided artistic success at its next Baltimore concert, on December 3, is indicated by the program announced.

This is to consist of Tschaikowsky's gripping "Pathetic" Symphony, a modern work—Florent Schmitt's suite, entitled "The Tragedy of Salome," and vocal pieces, with orchestra, by Mme. Louise Homer, contralto. Mme. Homer's numbers are to consist of the air, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's opera, "Don Carlos;"

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

Louise Homer With Boston Symphony.

Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. Rich, voluminous and organ-like her tones will be heard in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form. For the symphonic program Pierre Monteux will present Chausson's "Symphony in B flat," "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a new work by the American composer, Charles P. Griffes, and the symphonic poem, "The Pre-

Music

M. Monteux To Give New Work.

Pierre Monteux is making the presentation of important new modern works a notable feature of his first season as director of the Boston Symphony.

At the first of this organization's concerts here he gave us our introduction to Stravinsky in that marvelous "Oiseau de Feu" music, and at the second of the season's engagements he is going to present another striking new composition, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome."

This was written for a mimodrama or ballet (they used foolishly to call it "ocular opera" in the Pavlowa-Mordkin days), and it was performed in this form in Paris. The score contains episodes for a chorus of female voices off-stage. Query: Whence in the world are these choral females to be forthcoming for the Lyric concert.

Mme. Homer, the great American contralto of the Metropolitan Opera,

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, December 3d, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama, and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely-discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madam Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," the original form of the so-called "Largo."

From Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Boston Symphony With a New Conductor.

It is generally agreed that the war shaking-up of the honored Boston Symphony Orchestra did not redound to the good of this organization, however satisfying it may have been to the popular demands of the moment. On the whole, it was a saddening necessity from an artistic point of view However, the orchestra is getting on its feet again and at the initial concert of the season's series on the seventh of this month it gave an excellent account of itself. And Pierre Monteux showed himself an efficient conductor, as he had done previously in the same auditorium with both opera and the Ballet Russe. He was well received, although so far as applause is concerned the greater honors of the evening went to Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, whose number was the Liszt Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte and orchestra. His was, indeed, a superb performance The Schumann symphony in B flat major, the overture and adagio of the Beethoven ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and the Enesco suite No. 9 were the remaining numbers of a program which might have been varied more to advantage. Of the orchestral numbers, the ballet adagio was especially pleasing in that it offered a touch of lightness. The audience about filled the house, which is to the credit of Brooklyn.

From Brooklyn Life
New York City

Of Varied Interest.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

For the Second Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December fifth, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschoikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing Verdi's "O Don Fatale" from the Opera "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration" by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handels Opera "Xerxes"—the original form of the so-called "Largo."

TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
NOV

Concert Programs Of Week

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon.

She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert.

For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's impassioned and finely wrought symphony in B flat, ranked with Franck's Symphony as an ineffable expression of France's musical genius; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla

From
Call
NOV 2
New York City

Harold Bauer, the pianist, who plays the Beethoven E Flat Major Concerto with Arthur Bodanzky and the New Symphony Orchestra at the latter's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday evening, was the recipient of a signal honor this week.

He was invited to appear as soloist at the memorial concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston for the late Major Higginson. Much to Bauer's regret, he was forced to refuse because of conflicting engagements.

The New Symphony program for next week, besides the Beethoven Concerto, includes the Liszt "Orfeo," Symphonic Poem and the Schumann Symphony No. 3, in E Flat Major.

From

NOV 22 1919

Pierre Monteux reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened the series of five concerts Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, was all and more than had been expected of it by the music lovers of Providence who attended the concert.

Beethoven's Symphony in D-Major No. 2 was the principal number on the programme. Written when the composer was greatly depressed because of his growing deafness, it holds much of color which only an able conductor and capable, temperamental musicians could interpret in the way in which the Boston Symphony did in their initial concert. It was an effect of grandeur and stateliness which was produced and yet it was not too severe.

The "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fanne" by Debussy, something entirely different, one of the most beautiful works of the French school of modernists, gave the conductor an opportunity to display still further his versatility in producing the coloring necessary in this class of music. Lizst's "Les Preludes" was played with much effect.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is well known to Providence music lovers, sang in a voice which, if not quite resonant as a few years ago, was, nevertheless, effective and quite well worth hearing, especially since he possesses the dramatic ability to an unusual degree.

The programme follows:

Beethoven, Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Op. 36, adagio molto, allegro con brio, larghetto, scherzo, allegro molto; Massenet, recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le de Labore;" Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce;" Gluck, recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyale," from "Iphigenie en Aulide;" Lizst, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3.

TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date NOV 21 19

How long will the Boston Symphony Orchestra survive the death of Major Higginson? Its peculiar product cannot be marketed at a profit and rich eccentrics who are willing to pay for marketing it at a loss are rare.

The orchestra announcement says that the suite calls for a female chorus behind the scenes, and then it stops announcing at that point. Not a word as to whether it is to be supplied in Baltimore or not, and, if so, how. Possibly this is an instance of "stopping the story at one of its most interesting points," to be "continued in our next."

In the meantime, the orchestra indicates it intends to be comprehensive. May it be so, always; and may its brilliantly efficient execution,

m CITIZEN
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 2

MME. HOMER HERE SOON.

Will Be Soloist with the Boston Orchestra.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage, Verdi's "O, Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera "Xerxes," the original form of the so-called "Largo."

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 23 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ACADEMY.

For the Second Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage—Verdi's "O, Don Fatale" from the opera "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration" by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera "Xerxes"—the original form of the so-called "Largo."

ESTABLISHED 1841 NOV 15 1919

EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 28 1919

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat major, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still a young man and on the threshold of his musical career. Another score of interest will be a new work by the young and highly praised composer, Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Kubla Khan." For the rest, Blakireff's Symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 11 years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the Mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia" by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number played by request.

m TELEGRAM
dress New York City
NOV 22

Harold Bauer, the pianist, who play the Beethoven E flat major concerto wit Artur Bodanzky and the New Symphon Orchestra, at the latter's concerts Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon a Wednesday evening, was the recipient a signal honor this week.

He was invited to appear as soloist the memorial concert given by the Bost Symphony Orchestra in Boston for late Major Higginson. Much to Bauer's regret, he was forced to ref because of conflicting engagements.

The New Symphony programme next week besides the Beethoven conce includes the Liszt "Orfeo," sympho poem and the Schumann symphony N in E flat major.

EVENING SUN
dress New York City
NOV 22

THE SYMPHONIES.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat major. Another score of interest will be a new work by the young composer Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Kubla Khan." For the rest, Blakireff's Symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 11 years, which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the Mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia" by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number played by request.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 23 1919

To open the second Boston symphony concert of this season at the Academy on Monday evening, December 1, Conductor Monteux has chosen Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar." The closing number will be Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." Louise Homer will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was made; Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."

Inquirer
Philadelphia, Pa.

Homer Boston Symphony Soloist

As soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, will sing the following perennially beautiful songs: Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's Aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was derived, and Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful;" also Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos." Pierre Monteux has chosen for the same concert Chausson's noble symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his artistic career. For the rest, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," of ballet fame, and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

From
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 23

To open the second Boston Symphony concert of this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Pierre Monteux, the noted conductor, has chosen Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still young and on the threshold of his artistic career. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's darkly and sensuously colored symphonic poem "Thamar," which he also made famous in danced version when conducting the Russian ballet. The closing number will be Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Madame Louise Homer, the great contralto, will sing the following perennially beautiful songs: Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was made, Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos."

* * *

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
22 1919

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert in the Academy on Monday evening, December 1, will be Madame Louise Homer. The symphony will be Chausson's in B flat, and the other numbers Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 23 1919

To open the second Boston Symphony Concert of this season at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 1, Pierre Monteux, the conductor, has chosen Ernest Chausson's noble symphony in B flat, considered one of the master works of French music. Monteux will also conduct Balakireff's darkly and sensuously colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," which he also made famous in dance version when conducting the Russian Ballet. The closing offering will be Chabrier's Bourree Fantastique. Louise Homer, contralto, will sing Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's aria from his opera, "Xerxes," from which the popular Largo was made; Bach's air, "My Heart Ever Faithful," and Verdi's dramatic "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos."

* * *

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.
NOV 26 1919

Louise Homer With Boston Symphony.

Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, her tones will be heard in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form. For the symphonic program Pierre Monteux will present Chausson's "Symphony in B Flat," "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a new work by the American composer, Charles P. Griffes, and the symphonic poem, "The Pre-

From
News
Baltimore, Md.

Music

M. Monteux To Give New Work.

Pierre Monteux is making the presentation of important new modern works a notable feature of his first season as director of the Boston Symphony.

At the first of this organization's concerts here he gave us our introduction to Stravinsky in that marvellous "Oiseau de Feu" music, and at the second of the season's engagements he is going to present another striking new composition, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome."

This was written for a mimodrama or ballet (they used foolishly to call it "ocular opera" in the Pavlowa-Mordkin days), and it was performed in this form in Paris. The score contains episodes for a chorus of female voices off-stage. Query: Whence in the world are these choral females to be forthcoming for the Lyric concert.

Mme. Homer, the great American contralto of the Metropolitan Opera,

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

The second concert of the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will take place at the Lyric on the evening of December 3, when the assisting artist will be Louise Homer, the distinguished Metropolitan contralto. The orchestra will play the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" symphony and Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome" suite with its concealed chorus of female voices, and Mme. Homer will sing the "O Don Fatale" aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos;" "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera of "Xerxes."

From AMERICAN,
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

To open the second Boston symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, December 3, Pierre Monteux has chosen Tschaikowsky's masterpiece the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6. Mr. Monteux will also conduct Florent Schmitt's Suite from his Mimo-drama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto, will be the soloist of this concert.

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
NOV 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season, to be given in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, December 3d, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama, and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely-discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madam Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera, "Xerxes," the original form of the so-called "Largo."

From STAR
Address: Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 24 1919

Under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, and as then constituted, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its indicated policy were—in the true sense of the much-abused term—a "revelation," upon the recent opening concert of the orchestra's present Baltimore season, a revelation of high values.

Opportunity for duplication of this many-sided artistic success at its next Baltimore concert, on December 3, is indicated by the program announced.

This is to consist of Tschaikowsky's gripping "Pathetic" Symphony, a modern work—Florent Schmitt's suite, entitled "The Tragedy of Salome," and vocal pieces, with orchestra, by Mme. Louise Homer, contralto. Mme. Homer's numbers are to consist of the air, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's opera, "Don Carlos;" Beethoven's "Adoration," and the air commonly known as "The

From TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.

Concert Programs Of Week

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon.

She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert.

For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's impassioned and finely wrought symphony in B flat, ranked with Franck's Symphony as an ineffable expression of France's musical genius; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla [illegible] new sym[illegible]

From
Call
New York City

Harold Bauer, the pianist, who plays the Beethoven E Flat Major Concerto with Arthur Bodanzky and the New Symphony Orchestra at the latter's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday evening, was the recipient of a signal honor this week.

He was invited to appear as soloist at the memorial concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston for the late Major Higginson. Much to Bauer's regret, he was forced to refuse because of conflicting engagements.

The New Symphony program for next week, besides the Beethoven Concerto, includes the Liszt "Orfeo," Symphonic Poem and the Schumann Symphony No. 3, in E Flat Major.

From

Pierre Monteux's reorganized Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened the series of five concerts Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall, was all and more than had been expected of it by the music lovers of Providence who attended the concert.

Beethoven's Symphony in D-Major No. 2 was the principal number on the programme. Written when the composer was greatly depressed because of his growing deafness, it holds much of color which only an able conductor and capable, temperamental musicians could interpret in the way in which the Boston Symphony did in their initial concert. It was an effect of grandeur and stateliness which was produced and yet it was not too severe.

The "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Fannie" by Debussy, something entirely different, one of the most beautiful works of the French school of modernists, gave the conductor an [illegible] display still further his versatility in producing the coloring necessary in this class of music. Lizst's "Les Preludes" was played with much effect.

Emilio De Gogorza, baritone, who is well known to Providence music lovers, sang in a voice which, if not quite resonant as a few years ago, was, nevertheless, effective and quite well worth hearing, especially since he possesses the dramatic ability to an unusual degree.

The programme follows:

Beethoven, Symphony in D-major, No. 2, Op. 36, adagio molto, allegro con brio, larghetto, scherzo, allegro molto; Massenet, recitative and air, "Promesse de mon avenir," from "Le de Labore;" Debussy, "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faunce;" Gluck, recitative and air, "Diane Impitoyale," from "Iphigenie en Aulide;" Lizst, "Les Preludes," Symphonic Poem No. 3.

From TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
Date

How long will the Boston Symphony Orchestra survive the death of Major Higginson? Its peculiar product cannot be marketed at a profit and rich eccentrics who are willing to pay for marketing it at a loss are rare.

The orchestra announcement says that the suite calls for a female chorus behind the scenes, and then it stops announcing at that point. Not a word as to whether it is to be supplied in Baltimore or not, and, if so, how. Possibly this is an instance of "stopping the story at one of its most interesting points," to be "continued in our next."

In the meantime, the orchestra indicates it intends to be comprehensive. May it be so, always; and may its brilliantly efficient execution, achieved at its last concert here, be lasting! That concert, all in all, was

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MME. HOMER HERE SOON.

Will Be Soloist with the Boston Orchestra.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria, which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage, Verdi's "O, Don Fatale," from the opera, "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera "Xerxes," the original form of the so-called "Largo."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date [illegible] NOV 23 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ACADEMY.

For the Second Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage.

The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing an aria which should reveal her dramatic powers to advantage—Verdi's "O, Don Fatale" from the opera "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration" by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handel's opera "Xerxes"—the original form of the so-called "Largo."

ESTABLISHED 1880 NOV 15 1919

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

The Boston Symphony With a New [illegible]

It is generally agreed that the war s[illegible] honored Boston Symphony Orchestra d[illegible] good of this organization, however s[illegible] been to the popular demands of the m[illegible] it was a saddening necessity from an artistic point of view However, the orchestra is getting on its feet ag[illegible]in and at the initial concert of the season's series on the seventh of this month it gave an excellent account of itself And Pierre Monteux showed himself an efficient conduct[illegible], as he had done previously in the same auditorium with both opera and the Ballet Russe. He was well received, although so far as applause is concerned the greater honors of the evening went to Sergei Rachmaninoff, the soloist of the evening, whose number was the Liszt Concerto in E flat major for piano-forte and orchestra. His was, indeed, a superb performance The Schumann symphony in B flat major, the overture and adagio of the Beethoven ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and the Enesco suite No. 9 were the remaining numbers of a program which might have been varied more to advantage. Of the orchestral numbers, the ballet adagio was especially pleasing in that it offered a touch of lightness The audience about filled the house, which is to the credit of Brooklyn.

ESTABLISHED 1880 NOV 15 1919

From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Of Varied Interest.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

For the Second Boston Symphony Concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December fifth, Mr. Monteux has arranged a program wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's Suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the most popular contralto of two generations. She is to sing Verdi's "O Don Fatale" from the Opera "Don Carlos," and two songs of well-nigh immortal beauty—"Nature's Adoration" by Beethoven, and the opening number from Handels Opera "Xerxes"—the original form of the so-called "Largo."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 23 1919

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat major, considered one of the master works of French music. The symphony has a tragic significance in that the composer died by an accident while still a young man and on the threshold of his musical career. Another score of interest will be a new work by the young and highly praised composer, Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Kubla Khan." For the rest, Blakireff's Symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 11 years, will head a program which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the Mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia" by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number played by request.

From TELEGRAM
Address New York City

Harold Bauer, the pianist, who play[illegible] the Beethoven E flat major concerto wit[illegible] Artur Bodanzky and the New Symphon[illegible] Orchestra at the latter's concerts [illegible] Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon a[illegible] Wednesday evening, was the recipient [illegible] a signal honor this week.

He was invited to appear as soloist [illegible] the memorial concert given by the Bost[illegible] Symphony Orchestra in Boston for [illegible] late Major Higginson. Much to [illegible] Bauer's regret, he was forced to ref[illegible] because of conflicting engagements.

The New Symphony programme [illegible] next week besides the Beethoven conce[illegible] includes the Liszt "Orfeo," sympho[illegible] poem and the Schumann symphony N[illegible] in E flat major.

From EVENING SUN
Address New York City

THE SYMPHONIES.

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's noble Symphony in B flat major. Another score of interest will be a new work by the young composer Charles P. Griffes, a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasuredome of Kubla Kahn." For the rest, Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's Bourrée Fantasque.

For the Saturday matinee Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a programme which will also include Florent Schmitt's Suite from the Mimodrama "The Tragedy of Salome" and "Catalonia" by the Spanish composer Albeniz, this last number by request.

New York Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

NOVEL EXPERIENCES WITH MUSIC UNAPPLAUDED

Hardly a Hand Stirs at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Heifetz Returns to Prove Again His Ripening as Interpretive Musician—If Mr. Kreisler Should Retire Anew?—Zimro and Its Jewish Quest—The Coming of the Berkshire Quartet

PURISTS of pleasure have been known to wish that there might be no applause at concerts. Let the music sound and sink into the minds and hearts of listeners, each according to inclination and desert, with no postlude of clapping hands at the end of the final periods. Let conductor, singer, virtuoso do his best and rest content with the silent benediction of those who appreciate his prowess. Then would the concert hall become a seat of æsthetic sensation unalloyed, not a room for the play of what the metaphysicians call "crowd-impulses." Usually these aspirations go the way of similar counsels of perfection in a human and therefore fallible world. Yet, for once, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, they were fulfilled. Not that those enjoying this fulfillment upon their submissive neighbors craved rare æsthetic sensation. Far from it. Their purpose was to transform a public concert, at which music was taken at the doors, into a semi-private memorial service for the late Mr. Higginson. At the end of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a few auditors, warm with pleasure in music and performance, began to applaud. Mild hisses here and there stilled them, since in theatre or concert-hall Americans are amusingly obedient to whomsoever assumed to speak; while as usual through a hand clapped, though at the intervals between the several numbers many presumed to speak, while as usual through the intermission a cheerful buzz of gossip, speculation and opinion filled the corridors.

Of course, just occasion for applause was frequent. But for this unexpected censorship, it might have been even heartier than it was on Friday afternoon. Again Mr. Monteux and the orchestra enriched the beauty of Schubert's music. Conductor and pianist—Mr. Fox—both profited by the additional rehearsal, as it were, of Beethoven's concerto at the concert of the preceding day. They were better agreed as to pace, for example; salient details stood clearer, like the warm-voiced horn-calls of the first movement or the sharpened passages for strings in the second; while all concerned summoned the pensive melancholy—the still happiness, almost, of deep delight—that informs the Andante and the light rhythms and piquant transitions of the finale. In fine, Mr. Fox, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with them nearly brought to pass a task impossible within the conditions others laid upon them. Yet they were left to their own virtue for reward. Finally, if ever applause would have been relief to nervous tension, that moment came at the end of the exultant finale, bounding with the joy of life, of Beethoven's fifth symphony. Whatever Mr. Monteux does or fails to do with the preceding divisions, he makes that movement a music of wind and flame. On Friday plaudits becomingly answered him; on Saturday the congregation merely dispersed.

It is a pity that those who arranged these commemorative concerts so lacked imagination. They failed to see that a Symphony Concert, in the nature of things, cannot be both a private and personal and a public and open occasion—a confusion of ideas into which "the founder and sustainer" whose memory they were honoring now and then fell. They forgot that not a few sought Symphony Hall on Saturday evening only for the pleasure and the stimulation of music and performance and were disposed to make the usual return. Above all, they neglected to remember that the very public upon which, after the passing of the present elderly generation, the Symphony Concerts will be depending for existence, is chilled and repelled by these needless inhibitions. For "eager delight," as Mr. Higginson himself once said, exists the Symphony Orchestra.

Transcript Nov 25

Items and Announcements

Typographical error played such havoc with sentences in this department yesterday describing the unusual circumstances of the Symphony Concert of last Saturday, that it is advisable to correct and reprint them here as record of an unprecedented occasion:

> At the end of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a few auditors, warm with pleasure in music and performance, began to applaud. Mild hisses here and there stilled them, since in theatre or concert hall Americans are amusingly obedient to whomsoever asserts authority. Thereafter not a hand clapped, though at the intervals between the several numbers many presumed to speak, while as usual through the intermission a cheerful buzz of gossip, speculation and opinion filled the corridors.

Items and Announcements

When Mr. Fox played the piano part in Brahms's concerto in B-flat at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday last, he set the score before him, while Mr. Piller of the orchestra turned the leaves. Since Pugno's distant day, no "assisting artist" has so outspread the engraved page. Doubtless, had time permitted, Mr. Fox, according to custom, would have memorized his part and in measure the whole concerto. Yet why should not pianists or violinists as well as singers have their music before them? In a concerto, moreover, they companion an orchestra every member of which from the conductor downward, has his part under his eye. Common sense, which Pugno followed with French logic, distinctly favors the opened score.

Three members of the Berkshire Quartet as it was when it last played here—Messrs. Kortschak, Gordon and Stoeber—will return at its concert at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 2. With them at the viola is Mr. Férir, of old eminent virtuoso of the Boston Orchestra, more recently of Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphian band. The four will be heard in a new and recent quartet of Saint-Saëns; in the second movement of Chausson's quartet; and in the third quartet of Schumann.

As the Symphony Concerts continue, Mr. Bedetti, newcomer this season, bids fair to excel his recent predecessors in the chair of the first violoncellist. Once more in Brahms's concerto, last week, expert hearers were impressed with the warm beauty, the broad and edgeless flow of his tone, with the intelligence guiding his playing, with the skill that at every turn serves it. And that, too, while Mr. Sand and Mr. Mimart at the clarinets were doing little feats of their own.

H. T. PARKER

Transcript Nov 26

HIGGINSONIANA

Amusing Tales, as the Reviewers of New York Tell Them, of Their Relation with the Founder and Sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra in Its Earlier Days—Other Timely Anecdotes of His Dealings with the Band

IN New York, the reviewers of music have tales to tell publicly of experiences with Mr. Higginson as patron of the Symphony Orchestra, whereas the superior fine proprieties of Boston compel their brethren to pursue that pastime in private. Here are two of them as Mr. Finck characteristically set them to paper in The Evening Post of last Saturday:

> Mr. Higginson used to invite the New York critics to come to Boston on important occasions. The last time this was done was when Dr. Muck was to give what proved to be a sensational production of Liszt's Faust Symphony. Years ago, half a dozen of us went up to attend the début of a new conductor for the Boston Orchestra—I think it was Nikisch. When we arrived at the station, having, as usual, paid our own fare and charged it to our paper, we were told that we were to meet Mr. Higginson at a certain restaurant. At once we had visions of a free lunch made up of caviar, terrapin, canvasback duck, artichoke salad, camembert, and champagne; for wasn't our host a millionaire? Well, he came, and we sat down and talked about orchestras and conductors, and no cocktail was forthcoming. Finally, slowly and painfully, we reached the simultaneous telepathic conclusion that we were expected to order our own sandwiches and beer and pay for them. We did so, feeling wiser if not better men. In spite of this highly ethical treatment, we all wrote favorably about the new conductor; which proves that musical critics are not as black as painted.
>
> Once I got a letter from the major. It was so peppery, that it made me sneeze. It came about in this way: Another millionaire, Seth Low, knowing that I was an intimate friend as well as an admirer of America's foremost composer, asked me to come to his residence. There he showed me a circular asking for contributions to help MacDowell, who was suffering from the brain disease which ended his life in 1905. Mr. Low himself had put his name down for $1000 and Andrew Carnegie had signed for another thousand. Though Mr. Low was no longer mayor of New York, he was a very busy man, and so he asked me if I would try to get some more signatures. I said I would try, and I wrote eloquent letters to several prominent millionaires who were supposed to be interested in music. Not one of them gave a cent. Somewhat discouraged, I decided to try Boston. Naturally, Mr. Higginson came into my mind first. I didn't tell him about my lack of success in New York, but appealed to him as a well-known musical Mæcenas, and that sort of thing. I wish you could read his reply. I saved it but cannot put my hand on it this moment, because my library has just been moved. He was a sufferer from gout and I imagine the east wind helped to dictate that letter. The substance of it was that I ought to be ashamed of myself to appeal to him, who was already spending a fortune in behalf of music in America, when I was living in a city crammed with millionaires. I felt snubbed once again, and tried no more of the very rich, but with the aid of Victor Harris and other good friends I succeeded, nevertheless, in raising a helpful sum in smaller contributions.

On the editorial page last Monday I referred to certain military traits of Major Higginson which enabled him to meet emergencies. An amusing instance of this trait may be added here: On one occasion a famous foreign pianist, who had been engaged as soloist, demanded payment in advance. He was informed that if he wasn't willing to wait for his check till Saturday afternoon the piano solo would be dropped from the programme and the audience told why. The pianist promptly agreed to wait. The same tactics were employed with the representative of a piano house who had been furnishing the instrument used at the concerts. When he was informed that the orchestra would no longer put the usual big sign on the instrument advertising the maker, he threatened that no piano would be provided. "Very well," he was told, "the concerto would accordingly be omitted, and the reason would be announced to the audience." The dealer immediately came to terms.

With fewer pleasantries, Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Sunday recalls an amusing instance or two of Mr. Higginson's relations with the conductors and the men of the orchestra:

> There was once one of Mr. Higginson's conductors who thought that the tone of the violins—the greatest glory and strength of the organization—would be improved if all the players had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that Mr. Higginson should send to Germany and import for a score or more of his violinists a set of expensive violins by one maker. The results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments were soon packed away in the storeroom, gathering dust.
>
> What the orchestra cost Mr. Higginson in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom and sense of justice, nobody, perhaps, will ever fully know. The greatest trials that came to him were, of course, those that gained so much publicity during the war, and they were grievous. But his path for more than a generation before was not wholly a smooth one. He was always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom showed any hesitation in coming to him as to a friend, counsellor, and guide, in large and small matters—including the investment of their earnings so as to produce an immediate large fortune.

NOVEMBER 24, 1919

Players

had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that Mr. Higginson should send to Germany and import for a score or more of his violinists a set of expensive violins by one maker. The results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments were soon packed away in the storeroom, gathering dust.

What the orchestra cost Mr. Higginson in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom and sense of justice, nobody, perhaps, will ever fully know. The greatest trials that came to him were, of course, those that gained so much publicity during the war, and they were grievous. But his path for more than a generation before was not wholly a smooth one. He was always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom showed any hesitation in coming to him as to a friend, counsellor, and guide, in large and small matters—including the investment of their earnings so as to produce an immediate large fortune.

Transcript Nov 26

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

THE FOUNDER, THE WILL AND THE ORCHESTRA

Mr. Higginson Leaves Nothing to Symphony Hall — His Mistrustful Mood Toward the Reorganized Band — Mrs. Littlefield Sings Fresh and Interesting Songs Unevenly—A New Conductor for the Worcester Festival — Kreisler Acclaimed

AS was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony Orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year. Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of wartime plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfections. The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new régime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his executors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony Orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve and receive them. Like most musically-minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra or, indeed, of the whole art of music other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any régime but his at Symphony Hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
NOV 23 1919

HAROLD BAUER CHOSEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Harold Bauer, the pianist, who plays the Beethoven E flat major concerto, with Artur Bodanzky and the New Symphony Orchestra at the latter's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday evening, was the recipient of a signal honor this week.

He was invited to appear as soloist at the memorial concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston for the late Major Higginson. Much to Mr. Bauer's regret, he was forced to refuse because of conflicting engagements.

Nov 26

Y, THE BOSTON HERALD

Higginson Will Leaves No Endowment Fund to Symphony Orchestra

Library, Musical Scores and Instruments Only Bequests—Widow Receives Practically Entire Estate

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, contrary to general expectations, did not leave an endowment to provide for the future existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and financed until his recent death. This fact was revealed yesterday when his will was filed in the Suffolk registry of probate.

Under the terms of the document his only bequests to the orchestra are his musical library, musical scores and musical instruments, the combined value of which is estimated at $75,000. The major's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, receives practically his entire estate.

It was generally believed that Maj. Higginson had intended to perpetuate the orchestra which he had contributed to the musical world to place the art on a higher plane by endowing it with a $1,000,000 fund, the income of which would have been adequate to meet the expense of maintaining the organization.

Belief Strengthened

This belief was strengthened a number of years ago when Maj. Higginson, before sailing for Europe, confided to a Boston editor that "if anything happens to me on this trip or hereafter the Symphony concerts will go on just the same." While Maj. Higginson did not at that time specify that he had made provision in his will for continuing the orchestra, about six years ago announcement was made that he planned to leave $1,000,000 for that purpose.

At the time this announcement was made Maj. Higginson is quoted as saying: "It is my desire to have the Symphony orchestra benefit all of the people; that was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his individual interest is a poor specimen of a citizen."

Although Maj. Higginson's failure to endow the orchestra created surprise throughout musical circles, fears that the orchestra would be obliged to disband because of lack of financial support were allayed yesterday when Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the organization, announced that a campaign would be conducted soon to raise a permanent fund for the orchestra and to provide against future exigencies.

Earlier Will Presumed

Whether Maj. Higginson executed an earlier will to the one offered for probate yesterday, and which is dated Oct. 19, 1918, could not be learned. Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees of the will, being inaccessible. The presumption is that he had drawn a will several years ago in which provision for the orchestra was made.

Maj. Higginson's heart and soul were in the Symphony orchestra. For many years he met the annual deficits of the orchestra. These ranged from $20,000 to nearly $100,000. All these he paid cheerfully, until the last two or three years, when they were met by subscriptions from music lovers.

The will remembers Harvard in the event that the family line stops. On the same contingency the Massachusetts General Hospital may benefit. The will gives some art objects to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. These are the only public gifts of the will and codicil.

The document leaves to the son, Alexander H. Higginson, the testator's gold watch, jewelry and swords, and the right to select 30 paintings, 30 ornaments, 10 Japanese articles and 300 books, and gives the rest of the personal effects of the testator to the widow.

Residue to Widow

Then the will leaves to the widow the entire residue of the estate, the bulk of it outright. In the event of her death within 30 days the residue is to be placed in trust with Charles Francis Adams and Judge Cabot for the benefit of the son, who have discretion in payment of income.

In the above contingency, on the death of the son the trustees, if the income amount to $10,000 or more, are to pay to the son's wife $5000 annually, or if the income is less than $10,000 half of the income is to go to the son's wife and the other half or less at the issue.

Harvard will only benefit under the following clause of the will, which provides that, if the widow of the testator do not survive him 30 days, then, after the son's death, on the death of the wife of the son, or on the death of the grandson, Henry Lee Higginson, whichever shall last happen, the trustees shall pay over the principal and accrued income by hand to the then living issue of the son per stirpes (by the blood), and in default of such then living issue the trustees shall pay over one-fifth of the principal and undistributed income to the Massachusetts General Hospital and four-fifths to the president and fellows of Harvard College.

The codicil to the will, which was executed Dec. 26, 1918, contains the gift to the Symphony Orchestra. The gift is made with considerable reservation. The testator's library of music, including scores used by the orchestra, and the testator's musical instruments, including those used by the Symphony, was given to Charles Francis Adams in trust. Mr. Adams is instructed to allow the Symphony Orchestra to use the library and instruments free of expense, except charges for care and insurance; but he is also instructed, in not less than three years or more than five, either to turn the library and instruments over to the Symphony orchestra or to sell the same wherever he thinks most advantageous.

The testator says, incidentally: "I hope he (the trustee) will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra shall have been and is being managed and the prospect of continued existence in accordance with high standards."

The codicil makes a gift to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts of such art objects of the testator as at the time of his death shall be loaned to the museum.

Remains in Firm

Evidently Mr. Higginson intended his money should remain in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., for the will declares that after the value of his partnership interest in that firm shall have been determined, the executors shall demand payment in cash only of sufficient to pay debts and taxes and shall accept 6 per cent. 10-year notes for the balance.

One provision of the will is that on loans for other than business reasons where the sums are not more than $1000 the executors shall not attempt to collect the same.

An interesting provision is contained in a paragraph concerning a trust fund that exists for the benefit of the grandson, Henry Lee Higginson. The beneficiary is given certain power of appointment over that fund, the non-exercise of which will result by the will in the fund going into the residue of the estate. The paragraph also states that if the grandson shall ever cease to bear the name of the testator, the fund shall also eventually go into the residue, he losing his power of appointment.

The codicil makes the following personal bequests: $5000 to the daughter-in-law, Jean Higginson; $1000 to the grandson, Henry L. Higginson; $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra; $5000 to the testator's secretary, Bertha O. Hinckley; $2000 to Arthur I. Glidden, employed by Lee, Higginson & Co.; $2000 to George N. Page, in the service of the testator; $1000 to the chauffeur, Michael McManus; $2000 to Catherine Fraser, in his service; $2000 to Frieda Ellingren; $200 each to Annie North and Mary McKenna if they were in his employ at the time of his death.

The executors are Clift Rogers Clapp of Newton and Charles Francis Adams of Concord.

DUKE'S WIFE TE
From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

PRIVATE HEARINGS

Of New Compositions of American Composers To Be Given by Pierre Monteux, Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 12.—Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, very promptly responded to the suggestion made by The Boston Post concerning private hearings of compositions from young American composers and is arranging to institute a series of private concerts. Mr. Monteux will arrange to give from two to four private performances of manuscript compositions by composers between January 1 and May 1, and to invite to these concerts the composers who have submitted scores for approval and to also invite a few of their friends and guests of the orchestra. In this manner the young composers will have an opportunity for a just hearing of their compositions.

...ar...
H...
...drew...
...d in Gale...
... mother of...
Synod m...

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

NOVEL EXPERIENCES WITH MUSIC UNAPPLAUDED

Hardly a Hand Stirs at the Symphony Concert of Saturday—Mr. Heifetz Returns to Prove Again His Ripening as Interpretive Musician—If Mr. Kreisler Should Retire Anew?—Zimro and Its Jewish Quest—The Coming of the Berkshire Quartet.

PURISTS of pleasure have been known to wish that there might be no applause at concerts. Let the music sound and sink into the minds and hearts of listeners, each according to inclination and desert, with no postlude of clapping hands at the end of the final periods. Let conductor, singer, virtuoso do his best and rest content with the silent benediction of those who appreciate his prowess. Then would the concert hall become a seat of æsthetic sensation unalloyed, not a room for the play of what the metaphysicians call "crowd-impulses." Usually these aspirations go the way of similar counsels of perfection in a human and therefore fallible world. Yet, for once, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, they were fulfilled. Not that those enjoying this fulfillment upon their submissive neighbors craved rare æsthetic sensation. Far from it. Their purpose was to transform a public concert, at which money was taken at the doors, into a semi-private memorial service for the late Mr. Higginson. At the end of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a few auditors, warm with pleasure in music and performance, began to applaud. Mild hisses here and there stilled them, since in theatre or concert-hall Americans are amusingly obedient to whomsoever assumed to speak; while as usual through a hand clapped, though at the intervals between the several numbers many presumed to speak, while as usual through the intermission a cheerful buzz of gossip, speculation and opinion filled the corridors.

Of course, just occasion for applause was frequent. But for this unexpected censorship, it might have been even heartier than it was on Friday afternoon. Again Mr. Monteux and the orchestra enriched the beauty of Schubert's music. Conductor and pianist—Mr. Fox—both profited by the additional rehearsal, as it were, of Brahms's concerto at the concert of the preceding day. They were better agreed as to pace, for example; salient details stood clearer, like the warm-voiced horn-calls of the first movement or the sharpedged passages for strings in the second; while all concerned summoned the pensive melancholy—the still happiness, almost, of deep delight—that informs the Andante and the light rhythms and piquant transitions of the finale. In fine, Mr. Fox, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with them nearly brought to pass a task impossible within the conditions others laid upon them. Yet they were left to their own virtue for reward. Finally, if ever applause would have been relief to nervous tension, that moment came at the end of the exultant finale, bounding with the joy of life, of Beethoven's fifth symphony. Whatever Mr. Monteux does or fails to do with the preceding divisions, he makes that movement a music of wind and flame. On Friday plaudits becomingly answered him; on Saturday the congregation merely dispersed.

It is a pity that those who arranged these commemorative concerts so lacked imagination. They failed to see that a Symphony Concert, in the nature of things, cannot be both a private and personal and a public and open occasion—a confusion of ideas into which "the founder and sustainer" whose memory they were honoring now and then fell. They forgot that not a few sought Symphony Hall on Saturday evening only for the pleasure and the stimulation of music and performance and were disposed to make the usual return. Above all, they neglected to remember that the very public upon which, after the passing of the present elderly generation, the Symphony Concerts will be depending for existence, is chilled and repelled by these needless inhibitions. For "eager delight," as Mr. Higginson himself once said, exists the Symphony Orchestra.

Transcript Nov 25

Items and Announcements

Typographical error played such havoc with sentences in this department yesterday describing the unusual circumstances of the Symphony Concert of last Saturday, that it is advisable to correct and reprint them here as record of an unprecedented occasion:

> At the end of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a few auditors, warm with pleasure in music and performance, began to applaud. Mild hisses here and there stilled them, since in theatre or concert hall Americans are amusingly obedient to whomsoever asserts authority. Thereafter not a hand clapped, though at the intervals between the several numbers many presumed to speak, while as usual through the intermission a cheerful buzz of gossip, speculation and opinion filled the corridors.

Items and Announcements

When Mr. Fox played the piano part in Brahms's concerto in B-flat at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday last, he set the score before him, while Mr. Piller of the orchestra turned the leaves. Since Pugno's distant day, no "assisting artist" has so outspread the engraved page. Doubtless, had time permitted, Mr. Fox, according to custom, would have memorized his part and in measure the whole concerto. Yet why should not pianists or violinists as well as singers have their music before them? In a concerto, moreover, they companion an orchestra every member of which from the conductor downward, has his part under his eye. Common sense, which Pugno followed with French logic, distinctly favors the opened score.

Three members of the Berkshire Quartet as it was when it last played here—Messrs. Kortschak, Gordon and Stoeber—will return at its concert at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, Dec. 2. With them at the viola is Mr. Férir, of old eminent virtuoso of the Boston Orchestra, more recently of Mr. Stokowski's Philadelphian band. The four will be heard in a new and recent quartet of Saint-Saëns; in the second movement of Chausson's quartet; and in the third quartet of Schumann.

As the Symphony Concerts continue, Mr. Bedetti, newcomer this season, bids fair to excel his recent predecessors in the chair of the first violoncellist. Once more in Brahms's concerto, last week, expert hearers were impressed with the warm beauty, the broad and edgeless flow of his tone, with the intelligence guiding his playing, with the skill that at every turn serves it. And that, too, while Mr. Sand and Mr. Mimart at the clarinets were doing little feats of their own.

H. T. PARKER

Transcript Nov 24

HIGGINSONIANA

Amusing Tales, as the Reviewers of New York Tell Them, of Their Relations with the Founder and Sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra in Its Earlier Days—Other Timely Anecdotes of His Dealings with the Band

IN New York, the reviewers of music have tales to tell publicly of experiences with Mr. Higginson as patron of the Symphony Orchestra, whereas the superior fine proprieties of Boston compel their brethren to pursue that pastime in private. Here are two of them as Mr. Finck characteristically set them to paper in The Evening Post of last Saturday:

> Mr. Higginson used to invite the New York critics to come to Boston on important occasions. The last time this was done was when Dr. Muck was to give what proved to be a sensational production of Liszt's Faust Symphony. Years ago, half a dozen of us went up to attend the début of a new conductor for the Boston Orchestra—I think it was Nikisch. When we arrived at the station, having, as usual, paid our own fare and charged it to our paper, we were told that we were to meet Mr. Higginson at a certain restaurant. At once we had visions of a free lunch made up of caviar, terrapin, canvasback duck, artichoke salad, camembert, and champagne; for wasn't our host a millionaire? Well, he came, and we sat down and talked about orchestras and conductors, and no cocktail was forthcoming. Finally, slowly and painfully, we reached the simultaneous telepathic conclusion that we were expected to order our own sandwiches and beer and pay for them. We did so, feeling wiser if not better men. In spite of this highly ethical treatment, we all wrote favorably about the new conductor; which proves that musical critics are not as black as painted.
>
> Once I got a letter from the major. It was so peppery, that it made me sneeze. It came about in this way: Another millionaire, Seth Low, knowing that I was an intimate friend as well as an admirer of America's foremost composer, asked me to come to his residence. There he showed me a circular asking for contributions to help MacDowell, who was suffering from the brain disease which ended his life in 1905. Mr. Low himself had put his name down for $1000 and Andrew Carnegie had signed for another thousand. Though Mr. Low was no longer mayor of New York, he was a very busy man, and so he asked me if I would try to get some more signatures. I said I would try, and I wrote eloquent letters to several prominent millionaires who were supposed to be interested in music. Not one of them gave a cent. Somewhat discouraged, I decided to try Boston. Naturally, Mr. Higginson came into my mind first. I didn't tell him about my lack of success in New York, but appealed to him as a well-known musical Mæcenas, and that sort of thing. I wish you could read his reply. I saved it but cannot put my hand on it this moment, because my library has just been moved. He was a sufferer from gout and I imagine the east wind helped to dictate that letter. The substance of it was that I ought to be ashamed of myself to appeal to him, who was already spending a fortune in behalf of music in America, when I was living in a city crammed with millionaires. I felt snubbed once again, and tried no more of the very rich, but with the aid of Victor Harris and other good friends I succeeded, nevertheless, in raising a helpful sum in smaller contributions.
>
> On the editorial page last Monday I referred to certain military traits of Major Higginson which enabled him to meet emergencies. An amusing instance of this trait may be added here: On one occasion a famous foreign pianist, who had been engaged as soloist, demanded payment in advance. He was informed that if he wasn't willing to wait for his check till Saturday afternoon the piano solo would be dropped from the programme and the audience told why. The pianist promptly agreed to wait. The same tactics were employed with the representative of a piano house who had been furnishing the instrument used at the concerts. When he was informed that the orchestra would no longer put the usual big sign on the instrument advertising the maker, he threatened that no piano would be provided. "Very well," he was told, "the concerto would accordingly be omitted, and the reason would be announced to the audience." The dealer immediately came to terms.

With fewer pleasantries, Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Sunday recalls an amusing instance or two of Mr. Higginson's relations with the conductors and the men of the orchestra:

> There was once one of Mr. Higginson's conductors who thought that the tone of the violins—the greatest glory and strength of the organization—would be improved if all the players had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that Mr. Higginson should send to Germany and import for a score or more of his violinists a set of expensive violins by one maker. The results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments were soon packed away in the storeroom, gathering dust.
>
> What the orchestra cost Mr. Higginson in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom and sense of justice, nobody, perhaps, will ever fully know. The greatest trials that came to him were, of course, those that gained so much publicity during the war, and they were grievous. But his path for more than a generation before was not wholly a smooth one. He was always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom showed any hesitation in coming to him as to a friend, counsellor, and guide, in large and small matters—including the investment of their earnings so as to produce an immediate large fortune.

Transcript Nov 26

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

UNDER, THE WILL AND THE ORCHESTRA

Mr. Higginson Leaves Nothing to Symphony Hall — His Mistrustful Mood Toward the Reorganized Band — Mrs. Littlefield Sings Fresh and Interesting Songs Unevenly—A New Conductor for the Worcester Festival — Kreisler Acclaimed

AS was to be expected, Mr. Higginson's will makes no mention of the endowment with which he once purposed to secure the future of the Symphony Orchestra. When the band passed from his hands, he counted himself free from obligation of maintenance and even declined, if common report is to be trusted, to share in the subscriptions that met the deficit of last year. Indeed, had not the wiser counsels of close friends finally prevailed, the probability was that he would have dispersed the orchestra in the summer of 1918, so bitterly did he resent the tumults and disorders into which the anti-German moods of wartime plunged it; so firmly did he believe that, reorganized and differently controlled, it could never regain its old perfections. The bequest that he had often promised, publicly and privately, was seemingly revoked, while certainly his mistrust of the new régime continued to the end. Else he would hardly have directed one of his executors to hold as trustee various scores and instruments for three or five years and then decide whether the new Symphony Orchestra has been wisely enough managed and held to sufficiently high standards to deserve and receive them. Like most musically-minded men of his generation, and the more for long association with German conductors, Mr. Higginson could hardly conceive of an orchestra or, indeed, of the whole art of music other than in German terms. Being a man of worldly and musical experience he was unlikely ever to have made the absurd remark attributed to him in his war-time chagrins—that only German conductors could read a score. Deep in his mind and heart, however, was mistrust of all other conductors and of any régime but his at Symphony Hall. He transferred the orchestra to the present trustees; but, naturally in a man of his years, temperament and experiences, the conviction remained unaltered. So also do various ironies.

From Morning Telegraph New York City

HAROLD BAUER BY BOSTON S

Harold Bauer, the pia
the Beethoven E flat with Artur Bodanzky and phony Orchestra at the at Carnegie Hall next noon and Wednesday eve recipient of a signal hono
He was invited to app
at the memorial concert
Boston Symphony Orches for the late Major Higgins
Mr. Bauer's regret, he w refuse because of confli ments.

England
cal wo their the tra he unit in add he bri poetic ducti
years, youth, again
Wh life, h but and u and I to the
of Sh joyed
If it

NOVEMBER 24, 1919

Players

had instruments of the same make and quality, instead of such as each individual had chosen or been able to possess himself of. Nothing would do, therefore, but that Mr. Higginson should send to Germany and import for a score or more of his violinists a set of expensive violins by one maker. The results were not what were expected, and most of the instruments were soon packed away in the storeroom, gathering dust.

What the orchestra cost Mr. Higginson in time and trouble, in annoyances great and small, in perplexities, in demands upon his patience, wisdom and sense of justice, nobody, perhaps, will ever fully know. The greatest trials that came to him were, of course, those that gained so much publicity during the war, and they were grievous. But his path for more than a generation before was not wholly a smooth one. He was always accessible to his players, in his busy hours and out of them, and they seldom showed any hesitation in coming to him as to a friend, counsellor, and guide, in large and small matters—including the investment of their earnings so as to produce an immediate large fortune.

Nov 86

Y, THE BOSTON HERALD

Higginson Will Leaves No Endowment Fund to Symphony Orchestra

Library, Musical Scores and Instruments Only Bequests—Widow Receives Practically Entire Estate

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, contrary to general expectations, did not leave an endowment to provide for the future existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he founded and financed until his recent death. This fact was revealed yesterday when his will was filed in the Suffolk registry of probate.

Under the terms of the document his only bequests to the orchestra are his musical library, musical scores and musical instruments, the combined value of which is estimated at $75,000. The major's widow, Ida Agassiz Higginson, receives practically his entire estate.

It was generally believed that Maj. Higginson had intended to perpetuate the orchestra which he had contributed to the musical world to place the art on a higher plane by endowing it with a $1,000,000 fund, the income of which would have been adequate to meet the expense of maintaining the organization.

Belief Strengthened

This belief was strengthened a number of years ago when Maj. Higginson, before sailing for Europe, confided to a Boston editor that "if anything happens to me on this trip or hereafter the Symphony concerts will go on just the same." While Maj. Higginson did not at that time specify that he had made provision in his will for continuing the orchestra, about six years ago announcement was made that he planned to leave $1,000,000 for that purpose.

At the time this announcement was made Maj. Higginson is quoted as saying: "It is my desire to have the Symphony orchestra benefit all of the people; that was my early ambition in founding it, as I believe that a man who lives for himself and his individual interest is a poor specimen of a citizen."

Although Maj. Higginson's failure to endow the orchestra created surprise throughout musical circles, fears that the orchestra would be obliged to disband because of lack of financial support were allayed yesterday when Judge Frederick P. Cabot, chairman of the board of trustees of the organization, announced that a campaign would be conducted soon to raise a permanent fund for the orchestra and to provide against future exigencies.

Earlier Will Presumed

Whether Maj. Higginson executed an earlier will to the one offered for probate yesterday, and which is dated Oct. 19, 1918, could not be learned, Charles Francis Adams, one of the trustees of the will, being inaccessible. The presumption is that he had drawn a will several years ago in which provision for the orchestra was made.

Maj. Higginson's heart and soul were in the Symphony orchestra. For many years he met the annual deficits of the orchestra. These ranged from $20,000 to nearly $100,000. All these he paid cheerfully, until the last two or three years, when they were met by subscriptions from music lovers.

The will remembers Harvard in the event that the family line stops. On the same contingency the Massachusetts General Hospital may benefit. The will gives some art objects to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. These are the only public gifts of the will and codicil.

The document leaves to the son, Alexander H. Higginson, the testator's gold watch, jewelry and swords, and the right to select 30 paintings, 30 ornaments, 10 Japanese articles and 300 books, and gives the rest of the personal effects of the testator to the widow.

Residue to Widow

Then the will leaves to the widow the entire residue of the estate, the bulk of it outright. In the event of her death within 30 days the residue is to be placed in trust with Charles Francis Adams and Judge Cabot for the benefit of the son, who have discretion in payment of income.

In the above contingency, on the death of the son the trustees, if the income amount to $10,000 or more, are to pay to the son's wife $5000 annually, or if the income is less than $10,000 a half of the income is to go to the son's wife and the other half or less to the issue.

Harvard will only benefit under the following clause of the will, which provides that, if the widow of the testator do not survive him 30 days, then, after the son's death, on the death of the wife of the son, or on the death of the grandson, Henry Lee Higginson, whichever shall last happen, the trustees shall pay over the principal and accrued income on hand to the then living issue of the son per stirpes (by the blood), and in default of such then living issue the trustees shall pay over one-fifth of the principal and undistributed income to the Massachusetts General Hospital and four-fifths to the president and fellows of Harvard College.

The codicil to the will, which was executed Dec. 26, 1918, contains the gift to the Symphony Orchestra. The gift is made with considerable reservation. The testator's library of music, including scores used by the orchestra, and the testator's musical instruments, including those used by the Symphony, was given to Charles Francis Adams in trust. Mr. Adams is instructed to allow the Symphony Orchestra to use the library and instruments free of expense, except charges for care and insurance; but he is also instructed, in not less than three years or more than five, either to turn the library and instruments over to the Symphony orchestra or to sell the same wherever he thinks most advantageous.

The testator says, incidentally: "I hope he (the trustee) will be guided by the manner in which the Symphony Orchestra shall have been and is being managed and the prospect of continued existence in accordance with high standards."

The codicil makes a gift to the Boston Museum of Fine Arts of such art objects of the testator as at the time of his death shall be loaned to the museum.

Remains in Firm

Evidently Mr. Higginson intended his money should remain in the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., for the will declares that after the value of his partnership interest in that firm shall have been determined, the executors shall demand payment in cash only of sufficient to pay debts and taxes and shall accept 6 per cent. 10-year notes for the balance.

One provision of the will is that on loans for other than business reasons where the sums are not more than $1000 the executors shall not attempt to collect the same.

An interesting provision is contained in a paragraph concerning a trust fund that exists for the benefit of the grandson, Henry Lee Higginson. The beneficiary is given certain power of appointment over that fund, the non-exercise of which will result by the will in the fund going into the residue of the estate. The paragraph also states that if the grandson shall ever cease to bear the name of the testator, the fund shall also eventually go into the residue, he losing his power of appointment.

The codicil makes the following personal bequests: $5000 to the daughter-in-law, Jean Higginson; $1000 to the grandson, Henry L. Higginson; $10,000 to Charles A. Ellis, former manager of the Symphony Orchestra; $5000 to the testator's secretary, Bertha O. Hinckley; $2000 to Arthur I. Glidden, employed by Lee, Higginson & Co.; $2000 to George N. Page, in the service of the testator; $1000 to the chauffeur, Michael McManus; $2300 to Catherine Fraser, in his service; $2000 to Frieda Ellingren; $200 each to Annie North and Mary McKenna if they were in his employ at the time of his death.

The executors are Clift Rogers Clapp of Newton and Charles Francis Adams of Concord.

DUKE'S WIFE TE

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

PRIVATE HEARINGS

Of New Compositions of American Composers To Be Given by Pierre Monteux, Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 12.—Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, very promptly responded to the suggestion made by The Boston Post concerning private hearings of compositions from young American composers and is arranging to institute a series of private concerts. Mr. Monteux will arrange to give from two to four private performances of manuscript compositions by composers between January 1 and May 1, and to invite to these concerts the composers who have submitted scores for approval and to also invite a few of their friends and guests of the orchestra. In this manner the young composers will have an opportunity for a just hearing of their compositions.

Synod m

GRIFFES AND HIS MUSIC

THE NEW COMPOSER AND HIS NEW PIECE

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Tone-Poem After Coleridge's Verse, for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—Backgrounds, Incidental Circumstance and Anticipations

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this week play a new symphonic poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, draws attention to a young American composer who, partly through natural modesty and partly because of his insistent refusal to write in an obviously popular style, has not yet won the reputation that he deserves, and that he is likely to gain in the future. Mr. Griffes was born in Elmira, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1884, and first studied the piano with Miss Mary S. Broughton in his home-town. He was later the pupil of Ernest Jedliczka and Gottfried Galston in Berlin for four years, studying composition also with Philipp Ruefer and Engelbert Humperdinck. After his return to America, he became the teacher of music at the Hackley School for Boys, at Tarrytown, where he has done most of his creative work, besides teaching independently in New York City. Among his compositions already published, or performed in public, are numerous songs and piano pieces; "The Kairn of Koridwen," a dance-drama in two scenes; "Shojo," a Japanese mimodrama; and a chorus, "These Things Shall Be," sung at the New York Community Chorus Festival of 1917. His ballet music has been produced at the Neighborhood Playhouse, as well as by Adolf Bolm and Michio Itow, for whom he has also written minor dances of exotic character. The chief interpreter of his songs has been Mme. Eva Gauthier.

Definitely modern in its technique, yet escaping the imitative emptiness into which so much of this type of American composition has fallen, the music of Mr. Griffes challenges the closest study and analysis. It is not easy material to absorb at a single hearing, but invariably there is the feeling that it is worth hearing again. His first considerable success with an audience was scored recently in New York through a "Poem" for flute and orchestra, introduced by George Barrère and the New York Symphony Society at Æolian Hall in a Sunday afternoon concert. The new composition is in keeping with the consistent seriousness of his efforts, and may well be considered his most significant contribution thus far to the literature of absolute music.

The words "absolute music" are used with some hesitation, for Mr. Griffes has in the past been definitely programmatic in his creations, and by his own confession he finds it far easier to write with some visual image in his mind, to be put, however vaguely and impressionistically, into audible form. In the case of his new "Poem," also, he admits that he intended to convey more than a merely formal design of melody and harmony, certainly more than the meretricious union between a solo instrument and its accompaniment for the glorification of the former alone. But he is unable to put his underlying idea into concrete form, and the chances are that his hearers will supply the deficiency in an amusing variety of ways.

To Walter Damrosch, who conducted the orchestra at the initial performance, Mr. Griffes' Poem seems Greek in spirit, distinctly a compliment from one who has himself experimented successfully with the production of Greek drama, and the composition of incidental music for it. To the majority of listeners, however, the predominant mood must inevitably have been Oriental, in the accepted sense, perhaps even African rather than Asiatic. The languorous minor strains which open and close the piece might equally well portray the dawn and evening of a day in the desert, or the introduction and epilogue to a sensuous harem scene, while the intervening dance rhythms could apply to sheiks and whirling dervishes as easily as to houris and experimental sultanas.

Yet one seldom writes for the flute without becoming actively pastoral in spirit, and when all the guesses have been made and all the imaginations strained, it is to a basically pastoral idea that Mr. Griffes must confess, if he is as honest as his music bespeaks him. That he has enveloped his nymphs and satyrs in the gaudier trappings of Scheherazade and her tribe is nobody's business but his own. Mr. Griffes composes naturally and involuntarily in Oriental idiom, quite as the majority of other American composers express their deepest thoughts automatically in ragtime or the melodic ballad form. Practically all of his previous work has been tinged with this exotic coloring, in particular the exceedingly interesting ballet music that he prepared for Adolf Bohn and Michio Itow, and certain strange, elusive songs of Stravinskian flavor.

Whatever pictures and impressions Mr. Griffes's poem may produce in the imagination, the fact remains that it is a remarkably well-wrought composition, dignified and serious in intention, articulate in design, and of a rare fitness for the instrument which it honors. Obviously its creator did not say, "Go to, I will write a piece for the flute." Rather did he work out of his imagination a series of tones which cried aloud for a flute to interpret them.

The instrument is given every opportunity to display its individual properties, never is there any suggestion of a thing for effect, or the artificial insertion of mere technique for its own sake. Both in the slow parts, where broad, low tones float languidly above the orchestra, and in the rapid, cleverly rhythmed passages, in climatic accelerando, with the whistling treble still piercing the accompanying hubbub, the Poem is admirably suited to the art of George Barrère, and his fine interpretation was exceedingly helpful to the favorable reaction of the entire audience, which overwhelmed both the composer and the performer with applause.

Upon the fly-leaf in the manuscript score of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" stands as clew to the music a brief quotation from Coleridge's dream-drenched, perhaps opium-drenched, poem, to wit:

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

. . . . . .

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

Then follows the tone-poem, a relatively short piece written for the usual orchestra, plus a celesta and piano—"to be blended with the other instruments"—with frequent division of the strings, with occasional use of violin and oboe as solo voices. Mr. Griffes's workmanship is "ultra-modern" in the common and convenient usage of the words, evenuating in music that is an iridescent web through which occasionally pierce or flash—as it seems in a reading of the score—sharp-set and imaginative harmonies, graphic and imaginative modulations, as keen and felicitous contrasts and combinations of instrumental timbres. Mr. Griffes apparently has no taste for the thick-woven luxuriance, melodic, harmonic, instrumental, of the Wagnerian and the Straussian day. For him as for Mr. Loeffler in his later pieces and for Mr. Carpenter, a relatively thin music, ascending from brief motives, yet of clear and plastic progress, of fine and adroit tracture, vivid with color and implication, swimming in atmosphere. Again, so far as the reading eye may gather the quality of the tone-poem, Mr. Griffes is not insistently and definitely oriental in the Russian manner. Rather, such oriental suggestion as the music may convey, is but one thread in a web which would be tapestry, like Coleridge's verse, of fantastic vision. Nor is Mr. Griffes minded to delineative progress through Coleridge's lines after the fashion of pedestrian composers. It is possible to detect in his tone-poem "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," the contrasts of "sunny pleasure-dome" with "caves of ice." No print, no diagram, however, is Mr. Griffes drawing in tones. Instead, he is transmuting into them, in his own voice and manner, a vision and an atmosphere. "You will be surprised," said Mr. Toscanini, as he invited audience trooped into the dress-rehearsal of Montemezzi's opera, "The Love of Three Kings" at the Metropolitan. "You will be surprised," Mr. Monteux might as reasonably say to his hearers, when he opens the score next Friday of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan."

Sooner or later, the public of the Symphony Concerts will hear the pieces—a Concerto Grosso of Händel; Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar"; Dukas's overture to Cornelile's play of "Polyeucte," and Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—withdrawn by Mr. Monteux to make room for a recent commemorative programme. Two of them, "Thamar" and "Salome"—blessed pair!—have been sufficiently rehearsed to be played in the impending journey of the orchestra to other cities.

Herald Nov 29

Tomorrow afternoon the seventh Symphony concert, Mr. Monteux conductor. Chausson Symphony; Griffes. The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan (first performances); Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque. Louise Homer will sing: Beethoven, Nature's Adoration; Handel, air from "Xerxes;" Bach, My Heart Ever Faithful; Verdi, O Don Fatale, from "Don Carlos."

Boston Globe Nov 29

MME HOMER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

New American Composer Has a Brilliant Introduction

Mme Louise Homer, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, sang four familiar numbers: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; "O, Don Fatale," Verdi, and "Ombra Mai Fu," Handel, better known as "Handel's Largo." Her choice of selections gave great pleasure to the numerous concert goers who prefer to hear over and over again numbers they have learned to like, but disappointed the seekers for novelties.

Her singing was not at its best yesterday. Her breathing was often labored and her tones sometimes forced and unsteady. Only for moments did her voice regain its old-time splendor. Her interpretations were workmanlike.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat major was superbly played. Mr Monteux excels any recent conductor the Symphony has had in music of this sort, which calls for fire and expressiveness with

Herald Nov 29

'KUBLA KHAN' AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives First Performance of Griffes's Fantastic Work

AUDIENCE TWICE RECALLS COMPOSER

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra: Beethoven, Nature's Adoration; Handel, air from "Serse"; Bach, My Heart Ever Faithful; Griffes, Symphonic Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (first performance); Verdi, O Don Fatale, from "Don Carlos"; Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree-Fantasque.

Any composer girding up his loins to turn Coleridge's "Kubla Kahn" into a vocal work, cantata or what not, would start on a perilous adventure for, to quote Swinburne, this poem is "the supreme model of music in our language." "In reading it," said the master of rhythm and verbal euphony, "we seem rapt into that paradise revealed to Swedenborg, where music and color and perfume were one, where you could hear the hues and see the harmonies of heaven." Any composer mediating a symphonic poem fully "illustrative" of "Kubla Khan," a tonal interlinear translation, would undertake a fool's task.

Mr. Griffes, born in New York state 35 years ago, wisely chose extracts from the poem, lines describing the stately pleasure-dome, "the sunny pleasure dome with caves of ice," "the miracle of rare device," the gardens and the "sunny spots of greenery." By a legitimate stretch of the imagination he hears and reproduces the sounds of revelry that might wel take place in this strange palace, mentioned first by travellers, whose description led Coleridge, dreaming, to write the fragment that is enough to make his name illustrious.

Instrumental music may add wings to even a romantically poetic flight. No one hearing this music of Mr. Griffes will feel that the poem itself has been belittled; that its splendor has been tarnished; for this composer is blessed with what is rare with American musicians, imagination. His gift of expression is pronounced. He might have been extravagant; his music might have been merely bizarre. In either case he would have incurred the reproach of affectation. He has succeeded in being musically, esthetically successfully unusual. He studied composition in Berlin; but there are no Germanisms, either orthodox or heterodox, in his style. Nor does it seem that he has worshipped too devoutly in any one of the modern Parisian chapels. If he has been influenced at all, the influence is that of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, and the barbaric gorgeousness of the Russian ballet; but Mr. Griffes has decided and refreshing individuality; he has found an Oriental expression that is his own, as he has found new harmonic and orchestral colors. His "Alph, the sacred river" is not the Terek of Balakireff's "Thamar"; his measures of wild revelry are not those that Rimsky-Korsakoff heard in Sinbad's palace. The music, from the strange, unearthly opening, which at once arrests the attention, to the exquisitely fanciful ending, is fascinating throughout.

Mr. Monteux, who had taken great pains in the preparation of this remarkable composition, led a brilliant performance. Mr. Griffes was twice called upon the stage by the audience.

Would Chausson, if he had lived, have wholly escaped the influence of Wagner and Cesar Franck? The symphony is a serious work, one to be respected, with an impressive ending. The mood of the three movements is sombre without sufficient contrast. There is prevailing shade; there is little sunlight. It was a pleasure to hear after many years Mottl's skilful orchestration of Chabrier's jovial Bourree. Mottl, who admired the Frenchman and knew him well, orchestrated this Bourree in Chabrier's manner.

Mme. Homer was more fortunate in her interpretation of Verdi's aria than in her delivery of the air from Handel's "Serse" and Bach's repeated assertion that his heart was ever faithful. In Verdi's air she was appropriately dramatic with effective dynamic contrasts. The air of Handel and Bach's tune were sung merely "ore rotundo." While she was delivering the address of Xerxes to his beloved plane tree as if the monarch had been thundering a command at his huge army, or storming at Mount Athos, we wondered where the story about this affection was first told. We read in one of Dr. Donne's Elegies:

Xerxes' strange Lydian love, the platane tree,
Was loved for age, none being so large as she;

but Pliny, noting the affection entertained by Dionysius, the Sicilian King, by Licinius Mutianus, thrice consul, and by the Emperor Caligula, for the plane tree, says nothing about the passion of Xerxes. Was Herodotus the first? He tells about Xerxes passing by the Lydian city of Callatebus. On the way the King "met with a plane tree, which on account of its beauty, he presented with golden ornaments."

The audience, liking Mme. Homer's robust singing of the Handelian air—Caffarelli, the first to sing it, was praised for his "majestic style," but majestic and robust are not synonymous terms—and also recognizing the familiar "Largo," applauded the singer vigorously.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will leave tomorrow for a trip of two weeks. The program for Dec. 19, 20 is as follows: Balakireff, "Thamar;" MacDowell, Piano Concerto No. 2; Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome." Leo Ornstein will be the pianist.

Boston Post Nov 29

AMERICAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Griffes' Work Pleases Audience—Miss Homer, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

An American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, made his first appearance on a Boston Symphony programme at the concert which Mr. Monteux conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a programme which will be repeated tonight. Mr. Griffes was not the first American to appear on these programmes. Nor will he be the last. But it is an important fact to note that this man, aged 35, has really produced a remarkably interesting score.

IMAGINATION LEFT FREE

The title of the work is "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kaan." The subject is of course that of Coleridge's poem. When he wrote the music, Mr. Griffes states in the programme book, he was thinking principally of the "stately pleasure-dome," the "sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice," the "miracle of rare device" . . . "The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax and then suddenly break off. There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice.'"

This is the simple programme of the piece. It is a programme simple enough not to bother anyone listening to the music who is fearful that he may be thinking of an oriental dance when the composer means him to think of "caves of ice." The imagination of the composer and the hearer are left quite free. That the composer has real imagination, feeling, and above all a sense of color is clearly shown. That he has less melodic originality at present is also evident. Who has real thematic invention at the age of 30 today? How many great composers have had it at that age? Comparatively few.

Ultra-Modern Music

Nor is Mr. Griffes' orchestration wholly original. He knows his Stravinsky, for example, extremely well. The opening is richly suggestive of the opening of "The Firebird"—the persistent tremolo replacing Stravinsky's figure work in the lower strings, short staccato chords of bassoons and piano—if the ear may be trusted—fixing the impression in the mind. The score is plainly derived from ultra-modern Russia and ultra-modern France. But with a difference. The difference is that of weak imitation and a young tone-painter with a sense of color which is inherent, rather exotic in character, and absolutely fascinating to the listener. In his mind's eye this composer sees a picture which he paints boldly. His orientalism is not a mere arpeggio for an oboe or pounding on the drum. It is the orient concieved by a young modern. And if the thematic contours of this work are not marked by great originality they are marked by life, by definite direction and at least a strong intention of form.

Above all, there is enormous spirit and contagion in the writing. Feeling this spirit of the composer, it is hard to be over-critical of sources of effects. He has, too, some effects of his own—very ingenious and striking developments of hints given him by older composers; and with all this the music is personal, individual in quality of imagination, and indicative of a broad and catholic appreciation of music of many schools.

Is Enjoyable to Hear

We maintain that this is more than enough to start with, and that it is difficult not to enjoy this transitional music of a composer of talent and of astonishing technical resource. Mr. Griffes is a man to watch with care. He is not a mere objectivist and a man of ultra-refinement in his music, like John Alden Carpenter, for example. Nor is he a man possessed of the broadly nationalistic ideals in the music of Henry Gilbert.

But he is a young American, full of spirit and receptivity, astonishingly progressive, as shown by the texture of a score of a man who was musically educated in composition in Germany; he has temperament in great abundance; he loves to write. Hence it gives one great pleasure to think that out of a sparse harvest another important American composer is coming to maturity.

Chausson's Symphony

This piece greatly pleased the audience. The opening work was Chausson's admirable symphony in B-flat, which was given a wonderful performance by Mr. Monteux. The work had never before in Boston been heard to such advantage. Never before had the solemn introduction merged so inevitably into the calmly joyous allegro. Never before had the instrumentation been so beautifully clear and transparent, nor the long flowing lines of the first theme of the allegro been done such justice. Of course, Chausson did not reach his complete development as a composer, even in this, one of his most complete works.

The symphony is principally of German classic mould, and the cyclic form imposed on the already existent mould by Cesar Frank. There is conventional development of motives in the opening movement, battledoring and shuttlecocking of fragments about, ordinary sequences, etc. But the broad, virile stride of this movement, its luminous color; the melancholy of the slow movement, the change to a spirit of hope and thankfulness, so subtly and admirably brought out by Mr. Monteux, and the brilliant finale, of a quality best exemplified by pages of Franck, made a very strong inmpression and intensified regrets that such a fine and pure musical nature as Chausson's should have met its untimely end.

Mme. Homer, gifted with a contralto voice which does not wear out, a natural simplicity and breadth of style, was heard at her best in familiar music which gave much pleasure to the audience: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "Ombra Mai Fu," otherwise known as "Largo," Handel; "Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," Verdi. She was applauded to the echo.

The concert ended with that extraordinary "Bouree Fantasque" of Chabrier, scintillatingly orchestrated by Mottl. The other music had talent. That piece has genius.

Monitor Nov 29

Chausson's noble symphony in B flat, have enlightened us as to its versatile character at least. The interpreters of this music were not equally successful. As was to be expected, Mr. Monteux, on Friday, November 28, gave a sympathetic reading of the symphony. No effects of the brilliant orchestration were lost, none of the architectural grandeur of the three movements was distorted.

The symphony was allowed to speak for itself, with all its emotional appeal. Nothing was sacrificed to effect. Here was music speaking its message unhampered by human personality thrust in between it and its hearers.

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, was given its first performance at the Symphony concert. It is an oriental fantasy conceived in the orchestral style of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the harmonic idiom of the modern French school. It is skillfully orchestrated. There are clever effects. There is a certain picturesqueness in the whole conception. It is an agreeable composition although not a startlingly original one. Mme. Homer's arias made a pleasant interlude in the Symphony program. Her excellent qualities of voice, style and diction are too well known to require further comment.

YAGER ASKS FEDERAL AID

Transcript Nov 26

GRIFFES AND HIS MUSIC

THE NEW COMPOSER AND HIS NEW PIECE

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Tone-Poem After Coleridge's Verse, for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week—Backgrounds, Incidental Circumstance and Anticipations

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will this week play a new symphonic poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, draws attention to a young American composer who, partly through natural modesty and partly because of his insistent refusal to write in an obviously popular style, has not yet won the reputation that he deserves, and that he is likely to gain in the future. Mr. Griffes was born in Elmira, N. Y., Sept. 17, 1884, and first studied the piano with Miss Mary S. Broughton in his home-town. He was later the pupil of Ernest Jedliczka and Gottfried Galston in Berlin for four years, studying composition also with Philipp Ruefer and Engelbert Humperdinck. After his return to America, he became the teacher of music at the Hackley School for Boys, at Tarrytown, where he has done most of his creative work, besides teaching independently in New York City. Among his compositions already published, or performed in public, are numerous songs and piano pieces; "The Kairn of Koridwen," a dance-drama in two scenes; "Shojo," a Japanese mimodrama; and a chorus, "These Things Shall Be," sung at the New York Community Chorus Festival of 1917. His ballet music has been produced at the Neighborhood Playhouse, as well as by Adolf Bolm and Michio Itow, for whom he has also written minor dances of exotic character. The chief interpreter of his songs has been Mme. Eva Gauthier.

Definitely modern in its technique, yet escaping the imitative emptiness into which so much of this type of American composition has fallen, the music of Mr. Griffes challenges the closest study and analysis. It is not easy material to absorb at a single hearing, but invariably there is the feeling that it is worth hearing again. His first considerable success with an audience was scored recently in New York through a "Poem" for flute and orchestra, introduced by George Barrère and the New York Symphony Society at Æolian Hall in a Sunday afternoon concert. The new composition is in keeping with the consistent seriousness of his efforts, and may well be considered his most significant contribution thus far to the literature of absolute music.

The words "absolute music" are used with some hesitation, for Mr. Griffes has in the past been definitely programmatic in his creations, and by his own confession he finds it far easier to write with some visual image in his mind, to be put, however vaguely and impressionistically, into audible form. In the case of his new "Poem," also, he admits that he intended to convey more than a merely formal design of melody and harmony, certainly more than the meretricious union between a solo instrument and its accompaniment for the glorification of the former alone. But he is unable to put his underlying idea into concrete form, and the chances are that his hearers will supply the deficiency in an amusing variety of ways.

To Walter Damrosch, who conducted the orchestra at the initial performance, Mr. Griffes' Poem seems Greek in spirit, distinctly a compliment from one who has himself experimented successfully with the production of Greek drama, and the composition of incidental music for it. To the majority of listeners, however, the predominant mood must inevitably have been Oriental, in the accepted sense, perhaps even African rather than Asiatic. The languorous minor strains which open and close the piece might equally well portray the dawn and evening of a day in the desert, or the introduction and epilogue to a sensuous harem scene, while the intervening dance rhythms could apply to sheiks and whirling dervishes as easily as to houris and experimental sultanas.

Yet one seldom writes for the flute without becoming actively pastoral in spirit, and when all the guesses have been made and all the imaginations strained, it is to a basically pastoral idea that Mr. Griffes must confess, if he is as honest as his music bespeaks him. That he has enveloped his nymphs and satyrs in the gaudier trappings of Scheherazade and her tribe is nobody's business but his own. Mr. Griffes composes naturally and involuntarily in Oriental idiom, quite as the majority of other American composers express their deepest thoughts automatically in ragtime or the melodic ballad form. Practically all of his previous work has been tinged with this exotic coloring, in particular the exceedingly interesting ballet music that he prepared for Adolf Bohn and Michio Itow, and certain strange, elusive songs of Stravinskian flavor.

Whatever pictures and impressions Mr. Griffes's poem may produce in the imagination, the fact remains that it is a remarkably well-wrought composition, dignified and serious in intention, articulate in design, and of a rare fitness for the instrument which it honors. Obviously its creator did not say, "Go to, I will write a piece for the flute." Rather did he work out of his imagination a series of tones which cried aloud for a flute to interpret them.

The instrument is given every opportunity to display its individual properties, yet never is there any suggestion of a straining for effect, or the artificial insertion of mere technique for its own sake. Both in the slow parts, where broad, mellow tones float languidly above the orchestra, and in the rapid, cleverly rhythmed passages, in climatic accelerando, with the whistling treble still piercing the accompanying hubbub, the Poem is admirably suited to the art of George Barrère, and his fine interpretation was exceedingly helpful to the favorable reaction of the entire audience, which overwhelmed both the composer and the performer with applause.

Upon the fly-leaf in the manuscript score of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" stands as clew to the music a brief quotation from Coleridge's dream-drenched, perhaps opium-drenched, poem, to wit:

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.
So twice five miles of fertile ground
With walls and towers were girdled round:
And here were gardens bright with sinuous rills,
Enfolding sunny spots of greenery.

. . . . . .

The shadow of the dome of pleasure
Floated midway on the waves;
Where was heard the mingled measure
From the fountain and the caves.
It was a miracle of rare device,
A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice!

Then follows the tone-poem, a relatively short piece written for the usual orchestra, plus a celesta and piano—"to be blended with the other instruments"—with frequent division of the strings, with occasional use of violin and oboe as solo voices. Mr. Griffes's workmanship is "ultra-modern" in the common and convenient usage of the words, evenuating in music that is an iridescent web through which occasionally pierce or flash—as it seems in a reading of the score—sharp-set and imaginative harmonies, graphic and imaginative modulations, as keen and felicitous contrasts and combinations of instrumental timbres. Mr. Griffes apparently has no taste for the thick-woven luxuriance, melodic, harmonic, instrumental, of the Wagnerian and the Straussian day. For him as for Mr. Loeffler in his later pieces and for Mr. Carpenter, a relatively thin music, ascending from brief motivs, yet of clear and plastic progress, of fine and adroit tracture, vivid with color and implication, swimming in atmosphere. Again, so far as the reading eye may gather the quality of the tone-poem, Mr. Griffes is not insistently and definitely oriental in the Russian manner. Rather, such oriental suggestion as the music may convey, is but one thread in a web which would be tapestry, like Coleridge's verse, of fantastic vision. Nor is Mr. Griffes minded to delineative progress through Coleridge's lines after the fashion of pedestrian composers. It is possible to detect in his tone-poem "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," the contrasts of "sunny pleasure-dome" with "caves of ice." No print, no diagram, however, is Mr. Griffes drawing in tones. Instead, he is transmuting into them, in his own voice and manner, a vision and an atmosphere. "You will be surprised," said Mr. Toscanini, as he invited audience trooped into the dress-rehearsal of Montemezzi's opera, "The Love of Three Kings" at the Metropolitan. "You will be surprised," Mr. Monteux might as reasonably say to his hearers, when he opens the score next Friday of "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan."

Sooner or later, the public of the Symphony Concerts will hear the pieces—a Concerto Grosso of Händel; Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar"; Dukas's overture to Corneille's play of "Polyeucte," and Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—withdrawn by Mr. Monteux to make room for a recent commemorative programme. Two of them, "Thamar" and "Salome"—blessed pair!—have been sufficiently rehearsed to be played in the impending journey of the orchestra to other cities.

Herald Nov 29

Tomorrow afternoon the seventh Symphony concert, Mr. Monteux conductor. Chausson Symphony; Griffes. The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan (first performances); Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree Fantasque. Louise Homer will sing: Beethoven, Nature's Adoration; Handel, air from "Xerxes;" Bach, My Heart Ever Faithful; Verdi, O Don Fatale, from "Don Carlos."

Boston Globe Nov 29

MME HOMER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

New American Composer Has a Brilliant Introduction

Mme Louise Homer, the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, sang four familiar numbers: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; "O, Don Fatale," Verdi, and "Ombra Mai Fu," Handel, better known as "Handel's Largo." Her choice of selections gave great pleasure to the numerous concert goers who prefer to hear over and over again numbers they have learned to like, but disappointed the seekers for novelties.

Her singing was not at its best yesterday. Her breathing was often labored and her tones sometimes forced and unsteady. Only for moments did her voice regain its old-time splendor. Her interpretations were workmanlike.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat major was superbly played. Mr Monteux excels any recent conductor the Symphony has had in music of this sort, which calls for fire and expressiveness, without sentimental emotionalism. There are moments in this symphony as good as the best of Franck, but its structure is confused rather than intricate and there are too many echoes of the moods of Wagner.

It shows great promise rather than triumphant achievement. The composer's untimely death left him, as far as the larger forms are concerned, still learning, unable to organize his fine musical material into a masterpiece.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," a piano piece orchestrated effectively by his friend Mottl after his death, is an agreeable trifle which has added little to his reputation. Mr Monteux and the orchestra made the most of it, and were well applauded for their pains.

The most significant item on the program was the first performance anywhere of a new piece by an almost unknown American composer, who is beginning of late to acquire a deservedly wide repute. Charles T. Griffes' tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Khubla Khan," is not a supreme masterpiece, but it shows genuine originality and power of a sort that entitle its composer to be judged by the same standard as men like Ravel, Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky, not by that usually applied to orchestral works by unfamiliar Americans.

It is never imitative, pedantic, bombastic nor sentimental. Few are the works of American composers which succeed in avoiding all four of these pitfalls, and in calling forth an outburst of genuine applause instead of the routine polite hand-clapping. Mr Griffes was obliged by the insistence of the audience and the friendly compulsion of Mr Monteux to come on the stage anad bow his acknowledgements.

The orchestration of this tone poem is often masterly. The piano becomes what it almost never is, an orchestral instrument instead of a more or less superfluous "added attraction." Like Berlioz and Rimsky Korsakoff, Mr Griffes proves the saying that the highest form of art is to conceal art, by gaining his effects in ways which are not immediately obvious to the listener.

Best of all, they are never effects for the sake of effects, but always subordinate to his genuine and individual creative impulse. It is to be hoped that this piece will be repeated during the present season, and others by the same composer added to the active repertory of the orchestra. This concert will be repeated tonight. There are no more Symphony concerts until Dec 19 and 20.

YAGER ASKS FEDERAL AID

Herald Nov 29

'KUBLA KHAN' AT SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives First Performance of Griffes's Fantastic Work

AUDIENCE TWICE RECALLS COMPOSER

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat major; songs with orchestra: Beethoven, Nature's Adoration; Handel, air from "Serse"; Bach, My Heart Ever Faithful; Griffes, Symphonic Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" (first performance); Verdi, O Don Fatale, from "Don Carlos"; Chabrier-Mottl, Bourree-Fantasque.

Any composer girding up his loins to turn Coleridge's "Kubla Kahn" into a vocal work, cantata or what not, would start on a perilous adventure for, to quote Swinburne, this poem is "the supreme model of music in our language." "In reading it," said the master of rhythm and verbal euphony, "we seem rapt into that paradise revealed to Swedenborg, where music and color and perfume were one, where you could hear the hues and see the harmonies of heaven." Any composer mediating a symphonic poem fully "illustrative" of "Kubla Khan," a tonal interlinear translation, would undertake a fool's task.

Mr. Griffes, born in New York state 25 years ago, wisely chose extracts from the poem, lines describing the stately pleasure-dome, "the sunny pleasure dome with caves of ice," "the miracle of rare device," the gardens and the "sunny spots of greenery." By a legitimate stretch of the imagination he hears and reproduces the sounds of revelry that might wel take place in this strange palace, mentioned first by travellers, whose description led Coleridge, dreaming, to write the fragment that is enough to make his name illustrious.

Instrumental music may add wings to even a romantically poetic flight. No one hearing this music of Mr. Griffes will feel that the poem itself has been belittled; that its splendor has been tarnished; for this composer is blessed with what is rare with American musicians, imagination. His gift of expression is pronounced. He might have been extravagant; his music might have been merely bizarre. In either case he would have incurred the reproach of affectation. He has succeeded in being musically, esthetically successfully unusual. He studied composition in Berlin; but there are no Germanisms, either orthodox or heterodox, in his style. Nor does it seem that he has worshipped too devoutly in any one of the modern Parisian chapels. If he has been influenced at all the influence is that of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, and the barbaric gorgeousness of the Russian ballet; but Mr. Griffes has decided and refreshing individuality; he has found an Oriental expression that is his own, as he has found new harmonic and orchestral colors. His "Alph, the sacred river" is not the Terek of Balakireff's "Thamar"; his measures of wild revelry are not those that Rimsky-Korsakoff heard in Sinbad's palace. The music, from the strange, unearthly opening, which at once arrests the attention, to the exquisitely fanciful ending, is fascinating throughout.

Mr. Monteux, who had taken great pains in the preparation of this remarkable composition, led a brilliant performance. Mr. Griffes was twice called upon the stage by the audience.

Would Chausson, if he had lived, have wholly escaped the influence of Wagner and Cesar Franck? The symphony is a serious work, one to be respected, with an impressive ending. The mood of the three movements is sombre without sufficient contrast. There is prevailing shade; there is little sunlight. It was a pleasure to hear after many years Mottl's skilful orchestration of Chabrier's jovial Bourree. Mottl, who admired the Frenchman and knew him well, orchestrated this Bourree in Chabrier's manner.

Mme. Homer was more fortunate in her interpretation of Verdi's aria than in her delivery of the air from Handel's "Serse" and Bach's repeated assertion that his heart was ever faithful. In Verdi's air she was appropriately dramatic with effective dynamic contrasts. The air of Handel and Bach's tune were sung merely "ore rotundo." While she was delivering the address of Xerxes to his beloved plane tree as if the monarch had been thundering a command at his huge army, or storming at Mount Athos, we wondered where the story about this affection was first told. We read in one of Dr. Donne's Elegies:

Xerxes' strange Lydian love, the platane tree,
Was loved for age, none being so large as she;

but Pliny, noting the affection entertained by Dionysius, the Sicilian King, by Licinius Mutianus, thrice consul, and by the Emperor Caligula, for the plane tree, says nothing about the passion of Xerxes. Was Herodotus the first? He tells about Xerxes passing by the Lydian city of Callatebus. On the way the King "met with a plane tree, which on account of its beauty, he presented with golden ornaments."

The audience, liking Mme. Homer's robust singing of the Handelian air—Caffarelli, the first to sing it, was praised for his "majestic style," but majestic and robust are not synonymous terms—and also recognizing the familiar "Largo," applauded the singer vigorously.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will leave tomorrow for a trip of two weeks. The program for Dec. 19, 20 is as follows: Balakireff, "Thamar;" MacDowell, Piano Concerto No. 2; Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome." Leo Ornstein will be the pianist.

Boston Post Nov 29

AMERICAN MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Griffes' Work Pleases Audience—Miss Homer, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

An American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, made his first appearance on a Boston Symphony programme at the concert which Mr. Monteux conducted yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, a programme which will be repeated tonight. Mr. Griffes was not the first American to appear on these programmes. Nor will he be the last. Nor will he be the greatest. But it is an important fact to note that this man, aged 35, has really produced a remarkably interesting score.

IMAGINATION LEFT FREE

The title of the work is "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kaan." The subject is of course that of Coleridge's poem. When he wrote the music, Mr. Griffes states in the programme book, he was thinking principally of the "stately pleasure-dome," the "sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice," the "miracle of rare device" . . . "The gardens with fountains and 'sunny spots of greenery' are next suggested. From inside come sounds of dancing and revelry which increase to a wild climax and then suddenly break off. 'There is a return to the original mood suggesting the sacred river and the 'caves of ice.'"

This is the simple programme of the piece. It is a programme simple enough not to bother anyone listening to the music who is fearful that he may be thinking of an oriental dance when the composer means him to think of "caves of ice." The imagination of the composer and the hearer are left quite free. That the composer has real imagination, feeling, and, above all a sense of color is clearly shown. That he has less melodic originality at present is also evident. Who has real thematic invention at the age of 30 today? How many great composers have had it at that age? Comparatively few.

Ultra-Modern Music

Nor is Mr. Griffes' orchestration wholly original. He knows his Stravinsky, for example, extremely well. The opening is richly suggestive of the opening of "The Firebird"—the persistent tremolo replacing Stravinsky's figure work in the lower strings, short staccato chords of bassoons and piano—if the ear may be trusted—fixing the impression in the mind. The score is plainly derived from ultra-modern Russia and ultra-modern France. But with a difference. The difference is that of weak imitation and a young tone-painter with a sense of color which is inherent, rather exotic in character, and absolutely fascinating to the listener. In his mind's eye this composer sees a picture which he paints boldly. His orientalism is not a mere arpeggio for an oboe or pounding on the drum. It is the orient conceived by a young modern. And if the thematic contours of this work are not marked by great originality they are marked by life, by definite direction and at least a strong intention of form.

Above all, there is enormous spirit and contagion in the writing. Feeling this spirit of the composer, it is hard to be over-critical of sources of effects. He has, too, some effects of his own—very ingenious and striking developments of hints given him by older composers; and with all this the music is personal, individual in quality of imagination, and indicative of a broad and catholic appreciation of music of many schools.

Is Enjoyable to Hear

We maintain that this is more than enough to start with, and that it is difficult not to enjoy this transitional music of a composer of talent and of astonishing technical resource. Mr. Griffes is a man to watch with care. He is not a mere objectivist and a man of ultra-refinement in his music, like John Alden Carpenter, for example. Nor is he a man possessed of the broadly nationalistic ideals in the music of Henry Gilbert.

But he is a young American, full of spirit and receptivity, astonishingly progressive, as shown by the texture of a score of a man who was musically educated in composition in Germany; he has temperament in great abundance; he loves to write. Hence it gives one great pleasure to think that out of a sparse harvest another important American composer is coming to maturity.

Chausson's Symphony

This piece greatly pleased the audience. The opening work was Chausson's admirable symphony in B-flat, which was given a wonderful performance by Mr. Monteux. The work had never before in Boston been heard to such advantage. Never before had the solemn introduction merged so inevitably into the calmly joyous allegro. Never before had the instrumentation been so beautifully clear and transparent, nor the long flowing lines of the first theme of the allegro been done such justice. Of course, Chausson did not reach his complete development as a composer, even in this, one of his most complete works.

The symphony is principally of German classic mould, and the cyclic form imposed on the already existent mould by Cesar Frank. There is conventional development of motives in the opening movement, battledoring and shuttlecocking of fragments about, ordinary sequences, etc. But the broad, virile stride of this movement, its luminous color; the melancholy of the slow movement, the change to a spirit of hope and thankfulness, so subtly and admirably brought out by Mr. Monteux, and the brilliant finale, of a quality best exemplified by pages of Franck, made a very strong inmpression and intensified regrets that such a fine and pure musical nature as Chausson's should have met its untimely end.

Mme. Homer, gifted with a contralto voice which does not wear out, a natural simplicity and breadth of style, was heard at her best in familiar music which gave much pleasure to the audience: "Nature's Adoration," Beethoven; "Ombra Mai Fu," otherwise known as "Largo," Handel; "Heart Ever Faithful," Bach; aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," Verdi. She was applauded to the echo.

The concert ended with that extraordinary "Bouree Fantasque" of Chabrier, scintillatingly orchestrated by Mottl. The other music had talent. That piece has genius.

Herald Nov 29

Chausson's noble symphony in B flat, have enlightened us as to its versatile character at least. The interpreters of this music were not equally successful. As was to be expected, Mr. Monteux, on Friday, November 28, gave a sympathetic reading of the symphony. No effects of the brilliant orchestration were lost, none of the architectural grandeur of the three movements was distorted.

The symphony was allowed to speak for itself, with all its emotional appeal. Nothing was sacrificed to effect. Here was music speaking its message unhampered by human personality thrust in between it and its hearers.

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, was given its first performance at the Symphony concert. It is an oriental fantasy conceived in the orchestral style of Rimsky-Korsakoff and the harmonic idiom of the modern French school. It is skillfully orchestrated. There are clever effects. There is a certain picturesqueness in the whole conception. It is an agreeable composition although not a startlingly original one. Mme. Homer's arias made a pleasant interlude in the Symphony program. Her excellent qualities of voice, style and diction are too well known to require further comment.

Plays and Concerts

Voice of the Orient: Means of the Occident

C. T. Griffes

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Was Played for the First Times at the Current Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A NOTABLE NEW PIECE FROM MR. GRIFFES

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Discloses No Routine or Insignificant Composer — Music of Mind, Imagination, Skill and Individuality — Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" Disappointingly Revived—Chausson's Grave Greek Symphony and Interludes of Song from Mme. Homer

OUR grave and reverend Bostonian composers, for the most part well forward in middle age, rise with dignity from their places in Symphony Hall and bow solemnly to the applauding audience welcoming and rewarding new pieces from their hands. Not so in like circumstance the younger and sprightlier souls that in turn have fetched their music from New York or from Chicago for the Symphony Orchestra to play. Frankly pleased they skip through corridor and ante-room to the stage, smilingly stride it, beam acknowledgement to all and sundry, shake the conductor's hand, receive also his congratulations. So did Mr. Carpenter in a business jacket (as the tailors say) when his symphony was played for the first time in Boston in the spring of 1918; and so yesterday afternoon did Mr. Griffes, likewise in a business jacket, when his tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," was played for the first time anywhere. It was good to hear the listeners applauding warmly the music of a youthful and little-known composer because it had manifestly pleased and impressed them. It was as good to see him honestly pleasured by such fortune. Though the Symphony Concerts are public functions in Boston and in New England, they can, on occasion, be agreeably human. They were yesterday—and the oftener the better.

Mr. Griffes's music, moreover, clearly deserved such reward. His tone-poem is a brief piece, since Wagnerian and Straussian lengths are out of the fashion with the younger composers the world over. By the same token, it is also laudably concentrated in a mingled economy and astuteness of means. Following suggestions from Coleridge's prompting verse, "The Pleasure-Dome" falls readily into successive sections—the introduction visualizing, as it were, the site and the prospect,

> Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
> Through caverns measureless to man
> Down to a sunless sea;

the second division, wherein the dome rises, so to say, upon the tonal ear and eye, set about with garden and fountain, wall and tower, scent-breathing forest and smiling meadow; the third division, wholly of Mr. Griffes's invention, in which the murmur of revelry within rises to festal clang; the end as in wan echo of "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," and wan fading of the vision—"a sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice."

Throughout hardly a measure seems to be "filling"; while not a modulation, a progression, a play of harmony or timbre fails to do its office. There are discernible motivs whence the tonal fabric springs; as in the music of Debussy a rhythmic continuity seems to bind the whole together; but there is no "development" in the old fashion for "development's" sake. No more is there any juggling with harmonic and instrumental color as feat of resource and agility which is the newer mode. Mr. Griffes perceives clearly the form in which he would cast his tone-poem, the design which he would unfold, the visions he would summon. With surety, with economy, he chooses and applies his means to those ends. Everywhere the outcome is clear, the impression tense, the atmosphere sustained, the illusion compassed. So to compose is to compose with a mind that discerns, sorts, controls. It is a rare, a precious possession for a composer still in relative youth.

Mr. Griffes also composes with imagination. It is not necessary to have ridden the Arizona deserts at dawn when a gray and misty solitude trembles into iridescence, when sand and summit, cliff and canyon, shimmer into fantastic shapes and color, when the pulse of expectancy seems to beat in the very air, to find in the composer's preluding like insistent quiver of mystery into light, of a void into sheen and substance. Only not in Arizona but in an oriental Xanadu, Mr. Griffes lays the tone-scene. His means are the means of the composers of this, our fortunate day—thin strands, reiterated rhythms, shadowy harmonies, dusky instrumental colors tremulously tinging brighter. No mere mechanics mixes, manipulates them. (Recall the haunting piano part!) The harmonic mist clear; and then rises the "pleasure-dome" in music of firmer line, opener texture, glinting, glamourous, sun-shot and heavy dream-drenched still. But life stirs in the visioning. Though it be dawn, they feast within the dome. The music opens in oriental interval, beats to oriental rhythm, is languorous or pungent with oriental color. The clang sharpens; the climax pierces. It is as though upon the instant the dome—and the vision—were shattered. "The mingled measure" tinkles ghostly. As into the caves of ice, the music shivers into silence. Here and there, the tonal revelry has fallen into routine—for half a moment, but the end is tonal magic again. Music of a mind at every turn of the facture, music of imagery at almost every turn of the illusion, music throughout of a talent and a temperament taking their own visioning and expressing way, music unlike that of any other American composer, yet uncommonly vivid in immediate impression. Mr. Griffes has done well to wait until the mistrustful conductors were ready to accept him. Neither an audience in New York over the "Poem for Flute" nor an audience in Boston over "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" has mistrusted at all.

Another orchestral number of the day has gone so long unplayed at the Symphony Concerts that it sounded almost new—Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," as brief as "The Pleasure-Dome," but, in contrast, somewhat disappointing in outcome. It was human nature and this was an uncommonly human Symphony Concert—to expect another "España" and to be chilled when no such music emerged. Possibly, had Chabrier himself originally written the Bourrée for orchestra, he would have clothed it in like glowing colors and whipped it into like seething rhythms. He, however, was content with it as piano-piece; and not until after his death did his friend, Mottl, the illustrious conductor of Carlsruhe and Munich, so transform it.

Mottl was practiced in orchestral resource and device; he had acquired in degree harmonic and instrumental imagination. He did the good job of an expert friend when he scored the Bourrée, but perhaps he discovered, as did many a hearer yesterday, that the two motivs whence it springs are no flaming, prancing Spanish measures; that the rhythmic possibilities are limited; that not always was Chabrier's fantasy a devouring fire. As has been said, Mottl did a good job; so also did Mr. Monteux and the orchestra; so originally did Chabrier himself. There are agreeable contrasts between the animated and the wistful divisions of the piece; the dance rhythm pleases, the orchestral voices "sound"—and that is all.

To the Parisian nineties, Mr. Monteux went also for the symphony of the afternoon—Chausson's, first brought into the repertory by Mr. Gericke, restored again to it by Dr. Muck. Chausson was a pupil of Franck; dwelt and worked in a Franckian circle; followed the Franckian formulas as in this very symphony; fell now and then inarticulate when he would speak in tones. No wonder, then, that in various measures he let good Father Franck speak for him. Chausson's composing day was the day in which the Wagnerian tide was sweeping into France and deep in it were swimming some of his compeers. At times in his music-making Chausson groped to find the way. No wonder, again, that at such haltings of his symphony he let Wagnerian procedures clear the path. Admit also that once and again they also left him groping. Agree finally that Mr. Monteux was too heavy-handed in performance, that he obscured outline in too solid, too square-cut masses of tone; that he thickened and shadowed where he might have thinned and illuminated; that an insistent intensity of expression was everywhere his quest. None the less the symphony remained a music of finely chiselled contours of delicate ornament, of sober and symmetrical progress, a frieze-like music were it not that exaltation often warms and passions it. Throughout it speaks noble of the composer's soul.

Frieze-like indeed is the introduction gravely carved against a pale, fine-lined harmonic background, like to a fresco of Puvis de Chavannes. Then warmth enters or less warmth than luminosity; for the successing division swims in the clear cool light of autumn sunshine and autumn air. There are zest, exhilaration in the music, but once and again melancholy tinges and shadows it; while always the emotion is akin to a grave and tranquil happiness. If it is joy that Chausson would paint in tones, then he paints with the serenity of classic painters. Again it is as though Chavannes were working in the medium of music. True, when Chausson would make an opera, he sought his subject-matter in romantic Arthurian legend; true, his familiar Poem for violin and orchestra seems clearly a romantic music. Yet the second movement of his symphony, surely the voice or woe, is or the woe that Antigone bore on her young shoulders within her black mantle when she went forth to death condemned.

Here is no music of Wagnerian frenzies, disposed as Mr. Monteux was to play it so; no more is it music of Franckian despairs, intimate, personal. Rather it is lofty, solitary, remote, a sorrow-stricken music of Greek tragedy, of the Sophocles of this Antigone. So again with the finale. Overdrive it as Mr. Monteux did, he could not make the end ascend to elation. Rather the choral-like progress halted in sublime calm, in the seats of the happy immortals. No; the Wagnerian, the Franckian similitudes in Chausson's symphony are relatively accidental. Rather he wrote in the nineties in Paris a symphony that gains the Sophoclean beauty of mood and progress, the Sophoclean symmetry of outline and fineness of detail; the Sophoclean purity of passion. As Chausson wrought in his music, so, in his own time, Puvis de Chavannes wrought in his frescoes. Years ago, as it now seems, Mr. Gericke, better divining than Mr. Monteux, played Chausson's symphony in such voice and said that from d'Indy he had taken cue. Yesterday in spite of a very different reading the Greek impression persisted.

And there were interludes of song, sure to mar the symmetry of a symphony concert, but sure also to pleasure the audience. Mme. Homer provided them with three pieces she had sung of old at these very concerts—the air from Händel's opera, "Xerxes," universally known as his Largo from which sentimental transcription the singer bore sundry measures into the accompaniment; an air, "My Heart Ever Faithful" from a cantata of Bach; and a soliloquy of the opera house, the Princess Eboli's "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." For newer matter she added Beethoven's hymn "The Heavens Are Telling." Beethoven she sang lamely; Händel too amply; Bach haltingly; Verdi with force and thrill of the theatre. Becomingly Mr. Monteux accompanied her. Great was the joy of their hearers. With them Mme. Homer's singing is institutional, even when a hint, at least, of thinness, a suspicion of stridency, a momentary shortness of breath, now and then cross tones that were once richer, if less pliant than they are today. Relentless fleet the years.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

PLENTEOUS GRIST FROM A BUSY WEEK-END

Mr. Griffes's New Tone-Poem Again Warmly Received — The Contrasting Chausson — Old Masterpieces of Palestrina from the Vatican Choir — Mr. Maier's Auspicious Experiment for Children—Miss Hempel in Familiar Glories of Voice and Song—The Flonzaleys' Discovery — Mr. Kreisler's Course — Programmes in Prospect

IN measure a prepared audience, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, heard Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and applauded it no less warmly than did the listeners of Friday. Again, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played the piece adeptly and revealingly; again, the composer, justly and obviously pleasured, informally acknowledged the plaudits. A second hearing, moreover, affirmed the merits of his music and disclosed no material shortcoming. Possibly the measures of the fête within the dome are more conventional in design than the tone-picturing of the beginning and the end, but there are ample amends in Mr. Griffe's imaginative, individual and subtle play with harmonic color and instrumental stroke, especially in the vivid use of single and, for the instant, outstanding voices. Once again, the tone-poem was most graphic in the preluding out of which rises the fantastical palace and in the finale within which it sinks, so to say, from aural view. Ravel, Debussy, the new Italians, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Carpenter—to summon other and more familiar "modernists"—can boast few passages so subtle of workmanship yet so direct of image as the measures in which Mr. Griffes sets the basses, the piano and a wood-wind or two to the conjuring of misty and expectant vision at the beginning of his piece, while there is as equal and swift a magic in the wan effacement of the close. In both, beyond peradventure, a composer of imagination, alike with ends and means, stood clearly revealed. They are not many in American or any other music.

Mr. Griffes is "modernist" in particular in the open texture, the fine strands, the incisive voice of his music, qualities that seemed the more salient in comparison with the ways of Chausson in the preceding symphony. Twenty years ago, when it was written, Chausson also passed for a modernist, in part because he wrote in the luxuriant harmonies, the thick-voiced instrumentation, the full bodied tonal fabric which the example of Wagner was then enjoining upon music the world around. How opaque the earlier Parisian's music seemed on Saturday beside the present American's clarity. How superfluously insistent and heavy-handed this Chausson beside Mr. Griffes of the apt means and the keen, fine stroke. The "modernist" of the nineties—for Chausson was accounted such—uppiled his expressive resources, strove with them; whereas the "modernist" of our day was economical, precise, sure-fingered. The musical times do change and composers and hearers change with them—forward. Only such verve of rhythm, glow of color and ardor of progress as Chabrier and Mottl fling over the surface of their "Bourrée Fantasque"—brilliancy for the sake of brilliancy—may survive the intervening years, the new fashions.

Palestrina ...

GRIFFES WORK IS APPLAUDED AT SYMPHONY

The first presentation of Charles T. Griffes's "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" was the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. An American work by a composer just 35, on a Symphony program! Surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra is progressing. The number is decidedly interesting and particularly promising when one considers Mr. Griffes's youth. It afforded such pleasure the composer was twice called to the stage to acknowlede the tribute.

Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist of the afternoon, delighted all with her fine singing, particularly the air from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The audience did its best to get an extra but extras are barred at these concerts.

Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading of the Chausson symphony and was deservedly recalled to the stage at its close.

Plays and Concerts

Voice of the Orient: Means of the Occident

C. T. Griffes

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Was Played for the First Times at the Current Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A NOTABLE NEW PIECE FROM MR. GRIFFES

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Discloses No Routine or Insignificant Composer — Music of Mind, Imagination, Skill and Individuality — Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" Disappointingly Revived—Chausson's Grave Greek Symphony and Interludes of Song from Mme. Homer

Out grave and reverend Bostonian composers, for the most part well forward in middle age, rise with dignity from their places in Symphony Hall and bow solemnly to the applauding audience welcoming and rewarding new pieces from their hands. Not so in like circumstance the younger and sprightlier souls that in turn have fetched their music from New York or from Chicago for the Symphony Orchestra to play. Frankly pleased they skip through corridor and ante-room to the stage, smilingly stride it, beam acknowledgement to all and sundry, shake the conductor's hand, receive also his congratulations. So did Mr. Carpenter in a business jacket (as the tailors say) when his symphony was played for the first time in Boston in the spring of 1918; and so yesterday afternoon did Mr. Griffes, likewise in a business jacket, when his tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," was played for the first time anywhere. It was good to hear the listeners applauding warmly the music of a youthful and little-known composer because it had manifestly pleased and impressed them! It was as good to see him honestly pleasured by such fortune. Though the Symphony Concerts are public functions in Boston and in New England, they can, on occasion, be agreeably human. They were yesterday—and the oftener the better.

Mr. Griffes's music, moreover, clearly deserved such reward. His tone-poem is a brief piece, since Wagnerian and Straussian lengths are out of the fashion with the younger composers the world over. By the same token, it is also laudably concentrated in a mingled economy and astuteness of means. Following suggestions from Coleridge's prompting verse, "The Pleasure-Dome" falls readily into successive sections—the introduction ,visualizing, as it were, the site and the prospect.

> Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
> Through caverns measureless to man
> Down to a sunless sea;

the second division, wherein the dome rises, so to say, upon the tonal ear and eye, set about with garden and fountain, wall and tower, scent-breathing forest and smiling meadow; the third division, wholly of Mr. Griffes's invention, in which the murmur of revelry within rises to festal clang; the end as in wan echo of "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," and wan fading of the vision—"a sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice."

Throughout hardly a measure seems to be "filling"; while not a modulation, a progression, a play of harmony or timbre fails to do its office. There are discernible motivs whence the tonal fabric springs; as in the music of Debussy a rhythmic continuity seems to bind the whole together; but there is no "development" in the old fashion for "development's" sake. No more is there any juggling with harmonic and instrumental color as feat of resource and agility which is the newer mode. Mr. Griffes perceives clearly the form in which he would cast his tone-poem, the design which he would unfold, the visions he would summon. With surety, with economy, he chooses and applies his means to those ends. Everywhere the outcome is clear, the impression tense, the atmosphere sustained, the illusion compassed. So to compose is to compose with a mind that discerns, sorts, controls. It is a rare, a precious possession for a composer still in relative youth.

Mr. Griffes also composes with imagination. It is not necessary to have ridden the Arizona deserts at dawn when a gray and misty solitude trembles into iridescence, when sand and summit, cliff and canyon, shimmer into fantastic shapes and color, when the pulse of expectancy seems to beat in the very air, to find in the composer's preluding like insistent quiver of mystery into light, of a void into sheen and substance. Only not in Arizona but in an oriental Xanadu, Mr. Griffes lays the tone-scene. His means are the means of the composers of this, our fortunate day—thin strands, reiterated rhythms, shadowy harmonies, dusky instrumental colors tremulously tinging brighter. No mere mechanics mixes, manipulates them. (Recall the haunting piano part!) The harmonic mist clear; and then rises the "pleasure-dome" in music of firmer line, opener texture, glinting, glamourous, sun-shot and heavy dream-drenched still. But life stirs in the visioning. Though it be dawn, they feast within the dome. The music opens in oriental interval, beats to oriental rhythm, is languorous or pungent with oriental color. The clang sharpens; the climax pierces. It is as though upon the instant the dome—and the vision—were shattered. "The mingled measure" tinkles ghostly. As into the caves of ice, the music shivers into silence. Here and there, the tonal revelry has fallen into routine—for half a moment, but the end is tonal magic again. Music of a mind at every turn of the facture, music of imagery at almost every turn of the illusion, music throughout of a talent and a temperament taking their own visioning and expressing way, music unlike that of any other American composer, yet uncommonly vivid in immediate impression. Mr. Griffes has done well to wait until the mistrustful conductors were ready to accept him. Neither an audience in New York over the "Poem for Flute" nor an audience in Boston over "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" has mistrusted at all.

Another orchestral number of the day has gone so long unplayed at the Symphony Concerts that it sounded almost new—Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," as brief as "The Pleasure-Dome," but, in contrast, somewhat disappointing in outcome. It was human nature and this was an uncommonly human Symphony Concert—to expect another "España" and to be chilled when no such music emerged. Possibly, had Chabrier himself originally written the Bourrée for orchestra, he would have clothed it in like glowing colors and whipped it into like seething rhythms. He, however, was content with it as piano-piece; and not until after his death did his friend, Mottl, the illustrious conductor of Carlsruhe and Munich, so transform it.

Mottl was practiced in orchestral resource and device; he had acquired in degree harmonic and instrumental imagination. He did the good job of an expert friend when he scored the Bourrée, but perhaps he discovered, as did many a hearer yesterday, that the two motivs whence it springs are no flaming, prancing Spanish measures; that the rhythmic possibilities are limited; that not always was Chabrier's fantasy a devouring fire. As has been said, Mottl did a good job; so also did Mr. Monteux and the orchestra; so originally did Chabrier himself. There are agreeable contrasts between the animated and the wistful divisions of the piece; the dance rhythm pleases, the orchestral voices "sound"—and that is all.

To the Parisian nineties, Mr. Monteux went also for the symphony of the afternoon—Chausson's, first brought into the repertory by Mr. Gericke, restored again to it by Dr. Muck. Chausson was a pupil of Franck; dwelt and worked in a Franckian circle; followed the Franckian formulas as in this very symphony; fell now and then inarticulate when he would speak in tones. No wonder, then, that in various measures he let good Father Franck speak for him. Chausson's composing day was the day in which the Wagnerian tide was sweeping into France and deep in it were swimming some of his compeers. At times in his music-making Chausson groped to find the way. No wonder, again, that at such haltings of his symphony he let Wagnerian procedures clear the path. Admit also that once and again they also left him groping. Agree finally that Mr. Monteux was too heavy-handed in performance, that he obscured outline in too solid, too square-cut masses of tone; that he thickened and shadowed where he might have thinned and illuminated; that an insistent intensity of expression was everywhere his quest. None the less the symphony remained a music of finely chiselled contours of delicate ornament, of sober and symmetrical progress, a frieze-like music were it not that exaltation often warms and passions it. Throughout it speaks nobly of the composer's soul.

Frieze-like indeed is the introduction gravely carved against a pale, fine-lined harmonic background, like to a fresco of Puvis de Chavannes. Then warmth enters or less warmth than luminosity; for the succesing division swims in the clear cool light of autumn sunshine and autumn air. There are zest, exhilaration in the music, but once and again melancholy tinges and shadows it; while always the emotion is akin to a grave and tranquil happiness. If it is joy that Chausson would paint in tones, then he paints with the serenity of classic painters. Again it is as though Chavannes were working in the medium of music. True, when Chausson would make an opera, he sought his subject-matter in romantic Arthurian legend; true, his familiar Poem for violin and orchestra seems clearly a romantic music. Yet the second movement of his symphony, surely the voice or woe, is or the woe that Antigone bore on her young shoulders within her black mantle when she went forth to death condemned.

Here is no music of Wagnerian frenzies, disposed as Mr. Monteux was to play it so; no more is it music of Franckian despairs, intimate, personal. Rather it is lofty, solitary, remote, a sorrow-stricken music of Greek tragedy, of the Sophocles of this Antigone. So again with the finale. Overdrive it as Mr. Monteux did, he could not make the end ascend to elation. Rather the choral-like progress halted in sum calm, in the seats of the happy immor No; the Wagnerian, the Franckian simil tudes in Chausson's symphony are relatively accidental. Rather he wrote in the nineties in Paris a symphony that gains the Sophoclean beauty of mood and progress, the Sophoclean symmetry of outline and fineness of detail; the Sophoclean purity of passion. As Chausson wrought in his music, so, in his own time, Puvis de Chavannes wrought in his frescoes. Years ago, as it now seems, Mr. Gericke, better divining than Mr. Monteux, played Chausson's symphony in such voice and said that from d'Indy he had taken cue. Yesterday in spite of a very different reading the Greek impression persisted.

And there were interludes of song, sure to mar the symmetry of a symphony concert, but sure also to pleasure the audience. Mme. Homer provided them with three pieces she had sung of old at these very concerts—the air from Händel's Xerxes," universally known as his Largo from which sentimental transcription the singer bore sundry measures into the accompaniment; an air, "My Heart Ever Faithful" from a cantata of Bach; and a soliloquy of the opera house, the Princess Eboli's "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." For newer matter she added Beethoven's hymn "The Heavens Are Telling." Beethoven she sang largely; Händel too amply; Bach haltingly; Verdi with force and thrill of the theatre. Becomingly Mr. Monteux accompanied her. Great was the joy of their hearers. With them Mme. Homer's singing is institutional, even when a hint, at least, of thinness, a suspicion of stridency, a momentary shortness of breath, now and then cross tones that were once richer, if less pliant than they are today. Relentless fleet the years.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

PLENTEOUS GRIST FROM A BUSY WEEK-END

Mr. Griffes's New Tone-Poem Again Warmly Received — The Contrasting Chausson — Old Masterpieces of Palestrina from the Vatican Choir — Mr. Maier's Auspicious Experiment for Children—Miss Hempel in Familiar Glories of Voice and Song—The Flonzaleys' Discovery — Mr. Kreisler's Course — Programmes in Prospect

In measure a prepared audience, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, heard Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and applauded it no less warmly than did the listeners of Friday. Again, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played the piece adeptly and revealingly; again, the composer, justly and obviously pleasured, informally acknowledged the plaudits. A second hearing, moreover, affirmed the merits of his music and disclosed no material shortcoming. Possibly the measures of the fête within the dome are more conventional in design than the tone-picturing of the beginning and the end, but there are ample amends in Mr. Griffe's imaginative, individual and subtle play with harmonic color and instrumental stroke, especially in the vivid use of single and, for the instant, outstanding voices. Once again, the tone-poem was most graphic in the preluding out of which rises the fantastical palace and in the finale within which it sinks, so to say, from aural view. Ravel, Debussy, the new Italians, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Carpenter—to summon other and more familiar "modernists"—can boast few passages so subtle of workmanship yet so direct of image as the measures in which Mr. Griffes sets the basses, the piano and a wood-wind or two to the conjuring of misty and expectant vision at the beginning of his piece, while there is as equal and swift a magic in the wan effacement of the close. In both, beyond peradventure, a composer of imagination, alike with ends and means, stood clearly revealed. They are not many in American or any other music.

Mr. Griffes is "modernist" in particular in the open texture, the fine strands, the incisive voice of his music, qualities that seemed the more salient in comparison with the ways of Chausson in the preceding symphony. Twenty years ago, when it was written, Chausson also passed for a modernist, in part because he wrote in the luxuriant harmonies, the thick-voiced instrumentation, the full bodied tonal fabric which the example of Wagner was then enjoining upon music the world around. How opaque the earlier Parisian's music seemed on Saturday beside the present American's clarity. How superfluously insistent and heavy-handed this Chausson beside Mr. Griffes of the apt means and the keen, fine stroke. The "modernist" of the nineties—for Chausson was accounted such—uppiled his expressive resources, strove with them; whereas the "modernist" of our day was economical, precise, sure-fingered. The musical times do change and composers and hearers change with them—forward. Only such verve of rhythm, glow of color and ardor of progress as Chabrier and Mottl fling over the surface of their "Bourrée Fantasque"—brilliancy for the sake of brilliancy—may survive the intervening years, the new fashions.

GRIFFES WORK IS APPLAUDED AT SYMPHONY

The first presentation of Charles T. Griffes's "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" was the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. An American work by a composer just 35, on a Symphony program! Surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra is progressing. The number is decidedly interesting and particularly promising when one considers Mr. Griffes's youth. It afforded such pleasure the composer was twice called to the stage to acknowlede the tribute.

Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist of the afternoon, delighted all with her fine singing, particularly the air from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The audience did its best to get an extra but extras are barred at these concerts.

Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading of the Chausson symphony and was deservedly recalled to the stage at its close.

Plays and Concerts

Voice of the Orient: Means of the Occident

C. T. Griffes

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Was Played for the First Times at the Current Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NOTABLE NEW PIECE FROM MR. GRIFFES

The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Discloses No Routine or Insignificant Composer — Music of Mind, Imagination, Skill and Individuality — Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" Disappointingly Revived—Chausson's Grave Greek Symphony and Interludes of Song from Mme. Homer

Our grave and reverend Bostonian composers, for the most part well forward in middle age, rise with dignity from their places in Symphony Hall and bow solemnly to the applauding audience welcoming and rewarding new pieces from their hands. Not so the like circumstance the younger and brightlier souls that in turn have fetched their music from New York or from Chicago for the Symphony Orchestra to play. Frankly pleased they skip through corridor and ante-room to the stage, smilingly stride it, beam acknowledgement to all and sundry, shake the conductor's hand, receive also his congratulations. So did Mr. Carpenter in a business jacket (as the tailors say) when his symphony was played for the first time in Boston in the spring of 1918; and so yesterday afternoon did Mr. Griffes, likewise in a business jacket, when his tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," was played for the first time anywhere. It was good to hear the listeners applauding warmly the music of a youthful and little-known composer because it had manifestly pleased and impressed them. It was as good to see him honestly pleasured by such fortune. Though the Symphony Concerts are public functions in Boston and in New England, they can, on occasion, be agreeably human. They were yesterday—and the oftener the better.

Mr. Griffes's music, moreover, clearly deserved such reward. His tone-poem is a brief piece, since Wagnerian and Straussian lengths are out of the fashion with the younger composers the world over. By the same token, it is also laudably concentrated in a mingled economy and astuteness of means. Following suggestions from Coleridge's prompting verse, "The Pleasure-Dome" falls readily into successive sections—the introduction visualizing, as it were, the site and the prospect,

> Where Alph, the sacred river, ran
> Through caverns measureless to man
> Down to a sunless sea;

the second division, wherein the dome rises, so to say, upon the tonal ear and eye, set about with garden and fountain, wall and tower, scent-breathing forest and smiling meadow; the third division, wholly of Mr. Griffes's invention, in which the murmur of revelry within rises to festal clang; the end as in wan echo of "the mingled measure from the fountain and the caves," and wan fading of the vision—"a sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice."

Throughout hardly a measure seems to be "filling"; while not a modulation, a progression, a play of harmony or timbre fails to do its office. There are discernible motivs whence the tonal fabric springs; as in the music of Debussy a rhythmic continuity seems to bind the whole together; but there is no "development" in the old fashion for "development's" sake. No more is there any juggling with harmonic and instrumental color as feat of resource and agility which is the newer mode. Mr. Griffes perceives clearly the form in which he would cast his tone-poem, the design which he would unfold, the visions he would summon. With surety, with economy, he chooses and applies his means to those ends. Everywhere the outcome is clear, the impression tense, the atmosphere sustained, the illusion compassed. So to compose is to compose with a mind that discerns, sorts, controls. It is a rare, a precious possession for a composer still in relative youth.

Mr. Griffes also composes with imagination. It is not necessary to have ridden the Arizona deserts at dawn when a gray and misty solitude trembles into iridescence, when sand and summit, cliff and canyon, shimmer into fantastic shapes and color, when the pulse of expectancy seems to beat in the very air, to find in the composer's preluding like insistent quiver of mystery into light, of a void into sheen and substance. Only not in Arizona but in a oriental Xanadu, Mr. Griffes lays the tone-scene. His means are the means of the composers of this, our fortunate day—thin strands, reiterated rhythms, shadowy harmonies, dusky instrumental colors tremulously tinging brighter. No mere mechanics mixes, manipulates them. (Recall the haunting piano part!) The harmonic mist clear; and then rises the "pleasure-dome" in music of firmer line, opener texture, glinting, glamourous, sun-shot and heavy dream-drenched still. But life stirs in the visioning. Though it be dawn, they feast within the dome. The music opens in oriental interval, beats to oriental rhythm, is languorous or pungent with oriental color. The clang sharpens; the climax pierces. It is as though upon the instant the dome—and the vision—were shattered. "The mingled measure" tinkles ghostly. As into the caves of ice, the music shivers into silence. Here and there, the tonal revelry has fallen into routine—for half a moment, but the end is tonal magic again. Music of a mind at every turn of the facture, music of imagery at almost every turn of the illusion, music throughout of a talent and a temperament taking their own visioning and expressing way, music unlike that of any other American composer, yet uncommonly vivid in immediate impression. Mr. Griffes has done well to wait until the mistrustful conductors were ready to accept him. Neither an audience in New York over the "Poem for Flute" nor an audience in Boston over "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" has mistrusted at all.

Another orchestral number of the day has gone so long unplayed at the Symphony Concerts that it sounded almost new—Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," as brief as "The Pleasure-Dome," but, in contrast, somewhat disappointing in outcome. It was human nature and this was an uncommonly human Symphony Concert—to expect another "España" and to be chilled when no such music emerged. Possibly, had Chabrier himself originally written the Bourrée for orchestra, he would have clothed it in like glowing colors and whipped it into like seething rhythms. He, however, was content with it as piano-piece; and not until after his death did his friend, Mottl, the illustrious conductor of Carlsruhe and Munich, so transform it.

Mottl was practiced in orchestral resource and device; he had acquired in degree harmonic and instrumental imagination. He did the good job of an expert friend when he scored the Bourrée, but perhaps he discovered, as did many a hearer yesterday, that the two motivs whence it springs are no flaming, prancing Spanish measures; that the rhythmic possibilities are limited; that not always was Chabrier's fantasy a devouring fire. As has been said, Mottl did a good job; so also did Mr. Monteux and the orchestra; so originally did Chabrier himself. There are agreeable contrasts between the animated and the wistful divisions of the piece; the dance rhythm pleases, the orchestral voices "sound"—and that is all.

To the Parisian nineties, Mr. Monteux went also for the symphony of the afternoon—Chausson's, first brought into the repertory by Mr. Gericke, restored again to it by Dr. Muck. Chausson was a pupil of Franck; dwelt and worked in a Franckian circle; followed the Franckian formulas as in this very symphony; fell now and then inarticulate when he would speak in tones. No wonder, then, that in various measures he let good Father Franck speak for him. Chausson's composing day was the day in which the Wagnerian tide was sweeping into France and deep in it were swimming some of his compeers. At times in his music-making Chausson groped to find the way. No wonder, again, that at such haltings of his symphony he let Wagnerian procedures clear the path. Admit also that once and again they also left him groping. Agree finally that Mr. Monteux was too heavy-handed in performance, that he obscured outline in too solid, too square-cut masses of tone; that he thickened and shadowed where he might have thinned and illuminated; that an insistent intensity of expression was everywhere his quest. None the less the symphony remained a music of finely chiselled contours, of delicate ornament, of sober and symmetrical progress, a frieze-like music were it not that exaltation often warms and passions it. Throughout it speaks nobly of the composer's soul.

Frieze-like indeed is the introduction gravely carved against a pale, fine-lined, harmonic background, like to a fresco of Puvis de Chavannes. Then warmth enters or less warmth than luminosity; for the successing division swims in the clear cool light of autumn sunshine and autumn air. There are zest, exhilaration in the music, but once and again melancholy tinges and shadows it; while always the emotion is akin to a grave and tranquil happiness. If it is joy that Chausson would paint in tones, then he paints with the serenity of classic painters. Again it is as though Chavannes were working in the medium of music. True, when Chausson would make an opera, he sought his subject-matter in romantic Arthurian legend; true, his familiar Poem for violin and orchestra seems clearly a romantic music. Yet the second movement of his symphony, surely the voice or woe, is or the woe that Antigone bore on her young shoulders within her black mantle when she went forth to death condemned.

Here is no music of Wagnerian frenzies, disposed as Mr. Monteux was to play it so; no more is it music of Franckian despairs, intimate, personal. Rather it is lofty, solitary, remote, a sorrow-stricken music of Greek tragedy, of the Sophocles of this Antigone. So again with the finale. Overdrive it as Mr. Monteux did, he could not make the end ascend to elation. Rather the choral-like progress halted in sur[e] calm, in the seats of the happy immor[tal]. No; the Wagnerian, the Franckian simi[lar]itudes in Chausson's symphony are relatively accidental. Rather he wrote in the nineties in Paris a symphony that gains the Sophoclean beauty of mood and progress, the Sophoclean symmetry of outline and fineness of detail; the Sophoclean purity of passion. As Chausson wrought in his music, so, in his own time, Puvis de Chavannes wrought in his frescoes. Years ago, as it now seems, Mr. Gericke, better divining than Mr. Monteux, played Chausson's symphony in such voice and said that from d'Indy he had taken cue. Yesterday in spite of a very different reading the Greek impression persisted.

And there were interludes of song, sure to mar the symmetry of a symphony concert, but sure also to pleasure the audience. Mme. Homer provided them with three pieces she had sung of old at these very concerts—the air from Händel's [Xe]rxes," universally known as his Largo from which sentimental transcription the singer bore sundry measures into the accompaniment; an air, "My Heart Ever Faithful" from a cantata of Bach; and a soliloquy of the opera house, the Princess Eboli's "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's "Don Carlos." For newer matter she added Beethoven's hymn "The Heavens Are Telling." Beethoven she sang largely; Händel too amply; Bach haltingly; Verdi with force and thrill of the theatre. Becomingly Mr. Monteux accompanied her. Great was the joy of their hearers. With them Mme. Homer's singing is institutional, even when a hint, at least, of thinness, a suspicion of stridency, a momentary shortness of breath, now and then cross tones that were once richer, if less plaint than they are today. Relentless fleet the years.

H. T. PARKER

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

PLENTEOUS GRIST FROM A BUSY WEEK-END

Mr. Griffes's New Tone-Poem Again Warmly Received — The Contrasting Chausson — Old Masterpieces of Palestrina from the Vatican Choir — Mr. Maier's Auspicious Experiment for Children—Miss Hempel in Familiar Glories of Voice and Song—The Flonzaleys' Discovery — Mr. Kreisler's Course — Programmes in Prospect

In measure a prepared audience, at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, heard Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" and applauded it no less warmly than did the listeners of Friday. Again, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played the piece adeptly and revealingly; again, the composer, justly and obviously pleasured, informally acknowledged the plaudits. A second hearing, moreover, affirmed the merits of his music and disclosed no material shortcoming. Possibly the measures of the fête within the dome are more conventional in design than the tone-picturing of the beginning and the end, but there are ample amends in Mr. Griffe's imaginative, individual and subtle play with harmonic color and instrumental stroke, especially in the vivid use of single and, for the instant, outstanding voices. Once again, the tone-poem was most graphic in the preluding out of which rises the fantastical palace and in the finale within which it sinks, so to say, from aural view. Ravel, Debussy, the new Italians, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Carpenter—to summon other and more familiar "modernists"—can boast few passages so subtle of workmanship yet so direct of image as the measures in which Mr. Griffes sets the basses, the piano and a wood-wind or two to the conjuring of misty and expectant vision at the beginning of his piece, while there is as equal and swift a magic in the wan effacement of the close. In both, beyond peradventure, a composer of imagination, alike with ends and means, stood clearly revealed. They are not many in American or any other music.

Mr. Griffes is "modernist" in particular in the open texture, the fine strands, the incisive voice of his music, qualities that seemed the more salient in comparison with the ways of Chausson in the preceding symphony. Twenty years ago, when this was written, Chausson also passed for a modernist, in part because he wrote the luxuriant harmonies, the thick-iced instrumentation, the full bodied tonal fabric which the example of Wagner has then enjoining upon music the world in [Fr]ance round. How opaque the earlier Parisian's [mu]sic seemed on Saturday beside the [pr]esent American's clarity. How superfluously insistent and heavy-handed this Chausson beside Mr. Griffes of the apt [m]eans and the keen, fine stroke. The [mo]dernist" of the nineties—for Chausson was accounted such—quilled his expressive resources, strove with them; whereas the "modernist" of our day was economical, precise, sure-fingered. The musical times do change and composers and hearers change with them—forward. Only such verve of rhythm, glow of color and ardor of progress as Chabrier and Mottl fling over the surface of their "Bourrée Fantasque"—brilliancy for the sake of brilliancy—may survive the intervening years, the new fashions.

Palestrina [illegible]

GRIFFES WORK IS APPLAUDED AT SYMPHONY

The first presentation of Charles T. Griffes's "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" was the feature of the Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. An American work by a composer just 35, on a Symphony program! Surely the Boston Symphony Orchestra is progressing. The number is decidedly interesting and particularly promising when one considers Mr. Griffes's youth. It afforded such pleasure the composer was twice called to the stage to acknowlede the tribute.

Mme. Louise Homer, the soloist of the afternoon, delighted all with her fine singing, particularly the air from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The audience did its best to get an extra but extras are barred at these concerts.

Mr. Monteux gave a fine reading of the Chausson symphony and was deservedly recalled to the stage at its close.

Having completed an impending tour of two weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, December 19th and 20th, the soloists on this occasion to be Leo Ornstein, the remarkable Russian composer-pianist. Much may be expected from his interpretation of MacDowell's Second Concerto at this, his first appearance with the orchestra.

LOUISE FORD.

Trans. Nov 29

Thursday evening, Dec. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. George Boyle of Baltimore for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 19, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Ornstein for assisting pianist in MacDowell's concerto in D-minor, for long unheard here. The purely orchestral numbers are Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar" and Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Transcr. Nov 2

Items and Announcements

After the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow there will be none until Dec. 19 and 20, since through a whole fortnight the orchestra will be journeying southward and westward. For that remote Friday and Saturday, as they now seem, Mr. Monteux announces Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar," and the long suite from Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—pieces that he withdrew last week to make room for numbers commemorative of the late Mr. Higginson. Between them, and in sharp contrast, Mr. Ornstein, appearing for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra, will play MacDowell's second piano concerto.

Herald Nov 30

ARTISTS TO APPEAR AT SYMPHONY HALL

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will be on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. Leo Ornstein, the brilliant young Russian composer-pianist, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto. The remainder of the program will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored Symphonic Poem "Thamar," by Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Suite from his Mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Post Nov 30

LEO ORNSTEIN AT SYMPHONY

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will befall on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two-weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. The soloist at this pair of concerts will be Leo Ornstein, the singular young Russian composer-pianist. Mr. Ornstein will play MacDowell's second concerto at this, his first appearance with the orchestra. The remainder of the programme will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," by Balakireff, the early Russian composer, and Florent Schmitt's symphonic suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," noted for its iconoclastic harmonies.

Globe Nov 30

No Symphony for Two Weeks

By exception to the practice in former years there are to be no Symphony concerts this week and next. At the concerts Dec 19 and 20, Leo Ornstein, the much discussed composer and pianist, will make his first appearance here as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

He will play MacDowell's second concerto. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's now familiar "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," played here four or five years ago for the first time and not since revived.

Nina Tarasova

Trans. Dec. 3

hold and sway [illegible]

Items and Incidents

The Symphony Orchestra will spend next week in the Middle States, as it is easier to call them, undertaking concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Syracuse and Schenectady from Monday through Saturday. The concert in Syracuse is substituted for a concert in Toronto, since, where smallpox prevails, it would be hindered on its return by regulations about vaccination. Through these six concerts Mr. Monteux purposes to regale his hearers with symphonies of Chausson, Beethoven and Chaikovsky; Franck's tone poem, "The Wild Huntaman"; Debussy's Prelude to the Eclogue of the faun [illegible] next's "Preludes" and other numbers from recent programmes in Boston. In Cleveland and Detroit the excellent M.: Bedet [illegible] violoncellist."

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 28 1919

From EVENING POST, New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat major; a new work by Charles P. Griffes; a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla-Khan," besides Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourée Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinée, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a programme which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

From NEW YORK COMMERCIAL, New York City

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony in B flat major	Chausson
Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"	Charles P. Griffes
Symphonic Poem, "Thamar"	Balakireff
Bourre Fantasque	Chabrier

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony Pathetique	Tschaikowsky
"Tragedy of Salome"	Florent Schmitt
Catalonia	Albeniz

Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Concert by the Philharmonic Society:

Symphony No 5	Beethoven
Symphonic dances	Grieg
Violin concerto	Tschaikowsky
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2	Liszt

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address New York City

Date

The next concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the former the principal work will be the Chausson symphony in B flat, whilst a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based on Coleridge's "Kubla-Khan," will be introduced. On Saturday the most interesting items are Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Isaac Albeniz's "Catalonia."

EVENING MAIL

New York City

NOV 29 1919

AT the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique."

For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz "Catalonia" (by request).

ESTABLISHED 1881 NOV 30 1919

From American New York City

THE next Boston Symphony Orchesera's concert taken place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of December 4. The programme will be Symphony in B flat by Chausson, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by Griffes, symphonic poem "Thamar" by Balakirew and "Bourree Fantasqu" by Chabrier. On the afternoon of December 6 the orchestra will play symphonic "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky, "Tragedy of Salome" by Schmitt, "Catalonia" by Albeniz.

From New York City

NOV 30

The Boston Symphony matinée next Saturday in Carnegie Hall will include Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and, by request, Albeniz's "Catalonia."

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 5 - 1919

From Times New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

Louise Homer will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Tomorrow the New York Symphony plays in the same hall, with Rachmaninoff.

From Morning Telegrap New York Ci

NOV 30 19

Boston Symphony Thursday.

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, December 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the program will include Tschaikowsky's "athetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

From Herald New York Cit

At the second evening concert o Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday, P Monteux will conduct Chausson's phony in B flat, a new work by Ch P. Griffes based upon Coleridge's "P ure Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakiser symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier Bourrée Fantastique.

For the Saturday matinee performanc the programme is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," Florent Schmitt "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

EVENING SUN

ess New York City

DEC 2 - 1919

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall this Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakiroff's symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

dress New York City

ate NOV 30 1919

Mme. Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, December 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 7 - 1919

From Morning Telegrap New York City

New Symphonic Poem.

On the occasion of the next concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced to New York. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled "Catalonia."

RECORD Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 30 1919

—The Philharmonic Society concerts this season will have exclusively soloists who are Philadelphians. The success of the society is dependent upon a large membership, the fee of which is only $3 for the entire season, including admission to all concerts. Admission is by membership card only. The first concert will be given next Sunday evening, at the Shubert Theatre. Israel Vichnin, pianist, and Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano, will appear as soloists. The first three concerts will be conducted by Henry Gordon Thunder and the remaining three will be under the baton of Josef A. Pasternack, formerly conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of the Victor Talking Machine Company. Those desiring to join are urged to do so at once. Checks should be drawn to the order of Charles S. Hirsch, treasurer, and sent to Dr. Howard A. Sutton, secretary, No. 114 South Nineteenth street.

Bulletin NOV 29 19 Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now permanently conducted by Pierre Monteux, will give its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Louise Homer, contralto, as soloist. Mme. Homer will sing the aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and songs by Beethoven, Handel and Bach. In addition to Chausson's Symphony in B flat, the orchestra is to play Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

From Evening Public Ledger Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Louise Homer will be the soloist at the Boston symphony concert to take place in the Academy of Music next Monday evening. She will sing the dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Chausson's "Symphony in B Flat," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque," are the orchestral numbers.

Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

a and Concert

INQUIRER Philadelphia, Pa.

Homer Boston Symphony Soloist

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic, "Bourree Fantasque."

From Press, NOV 30 1919 Philadelphia, Pa.

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely-inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque."

EAGLE Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1919

Friday evening the Boston Symphony, making its second journey of the season, will play, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and the dance music which Florent Schmitt wrote for Lois Fuller's version of the "Salome" tale. The soloist will be Louise Homer, beloved and best of America's contraltos. Verdi's "O don fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration"—so runs the announcement's translation of the familiar song—and Handel's Largo comprise her offerings.

om News NOV 30 1919 Baltimore, Md.

Louise Homer

Mme. Homer, the noted American contralto, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

MRS. HOMER'S RETURN.

After several years' absence from the local concert stage, Louise Homer, the American contralto, will appear at the Lyric Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three numbers—the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos"; Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and the "Plane Tree" aria familiarly known as the Largo, from Handel's "Xerxes."

The most notable feature of the evening from the orchestral standpoint—and it promises to be nothing short of a startling one — will be Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," which is wholly new here.

This is known as one of the most extraordinary examples of modern French composition in existence. It is the music of a ballet that had a great success in both Paris and London, where it was danced against marvelous Bakst sets with Karsavina as the premiere danseuse etoile.

It is based upon a poem by Robert d'Humieres, and Karsavina, they say, was very wonderful as Salome.

At her entrance she was garbed in a gown of bizarre beauty—a white velvet creation embroidered with great black figures outlined in red and gold and the train thereof was 30 or 40 feet in length and so heavy that it had to be carried by scores of train bearers.

She entered down a spiral staircase half way back stage, and as she moved step by step the folds of the velvet spread out gradually like a cloud that had descended to mark her progress. When she reached the footlights the robe was removed and she stood revealed with her body painted with huge roses.

Florent Schmitt's music is vividly descriptive and infused with the maccabre element of the scene.

The score calls for a chorus of women's voices off stage but whether or not this part will be omitted I am not in a position to say, as no advice on the matter has been received from Boston.

The remaining number of the program M. Monteux has selected for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony (B minor No. 6).

From RECORD Address Philadelphia, P Date

—Louise Homer, contralto, is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" will be sung. Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's symphony in B flat, which is ranked as one of the greatest France has produced, Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar" and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" are on the program.

Having completed an impending tour of two weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, December 19th and 20th, the soloists on this occasion to be Leo Ornstein, the remarkable Russian composer-pianist. Much may be expected from his interpretation of MacDowell's Second Concerto at this, his first appearance with the orchestra.

LOUISE FORD.

Trans. Nov 29

Thursday evening, Dec. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. George Boyle of Baltimore for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 19, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, and Mr. Ornstein for assisting pianist in MacDowell's concerto in D-minor, for long unheard here. The purely orchestral numbers are Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar" and Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Transcr. Nov 2

Items and Announcements

After the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow there will be none until Dec. 19 and 20, since through a whole fortnight the orchestra will be journeying southward and westward. For that remote Friday and Saturday, as they now seem, Mr. Monteux announces Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar," and the long suite from Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—pieces that he withdrew last week to make room for numbers commemorative of the late Mr. Higginson. Between them, and in sharp contrast, Mr. Ornstein, appearing for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra, will play MacDowell's second piano concerto.

Herald Nov 30

ARTISTS TO APPEAR AT SYMPHONY HALL

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will be on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. Leo Ornstein, the brilliant young Russian composer-pianist, will play Macdowell's Second Concerto. The remainder of the program will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored Symphonic Poem "Thamar," by Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Suite from his Mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Post Nov 30

LEO ORNSTEIN AT SYMPHONY

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will befall on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two-weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. The soloist at this pair of concerts will be Leo Ornstein, the singular young Russian composer-pianist. Mr. Ornstein will play MacDowell's second concerto at this, his first appearance witn the orchestra. The remainder of the programme will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," by Balakireff, the early Russian composer, and Florent Schmitt's symphonic suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," noted for its iconoclastic harmonies.

Globe Nov 30

No Symphony for Two Weeks

By exception to the practice in former years there are to be no Symphony concerts this week and next. At the concerts Dec 19 and 20, Leo Ornstein, the much discussed composer and pianist, will make his first appearance here as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

He will play MacDowell's second concerto. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's now familiar "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," played here four or five years ago for the first time and not since revived.

Nina Tarasova ...

Trans. Dec. 3

hold and sway ...

Items and Incidents

The Symphony Orchestra will spend next week in the Middle States, as it is easier to call them, undertaking concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Syracuse and Schenectady from Monday through Saturday. The concert in Syracuse is substituted for a concert in Toronto, since, where smallpox prevails, it would be hindered on its return by regulations about vaccination. Through these six concerts Mr. Monteux purposes to regale his hearers with symphonies of Chausson, Beethoven and Chaikovsky; Franck's tone poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy's Prelude to the Eclogue of the faun; Liszt's "Preludes" and other numbers from recent programmes in Boston. In Cleve[land] and Detroit the excellent M. Bedet[ti] ... heard as "solo violoncellist."

ESTABLISHED 1841 NOV 28 1919

From EVENING POST, New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat major; a new work by Charles P. Griffes; a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla-Khan," besides Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourée Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinée, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a programme which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

m NEW YORK COMMERCIA

ress: New York City

e

At the second evening concert of th[e] Boston Symphony Orchestra, to b[e] given in Carnegie Hall next Thursda[y] Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will conduc[t] Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B fla[t] a new work by Charles P. Griffe[s] based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Don[e] of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's sym[-] phonic poem, "Thamar," and Cha[-] brier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the program will in[-] clude Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" sym[-] phony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy o[f] Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony in B flat major.....Chausson
Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan".....Charles P. Griffes
Symphonic Poem, "Thamar".....Balakireff
Bourre Fantasque.....Chabrier

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony Pathetique.....Tschaikowsky
"Tragedy of Salome".....Florent Schmitt
Catalonia .....Albeniz

Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Concert by the Philharmonic Society:

Symphony No 5.....Beethoven
Symphonic dances.....Grieg
Violin concerto.....Tschaikowsky
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Liszt

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address New York City

Date

The next concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the former the principal work will be the Chausson symphony in B flat, whilst a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based on Coleridge's "Kubla-Khan," will be introduced. On Saturday the most interesting items are Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Isaac Albeniz's "Catalonia."

EVENING MAIL

New York City

NOV 1919

AT the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique."

For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Forent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz "Catalonia" (by request).

ESTABLISHED 1861 NOV 30 1919

From American New York City

THE next Boston Symphony Orchesera's concert taken place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of December 4. The programme will be Symphony in B flat by Chausson, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by Griffes, symphonic poem "Thamar" by Balakirew and "Bourree Fantasqu" by Chabrier. On the afternoon of December 6 the orchestra will play symphonic "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky, "Tragedy of Salome" by Schmitt, "Catalonia" by Albeniz.

n T... NOV 30

ress New York City

The Boston Symphony matinée next Saturday in Carnegie Hall will include Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and, by request, Albeniz's "Catalonia."

ESTABLISHED 1861 DEC 3 - 1919

From Times New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

Louise Homer will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Tomorrow the New York Symphony plays in the same hall, with Rachmaninoff.

From Morning Telegrap[h] New York Ci[ty]

Boston Symphony Thursday.

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, December 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the program will include Tschaikowsky's "athetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

From Herald New York Cit[y]

At the second evening concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday, Monteux will conduct Chausson's phony in B flat, a new work by Ch[a]P. Griffes based upon Coleridge's "P[lea]ure Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakise[ff]'s symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier' Bourrée Fantastique.

For the Saturday matinee performanc[e] the programme is Tschaikowsky's "Pa[-]thetic Symphony," Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Cata[-]lonia."

* * *

EVENING SUN

ess New York City

DEC 2 1919

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall this Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakiroff's symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

dress New York City

ate

* * *

Mme. Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, December 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

ESTABLISHED 1861 NOV 30 1919

From Morning Telegrap[h] New York City

New Symphonic Poem.

On the occasion of the next concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced to New York. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled 'Catalonia."

RECORD Philadelphia, Pa. NOV 30 1919

—The Philharmonic Society concerts this season will have exclusively soloists who are Philadelphians. The success of the society is dependent upon a large membership, the fee of which is only $3 for the entire season, including admission to all concerts. Admission is by membership card only. The first concert will be given next Sunday evening, at the Shubert Theatre. Israel Vichnin, pianist, and Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano, will appear as soloists. The first three concerts will be conducted by Henry Gordon Thunder and the remaining three will be under the baton of Josef A. Pasternack, formerly conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of the Victor Talking Machine Company. Those desiring to join are urged to do so at once. Checks should be drawn to the order of Charles S. Hirsch, treasurer, and sent to Dr. Howard A. Sutton, secretary, No. 114 South Nineteenth street.

Bulletin Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now permanently conducted by Pierre Monteux, will give its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Louise Homer, contralto, as soloist. Mme. Homer will sing the aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and songs by Beethoven, Handel and Bach. In addition to Chausson's Symphony in B flat, the orchestra is to play Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

From Evening Public Ledger Philadelphia, Pa.

Madame Louise Homer will be the soloist at the Boston symphony concert to take place in the Academy of Music next Monday evening. She will sing the dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Chausson's "Symphony in B Flat," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and "Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque," are the orchestral numbers.

Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

a and Concert

ient S...

INQUIRER Philadelphia, Pa.

Homer Boston Symphony Soloist

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic materpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic, "Bourree Fantasque."

From Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely-inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque."

om EAGLE

dress Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate NOV 30 1919

Friday evening the Boston Symphony, making its second journey of the season, will play, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and the dance music which Florent Schmitt wrote for Lois Fuller's version of the "Salome" tale. The soloist will be Louise Homer, beloved and best of America's contraltos. Verdi's "O don fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration"—so runs the announcement's translation of the familiar song—and Handel's Largo comprise her offerings.

om News ... 1919

altimore, Md.

Louise Homer

Mme. Homer, the noted American contralto, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

Mrs. Homer's Return.

After several years' absence from the local concert stage, Louise Homer, the American contralto, will appear at the Lyric Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three numbers—the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos"; Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and the "Plane Tree" aria familiarly known as the Largo, from Handel's "Xerxes."

The most notable feature of the evening from the orchestral standpoint—and it promises to be nothing short of a startling one — will be Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," which is wholly new here.

This is known as one of the most extraordinary examples of modern French composition in existence. It is the music of a ballet that had a great success in both Paris and London, where it was danced against marvelous Bakst sets with Karsavina as the premiere danseuse etoile.

It is based upon a poem by Robert d'Humieres, and Karsavina, they say, was very wonderful as Salome.

At her entrance she was garbed in a gown of bizarre beauty—a white velvet creation embroidered with great black figures outlined in red and gold and the train thereof was 30 or 40 feet in length and so heavy that it had to be carried by scores of train bearers.

She entered down a spiral staircase half way back stage, and as she moved step by step the folds of the velvet spread out gradually like a cloud that had descended to mark her progress. When she reached the footlights the robe was removed and she stood revealed with her body painted with huge roses.

Florent Schmitt's music is vividly descriptive and infused with the maccabre element of the scene.

The score calls for a chorus of women's voices off stage but whether or not this part will be omitted I am not in a position to say, as no advice on the matter has been received from Boston.

The remaining number of the program M. Monteux has selected for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony (B minor No. 6).

From RECORD

ddress Philadelphia, P...

ate

—Louise Homer, contralto, is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony con[-] cert in the Academy of Music tomor[row] evening. Verdi's dramatic aria, "O [Don] Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Natu[re's] Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" will be sung. Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's symphony in B flat, which is ranked as one of the greatest France has produced, Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar" and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque" are on the program.

Having completed an impending tour of two weeks, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, December 19th and 20th, the soloists on this occasion to be Leo Ornstein, the remarkable Russian composer-pianist. Much may be expected from his interpretation of MacDowell's Second Concerto at this, his first appearance with the orchestra.

LOUISE FORD.

Trans. Nov 29

Thursday evening, Dec. 18, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. George Boyle of Baltimore for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 19, the eighth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting, and Mr. Ornstein for assisting pianist in MacDowell's concerto in D-minor, for long unheard here. The purely orchestral numbers are Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar" and Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Transcr. Nov 2

Items and Announcements

After the Symphony Concerts of today and tomorrow there will be none until Dec. 19 and 20, since through a whole fortnight the orchestra will be journeying southward and westward. For that remote Friday and Saturday, as they now seem, Mr. Monteux announces Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar," and the long suite from Schmitt's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome"—pieces that he withdrew last week to make room for numbers commemorative of the late Mr. Higginson. Between them, and in sharp contrast, Mr. Ornstein, appearing for the first times with the Symphony Orchestra, will play MacDowell's second piano concerto.

At his...

Herald Nov 30

ARTISTS TO APPEAR AT SYMPHONY HALL

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will be on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. Leo Ornstein, the brilliant young Russian composer-pianist, will play Macdowell's Second Concerto. The remainder of the program will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored Symphonic Poem "Thamar," by Balakireff, and Florent Schmitt's Symphonic Suite from his Mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Post Nov 30

LEO ORNSTEIN AT SYMPHONY

The next Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will befall on Friday and Saturday, Dec. 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from a two-weeks' tour upon which it is now embarking. The soloist at this pair of concerts will be Leo Ornstein, the singular young Russian composer-pianist. Mr. Ornstein will play MacDowell's second concerto at this, his first appearance witn the orchestra. The remainder of the programme will comprise the sensuous and darkly colored symphonic poem, "Thamar," by Balakireff, the early Russian composer, and Florent Schmitt's symphonic suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," noted for its iconoclastic harmonies.

Globe Nov 30

No Symphony for Two Weeks

By exception to the practice in former years there are to be no Symphony concerts this week and next. At the concerts Dec 19 and 20, Leo Ornstein, the much discussed composer and pianist, will make his first appearance here as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

He will play MacDowell's second concerto. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's now familiar "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," played here four or five years ago for the first time and not since revived.

Nina Tarasova...

Tribune Dec. 3

hold and sway ...

Items and Incidents

The Symphony Orchestra will spend next week in the Middle States, as it is easier to call them, undertaking concerts in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Detroit, Syracuse and Schenectady from Monday through Saturday. The concert in Syracuse is substituted for a concert in Toronto, since, were the orchestra to go into Ontario, where smallpox prevails, it would be hindered on its return by regulations about vaccination. Through these six concerts Mr. Monteux purposes to regale his hearers with symphonies of Chausson, Beethoven and Chaikovsky; Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Debussy's Prelude to the Eclogue of the faun, Liszt's "Preludes" and other numbers from recent programmes in Boston. In Cleveland and Detroit the excellent M... Bedet... be heard as "solo violoncellist."

ESTABLISHED 1841 NOV 28 1919

From EVENING POST, New York City

Boston Symphony Programmes.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, December 4, Pierre Monteux will play Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat major; a new work by Charles P. Griffes; a musical setting of Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla-Khan," besides Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourée Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinée, Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, unheard in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for eleven years, will head a programme which will also include Florent Schmitt's suite from the mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome," and "Catalonia," by the Spanish composer, Albeniz.

From NEW YORK COMMERCIA...
Address: New York City

At the second evening concert of th... Boston Symphony Orchestra, to b... given in Carnegie Hall next Thursda... Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will condu... Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B fla... a new work by Charles P. Griffe... based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Don... of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's sym... phonic poem, "Thamar," and Cha... brier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the... Saturday matinee the program will in... clude Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" sym... phony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy o... Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony in B flat major	Chausson
Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"	Charles P. Griffes
Symphonic Poem, "Thamar"	Balakireff
Bourre Fantasque	Chabrier

From TRIBUNE, New York City

Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

Symphony Pathetique	Tschaikowsky
"Tragedy of Salome"	Florent Schmitt
Catalonia	Albeniz

Carnegie Hall, 8:30 p. m. Concert by the Philharmonic Society:

Symphony No 5	Beethoven
Symphonic dances	Grieg
Violin concerto	Tschaikowsky
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2	Liszt

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address New York City
Date ...

The next concerts of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall will take place next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the former the principal work will be the Chausson symphony in B flat, whilst a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based on Coleridge's "Kubla-Khan," will be introduced. On Saturday the most interesting items are Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Isaac Albeniz's "Catalonia."

EVENING MAIL
New York City

AT the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique."

For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Forent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz "Catalonia" (by request).

ESTABLISHED 1881

From American
New York City

THE next Boston Symphony Orchesera's concert taken place in Carnegie Hall on the evening of December 4. The programme will be Symphony in B flat by Chausson, "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" by Griffes, symphonic poem "Thamar" by Balakirew and "Bourree Fantasqu" by Chabrier. On the afternoon of December 6 the orchestra will play symphonic "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky, "Tragedy of Salome" by Schmitt, "Catalonia" by Albeniz.

From New York City

The Boston Symphony matinée next Saturday in Carnegie Hall will include Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and, by request, Albeniz's "Catalonia."

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 3 - 1919

From Times
New York City

MUSIC NOTES.

Louise Homer will sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Tomorrow the New York Symphony plays in the same hall, with Rachmaninoff.

From Morning Telegrap...
New York Ci...

Boston Symphony Thursday.

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, December 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the program will include Tschaikowsky's "pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia" (by request).

From Herald
New York City

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakiseff's symphonic poem "Thamar" and Chabrier's Bourrée Fantastique.

For the Saturday matinee performance the programme is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

* * *

EVENING SUN
...ess New York City

DEC 2 ...

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall this Thursday, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakiroff's symphonic poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." For the Saturday matinee the programme will include Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

...dress New York City

...ate ...

Mme. Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, December 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores ,to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

* * *

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegrapl
New York City

New Symphonic Poem.

On the occasion of the next concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an orchestral work by the Spanish composer, Albeniz, will be introduced to New York. The work, which is a symphonic poem, is entitled 'Catalonia."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 30 1919

—The Philharmonic Society concerts this season will have exclusively soloists who are Philadelphians. The success of the society is dependent upon a large membership, the fee of which is only $3 for the entire season, including admission to all concerts. Admission is by membership card only. The first concert will be given next Sunday evening, at the Shubert Theatre. Israel Yichnin, pianist, and Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano, will appear as soloists. The first three concerts will be conducted by Henry Gordon Thunder and the remaining three will be under the baton of Josef A. Pasternack, formerly conductor of the Metropolitan Opera House and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of the Victor Talking Machine Company. Those desiring to join are urged to do so at once. Checks should be drawn to the order of Charles S. Hirsch, treasurer, and sent to Dr. Howard A. Sutton, secretary, No. 114 South Nineteenth street.

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now permanently conducted by Pierre Monteux, will give its second concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Louise Homer, contralto, as soloist. Mme. Homer will sing the aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos," and songs by Beethoven, Handel and Bach. In addition to Chausson's Symphony in B flat, the orchestra is to play Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bo... ree Fantasque."

...Public Ledger
...ia, Pa.

...omer will be the soloist ...ny concert to take place ...usic next Monday eve... ...he dramatic aria, "O ... "Don Carlos"; "Na... ...Beethoven; Handel's ...s original form, and ... Faithful." Chaus... ...Flat," Balakireff's ...mar," and "Cha... ...e Fantasque," are ...ers.

...s,
...hiladelphia, Pa.
...nd Conce...

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Homer Boston Symphony Soloist

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic materpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion. Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic, "Bourree Fantasque."

From Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

While new singers come and old singers go, Madame Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organ-like, the great diva's tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to their noblest beauty such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven, Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert, For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's finely-inspired symphony in B flat, which is ranked with Franck's symphony as one of the greatest France has produced; also Balakireff's sensuous symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasque."

...om EAGLE
...dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
...ate NOV 30 1919

Friday evening the Boston Symphony, making its second journey of the season, will play, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and the dance music which Florent Schmitt wrote for Lois Fuller's version of the "Salome" tale. The soloist will be Louise Homer, beloved and best of America's contraltos. Verdi's "O don fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration"—so runs the announcement's translation of the familiar song—and Handel's Largo comprise her offerings.

...om
News
Baltimore, Md.

Louise Homer

Mme. Homer, the noted American contralto, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

Mrs. Homer's Return.

After several years' absence from the local concert stage, Louise Homer, the American contralto, will appear at the Lyric Wednesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will sing three numbers—the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos"; Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and the "Plane Tree" aria familiarly known as the Largo, from Handel's "Xerxes."

The most notable feature of the evening from the orchestral standpoint—and it promises to be nothing short of a startling one—will be Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," which is wholly new here.

This is known as one of the most extraordinary examples of modern French composition in existence. It is the music of a ballet that had a great success in both Paris and London, where it was danced against marvelous Bakst sets with Karsavina as the premiere danseuse etoile.

It is based upon a poem by Robert d'Humieres, and Karsavina, they say, was very wonderful as Salome.

At her entrance she was garbed in a gown of bizarre beauty—a white velvet creation embroidered with great black figures outlined in red and gold and the train thereof was 30 or 40 feet in length and so heavy that it had to be carried by scores of train bearers.

She entered down a spiral staircase half way back stage, and as she moved step by step the folds of the velvet spread out gradually like a cloud that had descended to mark her progress. When she reached the footlights the robe was removed and she stood revealed with her body painted with huge roses.

Florent Schmitt's music is vividly descriptive and infused with the maccabre element of the scene.

The score calls for a chorus of women's voices off stage but whether or not this part will be omitted I am not in a position to say, as no advice on the matter has been received from Boston.

The remaining number of the program M. Monteux has selected for this occasion is Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony (B minor No. 6).

From RECORD
...ddress Philadelphia, P...
...ate ...

—Louise Homer, contralto, is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Con... cert in the Academy of Music tomor... evening. Verdi's dramatic aria, "O ... Fatale," from "Don Carlos"; "Natu... Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so... called "Largo" in its original form, ... Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" w... be sung. Pierre Monteux will cond... Chausson's symphony in B flat, which ... ranked as one of the greatest Fra... has produced, Balakireff's sensuo... symphonic poem, "Thamar" and Ch... bier's rhythmic "Bourree Fantasiqu... are on the program.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 29 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Louise Homer, Soloist, With Pierre Monteux Orchestra. Peabody Recital Friday. Music To Be Heard Here Later.

Mme. Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose charm of voice and presence assumes new character in the fullness of her maturity, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form as an operatic aria, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portions, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores.

From STANDARD UNION

DEC 3 - 1919

While new singers come and old singers go Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organlike, her tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O, Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to a noble beauty such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

At Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, tomorrow afternoon, the Philharmonic Society of New York will give a concert at which Edwin Hughes will be the assisting artist.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

Diversity of Programs and Soloists Announced by Five Orchestras

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan, Balakireiff's Symphonic Poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee, the program will include m

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 30 1919 D

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 3 - 1919

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

LOUISE HOMER AT ACADEMY

Will Appear With Boston Orchestra—Other Musical Events Scheduled.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

NOTED SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MME. LOUISE HOMER.

The distinguished Metropolitan contralto will be the soloist at the concert to be given this evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

YOUNG AMERICA IN MUSIC

Griffes, Composer of 35, Absorbs Latest Musical Discoveries of Europe and Adds Personality of His Own in Striking Composition—An Expression of the Coming Generation of Native Composers

There is so much talk about American composers and so little actual accomplishment, comparatively speaking, by American composers, that it was extremely refreshing to listen at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the brilliant and imaginative symphonic poem of Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge. This is a work intoxicating in color and exotic imagination, written with a boldness and an enthusiasm irresistible to the listener.

So this is young America! Or so some might have said. Well, it is a phase, and to our minds a very encouraging phase, of young America when it turns to music. At the very least, we have in Mr. Griffes a young man of 35 who is rapidly assimilating and mastering for use in his own way the best musical material that the creative brains of Europe and Russia have been able to afford up to the present time. Mr. Griffes has not only studied the scores of these composers and analyzed them, but he has felt them, which is a very different thing.

ANALYSIS VERSUS FEELING

Anyone can read a score of Igor Strawinsky and note how effectively he uses the piano or celesta. Hundreds of professors and students do this, for we are at least a progressively disposed people. But what is the result? It is usually a most unhappy or inept mixing of orchestral colors only justified by the musical thought which led the original composer to use such colors on his canvas. These same colors, in the hands of a young man who has nothing to say, simply appear as a collection of curiosities. You can feel how ignorant the composer is of what those combinations really mean, as he uses them. It is a little fish trying to talk with the voice of a whale, or, if you like, a bluejay trying on the hues of the humming bird. It does not, in a word, ring true.

If you want an example of American imitation—not assimilation, but simply imitation of European musical formulas—just listen to any one of the late scores of a composer like Henry Hadley. How loudly these scores sound, yet how commonplace and old-fashioned they are, even today! Yet Mr. Hadley's model is only so old as Richard Strauss, and the earlier works of Richard Strauss are young and overwhelming today. Why? Because Strauss has the substance in these earlier works, while Hadley has the shell.

Mr. Hadley is not alone in this. Urged on by the cry of modernism, American composers who have not the slightest mental or temperamental sympathy with the tendencies of modern European music, mix in all kinds of strange harmonies which they borrow from foreign sources, as though by a pinch of hot seasoning you could give a guest an appetite for a poorly cooked dish.

But Mr. Griffes' is an utterly different case. The general tendencies of ultra-modern men are native to his temperament and musical personality. He has read a great many scores, and is enthusiastic and thoroughly appreciative, one feels, of their finest qualities. He has the sensibility, the intellectual range, in all probability, that his musical perceptions imply. And this is American. The American is not going to be local, provincial, either by taste or temperament. He is inherently capable, as we believe, of the broadest mental viewpoint. His entire history, traditions and mental tendencies emphasize this. He has a perspective which should ensure an expression in art not lacking the note of authenticity, but displaying a broader range of sympathies and imagination than the productions of nations more heavily weighted with centuries of tradition, and restricted mentally, as well as commercially and geographically, by their boundaries.

What the devil (as Bernard Shaw once put it of one of his characters) Mr. Griffes will ultimately evolve into remains to be seen. But he is already, at the age of 35, a young man who has produced distinctive and highly colored music, which, despite its obvious indebtedness to certain foreign musical sources, such as the modern French and Russian, is full of conviction and personality. He is genuinely a young man, with ardent sympathies, ambitions, enthusiams, greedy enough for what is new and alive to take in everything his generation has to offer him and still have room for more. He has a remarkable technic, an insatiable artistic appetite, and a musical background on which to project his own individuality. That is a great deal for 35, and it promises much that is substantial and interesting in days to come.

ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV

From Post
Washington, D. C.

National—Boston Symphony, Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Mme. Louise Homer, famous contralto, will be the soloist of the occasion. The program: By the orchestra—Chausson's symphony in B flat; "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles P. Griffes, and Liszt's "The Preludes." By Mme. Homer—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Handel's "Largo."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

DEC 2 1919

National—Mme. Louise Homer.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the New National Theater, next Tuesday afternoon. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chaussen's impassioned and finely wrought symphony in B flat.

Boo Syn

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

SAXOPHONE A JOY TO RACHMANINOFF

Great Composer-Pianist One of Delighted Party at National Theater.

"Conniption fits" is about the only phrase adequate to express the evident pleasure taken by the occupants of two upper boxes at the National the other night when those eminent exponents of the soulful saxophone, styled as the "Six Brown Brothers," were jazzing their way into the hearts of the big audience.

The occupants were all men and all distinctly foreign-looking. All seemed intensely interested in the musical effects produced and the physical maneuvers gone through by the masters of the melodious mixture of wind and reed instrument. And not one could keep his face straight in view of the antics of he foremost and shortest Brown, he of the corked counte-

Berlin Hears Karl Muck Again

The citizens of Berlin are today enjoying the conducting of Dr. Karl Muck. From Die Taegliche Rundschau of October 7 comes a review of his first concert. The article was written by Adolf Goettmann, who probably still labors under the belief that Americans are not all they ought to be. Herr Goettmann writes:

"Monday evening we witnessed a greeting of welcome distinguished alike by the high esteem due the artist welcomed and by the spi of heartiest cordiality, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared on the stage of the Philharmonic as conductor of the third of the so-called Weingartner concerts. Many years have passed since he—to the sorrow of many artists and friends of art—was lured by the dollar's call to America's premier conductorship and departed over seas. In return for the intellectual instructions which for years this artist as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contributed to the inartistic lacks of American gold, he received bitter repayment. His bearing as a loyal German was requited with internment. For many months he waited before the hour of his release was struck. He was recalled again to the stage of his greatest successes. Here experience. To the German master was extended a temptstous greeting, both orchestra and audience rising for his reception. It is with full satisfaction that we agree with the multitude's opinion. May he now remain with us. Such men and artists are needed by us more than ever. He is a master- artist in the finest sense of the term. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and above all, Brahm's E minor Symphony proved it with ineructable force. After hearing the symphony's first movement even an anti-Brahmsite, like Friedrich Nietche must have been on his guard lest he gave voice to such superficial judgment and misunderstanding of the subject as, for example, this: "Brahms possesses the melancholy of incompetence. He does not create the complete art work. If one subtracts his imitations and borrowings of older great composers and of exotic modern stylists, there remains as his own merely a longing to create. His is too small a nerson; too little a centripetal force." Seldom has so false a judgment, so half-baked an absurdity been stated with regard to Brahms. The well-nigh inaccessible subjectivity of his creative faculty makes his music, indeed, so much the more admirable. Of this personal equation the E minor Symphony is an extraordinary example. And Karl Muck was master of its tonal language. He is one of the few who in the process of interpretation can create wealth of expression inasmuch as

Boston Symphony Soloist.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, Pierre Monteux has chosen an engrossing programme. It will begin with Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, electric with emotion and tragedy. There will also be interest in the revival of the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Since this number is scored for five solo instruments—the 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, it affords a close scrutiny of the fine individual musicianship of virtuosos who lead each of these sections. The closing number will be Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Miss Sophie Braslau, the foremost contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the distinguished soloist of the evening, singing "Ah! Quel Giorno," from Rossini's "Semiramide," and three strikingly dramatic songs by Moussorgsky: "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don," and "On the River Dnyeper."

ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 30 1919
From Post
Washington, D. C.

Concerts this week will include the second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Pierre Monteux on Tuesday afternoon, with Louise Homer, American contralto, as soloist, and the Sistine Quartet on Thursday afternoon.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 29 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Louise Homer, Soloist, With Pierre Monteux Orchestra. Peabody Recital Friday. Music To Be Heard Here Later.

Mme. Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose charm of voice and presence assumes new character in the fullness of her maturity, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form as an operatic aria, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portions, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores.

From STANDARD U

While new singers come and old singers go Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto, who is to be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, holds and increases her admiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organlike, her tones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O, Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to a noble beauty such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

At Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, tomorrow afternoon, the Philharmonic Society of New York will give a concert at which Edwin Hughes will be the assisting artist.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

Diversity of Programs and Soloists Announced by Five Orchestras

At the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will conduct Ernest Chausson's Symphony in B flat, a new work by Charles P. Griffes, based upon Coleridge's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan, Balakireiff's Symphonic Poem "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

For the Saturday matinee, the program will include

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

LOUISE HOMER AT ACADEMY

Will Appear With Boston Orchestra—Other Musical Events Scheduled.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

From
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

NOTED SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MME. LOUISE HOMER.

The distinguished Metropolitan contralto will be the soloist at the concert to be given this evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Boston Symphony Soloist.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, Pierre Monteux has chosen an engrossing programme. It will begin with Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, electric with emotion and tragedy. There will also be interest in the revival of the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Since this number is scored for five solo instruments—the 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, it affords a close scrutiny of the fine individual musicianship of virtuosos who lead each of these sections. The closing number will be Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Miss Sophie Braslau, the foremost contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the distinguished soloist of the evening, singing "Ah! Quel Giorno," from Rossini's "Semiramide," and three strikingly dramatic songs by Moussorgsky: "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don," and "On the River Dnyeper."

YOUNG AMERICA IN MUSIC

Griffes, Composer of 35, Absorbs Latest Musical Discoveries of Europe and Adds Personality of His Own in Striking Composition—An Expression of the Coming Generation of Native Composers

There is so much talk about American composers and so little actual accomplishment, comparatively speaking, by American composers, that it was extremely refreshing to listen at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the brilliant and imaginative symphonic poem of Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge. This is a work intoxicating in color and exotic imagination, written with a boldness and an enthusiasm irresistible to the listener.

So this is young America! Or so some might have said. Well, it is a phase, and to our minds a very encouraging phase, of young America when it turns to music. At the very least, we have in Mr. Griffes a young man of 35 who is rapidly assimilating and mastering for use in his own way the best musical material that the creative brains of Europe and Russia have been able to afford up to the present time. Mr. Griffes has not only studied the scores of these composers and analyzed them, but he has felt them, which is a very different thing.

ANALYSIS VERSUS FEELING

Anyone can read a score of Igor Stravinsky and note how effectively he uses the piano or celesta. Hundreds of professors and students do this, for we are at least a progressively disposed people. But what is the result? It is usually a most unhappy or inept mixing of orchestral colors only justified by the musical thought which led the original composer to use such colors on his canvas. These same colors, in the hands of a young man who has nothing to say, simply appear as a collection of curiosities. You can feel how ignorant the composer is of what those combinations really mean, as he uses them. It is a little fish trying to talk with the voice of a whale, or, if you like, a bluejay trying on the hues of the humming bird. It does not, in a word, ring true.

If you want an example of American imitation—not assimilation, but simply imitation of European musical formulas—just listen to any one of the late scores of a composer like Henry Hadley. How loudly these scores sound, yet how commonplace and old-fashioned they are, even today! Yet Mr. Hadley's model is only so old as Richard Strauss, and the earlier works of Richard Strauss are young and overwhelming today. Why? Because Strauss has the substance in these earlier works, while Hadley has the shell.

Mr. Hadley is not alone in this. Urged on by the cry of modernism, American composers who have not the slightest mental or temperamental sympathy with the tendencies of modern European music, mix in all kinds of strange harmonies which they borrow from foreign sources, as though by a pinch of hot seasoning you could give a guest an appetite for a poorly cooked dish.

But Mr. Griffes' is an utterly different case. The general tendencies of ultra-modern men are native to his temperament and musical personality. He has read a great many scores, and is enthusiastic and thoroughly appreciative, one feels, of their finest qualities. He has the sensibility, the intellectual range, in all probability, that his musical perceptions imply. And this is American. The American is not going to be local, provincial, either by taste or temperament. He is inherently capable, as we believe, of the broadest mental viewpoint. His entire history, traditions and mental tendencies emphasize this. He has a perspective which should ensure an expression in art not lacking the note of authenticity, but displaying a broader range of sympathies and imagination than the productions of nations more heavily weighted with centuries of tradition, and restricted mentally, as well as commercially and geographically, by their boundaries.

What the devil (as Bernard Shaw once put it of one of his characters) Mr. Griffes will ultimately evolve into remains to be seen. But he is already, at the age of 35, a young man who has produced distinctive and highly colored music, which, despite its obvious indebtedness to certain foreign musical sources, such as the modern French and Russian, is full of conviction and personality. He is genuinely a young man, with ardent sympathies, ambitions, enthusiams, greedy enough for what is new and alive to take in everything his generation has to offer him and still have room for more. He has a remarkable technic, an insatiable artistic appetite, and a musical background on which to project his own individuality. That is a great deal for 35, and it promises much that is substantial and interesting in days to come.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Post
Washington, D. C.

National—Boston Symphony, Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Mme. Louise Homer, famous contralto, will be the soloist of the occasion. The program: By the orchestra—Chausson's symphony in B flat; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles P. Griffes, and Liszt's "The Preludes." By Mme. Homer—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Handel's "Largo."

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

National—Mme. Louise Homer.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the New National Theater, next Tuesday afternoon. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classis masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chausson's impassioned and finely wrought symphony in B flat.

National Sistine Choir

HENRY
ROMEIKE, Inc.
(ORIGINAL)
106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Evening Star
Washington, D. C.

SAXOPHONE A JOY TO RACHMANINOFF

Great Composer-Pianist One of Delighted Party at National Theater.

"Conniption fits" is about the only phrase adequate to express the evident pleasure taken by the occupants of two upper boxes at the National the other night when those eminent exponents of the soulful saxophone, styled as the "Six Brown Brothers," were jazzinz their way into the hearts of the big audience.

The occupants were all men and all distinctly foreign-looking. All seemed intensely interested in the musical effects produced and the physical maneuvers gone through by the masters of the melodious mixture of wind and reed instrument. And not one could keep his face straight in view of the antics of he foremost and shortest Brown, he of the corked counte-

Berlin Hears Karl Muck Again

The citizens of Berlin are today enjoying the conducting of Dr. Karl Muck. From Die Taegliche Rundschau of October 7 comes a review of his first concert. The article was written by Adolf Goettmann, who probably still labors under the belief that Americans are not all they ought to be. Herr Goettmann writes:

"Monday evening we witnessed a greeting of welcome distinguished alike by the high esteem due the artist welcomed and by the spi of heartiest cordiality, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared on the stage of the Philharmonic as conductor of the third of the so-called Weingartner concerts. Many years have passed since he—to the sorrow of many artists and friends of art—was lured by the dollar's call to America's premier conductorship and departed over seas. In return for the intellectual instructions which for years this artist as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contributed to the inartistic hacks of American gold, he received bitter repayment. His bearing as a loyal German was requited with internment. For many months he waited before the hour of his release was struck. He was recalled again to the scenes of his greatest successes. Here experience. To the German master was extended a temptstous greeting, both orchestra and audience rising for his reception. It is with full satisfaction that we agree with the multitude's opinion. May he now remain with us. Such men and artists are needed by us more than ever. He is a master- artist in the finest sense of the term. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and above all, Brahm's E minor Symphony proved it with ineructable force. After hearing the symphony's first movement even an anti-Brahmsite, like Friedrich Nietche must have been on his guard lest he gave voice to such superficial judgment and misunderstanding of the subject as, for example, this: "Brahms possesses the melancholy of incompetence. He does not create the complete art work. I one subtracts his imitations and borrowings of older great composers and of exotic modern stylists, there remains as his own merely a longing to create. His is too small a person; too little a centripetal force." Seldom has so false a judgment, so half-baked an absurdity been stated with regard to Brahms. The well-nigh inaccessible subjectivity of his creative faculty makes his music, indeed, so much the more admirable. Of this personal equation the E minor Symphony is an extraordinary example. And Karl Muck was master of its tonal language. He is one of the few who in the process of interpretation can create wealth of expression inasmuch as [illegible]

ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 30
From Post
Washington, D. C.

Concerts this week will include the second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Pierre Monteux on Tuesday afternoon, with Louise Homer, American contralto, as soloist, and the Sistine Quartet on Thursday afternoon.

Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

NOV 29 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WEDNESDAY

Louise Homer, Soloist, With Pierre Monteux Orchestra. Peabody Recital Friday. Music To Be Heard Here Later.

Mme. Louise Homer, America's great- st contralto, whose charm of voice nd presence assumes new character in he fullness of her maturity, will be the oloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening. She could scarce- y be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," rom "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's doration" and Handel's so-called "Lar- o" in its original form as an operatic ria, which she will sing at this con- ert. For its symphonic portions, Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's ividly emotional and lastingly popular Pathetic" Symphony, No. 6, and Flor- t Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one the most daring of modern French cores.

From
STAN[illegible]

While new singers come and old ingers go Mme. Louise Homer, the amous contralto, who is to be the oloist at the Boston Symphony con- ert in the Academy of Music to-mor- ow evening, holds and increases her dmiring public season after season. Rich, voluminous and organlike, her ones can electrify Verdi's dramatic aria, "O, Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and elevate to a noble beau- y such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo" in its original form, which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

At Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, to- morrow afternoon, the Philharmonic Society of New York will give a con- cert at which Edwin Hughes will be the assisting artist.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE ORCHESTRAS' PLANS

ersity of Programs and So- oists Announced by Five Or- hestras the second evening concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, to ven in Carnegie Hall next Thurs- Dec. 4, Pierre Monteux will con- Ernest Chausson's Symphony in t, a new work by Charles P. es, based upon Coleridge's sure-Dome of Kubla Khan. kireiff's Symphonic Poem "Tham- and Chabriers "Bourree Fan- ue."

or the Saturday matinee, the pro- n will include [illegible]

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 30 1919 D

TANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 5, Mr. Monteux has arranged a programme wherein a standard and perennially popular symphony is balanced by one of the most daring scores of the day. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony is too well known and liked to need description; Florent Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," written for a mimodrama and so performed in Paris, is one of the most widely discussed of modern French works. The music calls for a female chorus behind the stage. The soloist of this concert will be Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto.

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

LOUISE HOMER AT ACADEMY

Will Appear With Boston Orchestra—Other Musical Events Scheduled.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Dec. 5. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classic masterpieces as Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" and Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, which she will sing a this concert. For its symphonic portion Pierre Monteux will conduct Tschaikowsky's vividly emotional and lastingly popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," one of the most daring of modern French scores, to be sung with a female chorus behind the stage.

rom
Evening Sun
Baltimore, Md.

NOTED SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MME. LOUISE HOMER

The distinguished Metropolitan contralto will be the soloist at the concert to be given this evening at the Lyric by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Boston Symphony Soloist.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, Pierre Monteux has chosen an engrossing programme. It will begin with Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, electric with emotion and tragedy. There will also be interest in the revival of the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Since this number is scored for five solo instruments—the 'cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, it affords a close scrutiny of the fine individual musicianship of virtuosos who lead each of these sections. The closing number will be Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Miss Sophie Braslau, the foremost contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the distinguished soloist of the evening, singing "Ah! Quel Giorno," from Rossini's "Semiramide," and three strikingly dramatic songs by Moussorgsky: "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don," and "On the River Dnyeper."

ESTABLISHED 1881
NOV 30
From Post
Washington, D. C.

Concerts this week will include the second appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Pierre Monteux on Tuesday afternoon, with Louise Homer, American contralto, as soloist, and the Sistine Quartet on Thursday afternoon.

Berlin Hears Karl Muck Again

The citizens of Berlin are today enjoying the conducting of Dr. Karl Muck. From Die Taegliche Rundschau of October 7 comes a review of his first concert. The article was written by Adolf Goettmann, who probably still labors under the belief that Americans are not all they ought to be. Herr Goettmann writes:

"Monday evening we witnessed a greeting of welcome distinguished alike by the high esteem due the artist welcomed and by the spi of heartiest cordiality, when Dr. Karl Muck appeared on the stage of the Philharmonic as conductor of the third of the so-called Weingartner concerts. Many years have passed since he—to the sorrow of many artists and friends of art—was lured by the dollar's call to America's premier conductorship and departed over seas. In return for the intellectual instructions which for years this artist as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra contributed to the inartistic stacks of American gold, he received bitter repayment. His bearing as a loyal German was requited with internment. For many months he waited before the hour of his release was struck. He was recalled again to the scenes of his greatest successes. Here experience. To the German master was extended a temptstous greeting, both orchestra and audience rising for his reception. It is with full satisfaction that we agree with the multitude's opinion. May he now remain with us. Such men and artists are needed by us more than ever. He is a master- artist in the finest sense of the term. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and above all, Brahm's E minor Symphony proved it with ineructable force. After hearing the symphony's first movement even an anti-Brahmsite, like Friedrich Nietche must have been on his guard lest he gave voice to such superficial judgment and misunderstanding of the subject as, for example, this: "Brahms possesses the melancholy of incompetence. He does not create the complete art work. If one subtracts his imitations and borrowings of older great composers and of exotic modern stylists, there remains as his own merely a longing to create. His is too small a person; too little a centripetal force." Seldom has so false a judgment, so half-baked an absurdity been stated with regard to Brahms. The well-nigh inaccessible subjectivity of his creative faculty makes his music, indeed, so much the more admirable. Of this personal equation the E minor Symphony is an extraordinary example. And Karl Muck was master of its tonal language. He is one of the few who in the process of interpretation can create wealth of expression inasmuch as [illegible]

YOUNG AMERICA IN MUSIC

Griffes, Composer of 35, Absorbs Latest Musical Discoveries of Europe and Adds Personality of His Own in Striking Composition—An Expression of the Coming Generation of Native Composers

There is so much talk about American composers and so little actual accomplishment, comparatively speaking, by American composers, that it was extremely refreshing to listen at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the brilliant and imaginative symphonic poem of Charles T. Griffes, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," after the poem of Coleridge. This is a work intoxicating in color and exotic imagination, written with a boldness and an enthusiasm irresistible to the listener.

So this is young America! Or so some might have said. Well, it is a phase, and to our minds a very encouraging phase, of young America when it turns to music. At the very least, we have in Mr. Griffes a young man of 35 who is rapidly assimilating and mastering for use in his own way the best musical material that the creative brains of Europe and Russ have been able to afford up to t present time. Mr. Griffes has not on studied the scores of these compose and analyzed them, but he has fe them, which is a very different thin

ANALYSIS VERSUS FEELING

Anyone can read a score of Ig Strawinsky and note how effectivel he uses the piano or celesta. Hundred of professors and students do this, fo we are at least a progressively dispose people. But what is the result? It i usually a most unhappy or inept mix ing of orchestral colors only justifie by the musical thought which led th original composer to use such colors o his canvas. These same colors, in the hands of a young man who has noth ing to say, simply appear as a collec tion of curiosities. You can feel how ignorant the composer is of what those combinations really mean, as he use them. It is a little fish trying to tal with the voice of a whale, or, if you like, a bluejay trying on the hues of the humming bird. It does not, in a word, ring true.

If you want an example of America imitation—not assimilation, but simpl imitation of European musical formu las—just listen to any one of the lat scores of a composer like Henry Hadley. How loudly these scores sound, yet how commonplace and old-fashioned they are, even today! Yet Mr. Hadley's model is only so old as Richard Strauss, and the earlier works of Richard Strauss are young and overwhelming today. Why? Because Strauss has the substance in these earlier works, while Hadley has the shell.

Mr. Hadley is not alone in this. Urged on by the cry of modernism, American composers who have not the slightest mental or temperamental sympathy with the tendencies of modern European music, mix in all kinds of strange harmonies which they borrow from foreign sources, as though by a pinch of hot seasoning you could give a guest an appetite for a poorly cooked dish.

But Mr. Griffes' is an utterly different case. The general tendencies of ultra-modern men are native to his temperament and musical personality. He has read a great many scores, and is enthusiastic and thoroughly appreciative, one feels, of their finest qualities. He has the sensibility, the intellectual range, in all probability, that his musical perceptions imply. And this is American.

nance, red scarlet tunic, tartan socks and white ducks cut out by a circular saw.

But most appreciative of all was the tallest man, whose seat was by the box rail. He leaned forward with rapt attention when the saxophoners were giving their really remarkably harmony, featured by the sprightly variations of the smallest horn, but had frequently to throw himself backward in his chair in order to give his diaphragm play for the gales of laughter that came over him.

"See those fellows up there," said one tired business man in the audience, "you can tell they're foreigners. Betcha they're delegates to the international labor conference and this sort of stuff is new to 'em. Betcha they'd laugh even more if they knew the words to some of the songs those clowns are giving snatches off of; anyhow they seem to appreciate the musical merits of the stunt. But that bird in front beats me. He's like a kid at his first pantomime."

By this time a considerable audience was enjoying the joy of the man alluded to as much as they were the performance, and the T. B. M.'s companion craned his neck, too.

Caution to Highbrows.

"They're foreigners, all right," said the second T. B. M., "but they're not delegates to any international conference. They're artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra taking a well-earned evening off. And that 'bird,' as you call him, who is having such a gorgeous time, know who he is? Only Rachmaninoff, perhaps, the world's greatest composer-pianist. Say, I only wish that would-be musical 'highbrows,' the kind of folks who pretend to shudder at anything lower in the scale than the classics, could get a look at that beaming countenance. It might teach 'em something."

Some tribute, wasn't it, from a master of one art to the master of another. Those who saw it will say it was.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Post
Washington, D. C.

National—Boston Symphony, Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Mme. Louise Homer, famous contralto, will be the soloist of the occasion. The program: By the orchestra—Chausson's symphony in B flat; "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles P. Griffes, and Liszt's "The Preludes." By Mme. Homer—Verdi's "O Don Fatale," Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Handel's "Largo."

HERALD
ss: Washington, D. C.

National—Mme. Louise Homer.

Madame Louise Homer, America's greatest contralto, whose matchless voice assumes new character and charm with the maturity of the advancing seasons, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the New National Theater, next Tuesday afternoon. She could scarcely be heard to greater advantage than in Verdi's dramatic aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," and such classis masterpieces as "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; Handel's so-called "Largo," in its original form, and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," which she will sing at this concert. For its symphonic portion, Pierre Monteux will conduct Chaussen's impassioned and finely wrought symphony in B flat.

National Sistine Choral Cl[illegible]

From SUN

Address: Pittsburg, Pa.

Date DEC -9

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GREETED BY CROWD

S. R. O. Audience, Bursting With Applause, Shows Regard for Hub Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux presented the fourth of the Ellis concerts last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience was typical of the Ellis series—a S. R. O. multitude with applause that knew no restraint. Pierre Monteux offered a program of numbers that with one exception were novelties in the nth degree. Also it was an anthology of poetry consisting of vers libres and some not quite so free. There were three symphonic poems following each other in rapid succession—and deadly intonation.

When Pierre Monteux came back from France he said he had "a novelty in the way of the Chausson symphony in B-flat major" and that symphony was certainly novel. It was a master work of three contrasted movements that must be heard again and again before judgment should be passed. Chausson, protegee of Franck, wrote in the French idiom and Monteux delineated it in the same way. The "Lent-Allegro" movement was a lovely lateral piece of craftmanship. The second "Tres lent" was replete with sombre beauty and the third "Anime" was a study in thunderous chromaticism. The orchestra gave the symphony an intimate, authoritative rendition.

The second half of the program comprised three symphonic poems. It was a curious bit of program architecture. Three poems, even if they were highly spiced, were quite, as the English say, "A little bit of too much." The program should have closed with the Russian orientation.

The first of the poems was the Cesar Franck "Le Chasseur Maudit" based upon an ambiguous story and narrated in a prosaic manner. It was not the sainted Franck at his best, though the orchestra played it brilliantly.

The second poem was the Balakireff "Thamar" based on a poem by Lermontoff. It was used by Monteux when he traveled with the Russian ballet. The story and the delineative music has a suggestion of the "Thousand and One Nights," it was crowded with amours, orgies, burning kisses and—some well played oboe phrases. Of the three poems it was the most vital and by far the most interesting. Balakireff was not the biggest composer of "the Nationalist five" as his group was called, but he was a dominating figure.

Liszt with his famous "Les Preludes" on the poem by Lamartine, was used to conclude this most enjoyable of orchestral concerts. Pittsburgh has heard "Les Preludes" ever since concerts have been given down at Exposition Hall, so the audience felt it knew every note of the inspired melodies and phrases. Pierre Monteux gave it a suave interpretation. The one outstanding feature about the Liszt "Les Preludes" is that it apparently has nothing to do with the text, which of course adds zest to any poem.

Pierre Monteux and his aggregation from the sacred hub made a most favorable impression. It is to be hoped they will return next year.

Dispatch

Pittsburg, Pa.

Fine Program for Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after an absence of two years, is the treat in store for Ellis concert patrons tomorrow night in Carnegie Music Hall. The orchestra comes under the new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who has entered upon one of the most successful seasons in the history of the celebrated orchestra.

The program, announced here for the

om Gazette Times

Pittsburg, Pa.

Music News and Notes

TWO ORCHESTRA concerts of widely divergent characte were given last week by t Boston Symphony Orchestra, und Pierre Monteux, and the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski. In fact, the differences were so many and so pervasive, in all things from leader and men to programs, that i hardly seems worth while even t start comparison. Mr. Monteux lean toward a classic style in his insist ence upon the broad simplicity o structural lines; Mr. Stokowski show a more romantic vein in the floria tions with which he delights to soften the constructive line. But such simple contrast must not be allowe to stand too crudely, for the forme showed delightful finesse in passage of the Chausson symphony, and non knows better than the latter how t build a climax. It is chiefly a ques tion of emphasis.

Mr. Monteux, it may be added, ca hardly be credited with a magica touch. One admires, one is satisfie of his scholarship and sincerity, bu one's intellectual and emotional re sponse is never brought by him to the point of self-forgetfulness. Such wizardry is by no means impossible t Mr. Stokowski, however, for when h is at his best he can "take the pris oned soul and lap it in Elysium, and in sweet madness rob it of itself"— which is more or less what he did on Friday evening.

If Milton had been living at tha hour he would doubtless have ap proved the application of his words and then, remembering that he was Puritan, he would take occasion t point out the distinction he makes few lines later between such sorcer and the "sacred and home-felt de light" of The Lady's purer art. F the music with which Mr. Stokows made such effect was of the sensuou pagan sort that Milton most delight in, but felt himself in conscien bound to disapprove. It was mere decorative music, lacking the ric ness of human significance that is i separable from greatest art, but (especially the "Scheherezade") rich in the utmost technical refinement for the production of gorgeous sound and nervous reaction.

So far, so good; but even if we were disposed to overlook the fact that the program had no point of gravity in music whose beauty lay more than skin-deep, even if we put all possible stress upon the marvellous verve of its perfomance, we cannot overlook the fact that it was certainly not the sort of program we need and should have. Under the conditions which prevail in this city, which cannot support a great many concerts and must therefore crowd the whole range of its experience into the few it does have, the program is always the most important feature if the performance is at all adequate. And on this point the scales fall entirely to the credit of the Boston Orchestra.

Both the performances of last week, of course, were considerably more than adequate, and Mr. Monteux's program was much more nearly of the kind we should be given. Only one number could be called hackneyed, and "Les Preludes" deserved that epithet a dozen years ago more than it does now. Otherwise he presented works that still had the bloom of freshness upon them, and which were well worth a hearing. I would say still more for the Chausson symphony, an uncommonly interesting French work with which one would welcome opportunity (in moderation) to become more familiar.

Mr. Stokowsky's "all-Russian" program, on the contrary, was made up of the most threadbare works of that repertory. Only the "Pathetic Symphony" and the "Overture 1812" were missing. Any one of the numbers would have been welcome, if he had surrounded it with others that were not so much a matter of old routine; he has himself brought forward Russian compositions, such as the Borodine symphony, which would have sufficed; and there are other important works that have never been given here, or at least not for many years, that would have been still better.

Even the entire program as it stood might have been borne, if the preceding one had been different. This orchestra gives but 10 concerts a year in Pittsburgh, with only five different programs, and these afford the only, very meagre opportunity for a definitely educational or artistic policy. Four of these concerts are now spent, and not a single composition has been offered (I except Mme. Matzenauer's contribution) that does not suggest the "popular programs" that are generally offered in larger cities at reduced rates. There would be reason to offer such things at the Saturday matinees, where a rising generation less familiar with them may be looked for in the audience. But if the same program is to be repeated for evening and afternoon, the evening standard should be maintained. Mr. Stokowski is treating our public as children.

Why he does so is a mystery, and I can guess at no explanation that would be very creditable. It is certainly not because there is any lack of great and beautiful and delightful music in the boundless literature for the orchestra. And one is loath to suspect that, at the expense of the public, he is exploiting himself in rivalry with other conductors who have lately given these same works, especially as he is surely intelligent enough to know that he gained more prestige by "putting over" the Bach triple-concerto than would come to him by any superiority over a hundred others in the performance of far lighter works.

The other concert of the week was that given by the Paulist Choristers, a delightful event which, however, does not call for additional comment. Some very fine music was given, of which the Bach number stands out most clearly in the memory; and the solo work of John Finnegan, an uncommonly good tenor, and of little Thomas Coats, was very enjoyable—not to mention the reappearance of John McCloskey. It is to be hoped that the visits of this organization will become a regular feature of the season here.

GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

LEADER

Pittsburgh, Pa. NOV 30 19

Symphony Orchestra On Concert Program

After an absence of two years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Pittsburg for a concert at Carnegie Music hall on Monday evening, December 8, marking the fourth concert in the Ellis series under the management of May Beegle. Much interest is attached to the orchestra's visit here under its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux has long been famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout his renowned "Concerts Monteux." He first came to the United States as conductor of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, the public came to know and admire his great abilities.

The orchestra is now enjoying one of the most brilliant seasons in its history.

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAPH

ss: Pittsburg, Pa. NOV 29 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BE HERE DECEMBER 8

After an absence of two years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Pittsburgh for a concert at Carnegie Music Hall, Monday night December 8, marking the fourth concert in the Ellis series under the management of May Beegle. Much interest is attached to the orchestra's visit here under their new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux has long been famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux." He first came to the United States as conductor of the Russian Ballet in 1916. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now enjoying one of the most brilliant seasons in its history.

ONICLE-TELEGRAPH

Pittsburg, Pa. DEC 9 - 19

BOSTON MUSICIANS SCORE

Large Audience Pleased With the Music Played by Famous Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr was the attraction at Carnegie Mus Hall last night, giving the four concert of the Ellis series. The hou was quite sold out, for a concert this superb organization is a ra musical event. The new conductor the orchestra, Pierre Monteaux evinced a genuine mastery of th complex organization and kept his musicians up to their work, thus maintaining the reputation of Boston's great musical asset. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that a symphony orchestra of 100 men is an expensive concern. Its founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, died a fortnight ago, and it was stated, in accounts of his life, there was seldom a year, since its inception in 1881, when he was not called upon to make up deficits ranging from $2,000 to $40,000. But he never begrudged the money. It was his hobby.

Last night's program was delightful. The symphony was Chauson's Op 20, in B flat major, a work of rare enjoyment, and varied tonal effects. It has three movements, broadly conceived and nobly erecuted, and is a magnificent example of French instrumental composition. At its close the applause was generous and insistent, and Conductor Monteux caused his men to rise in acknowledgment, thus sharing the appreciation of the audience. The second half of the program was composed of three numbers, all of which were well received, and afforded a pleasing variety of theme. They included Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and the well-known "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

From POST

Address Pittsburgh, Pa.

Date

ELLIS CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series at Carnegie Music Hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburgh for two years and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor. The program tonight will include several interesting works new to Pittsburgh. The program:

Musical Excursion Furnished by Boston Orchestra Is Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth Ellis concert before a full house in Carnegie Music Hall last night, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The publication of the program for this concert produced among the musicians of the city a thrill of intense satisfaction. Out of material practically unfamiliar to us a master hand had selected only four compositions, all major works to be sure, but of such astounding variety, and of a superlativeness guaranteed by such names as Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, that the interest of all wide-awakes was kindled. We were to embark on an excursion that, at any rate, would lead us far from "the alley of chestnuts."

M Monteux as a conductor is far from sensational, in fact he gives the impression of a Gaul refined but somewhat repressed. However, his beat is decisive and his orchestra speaks for him, which after all is "the" way, for his effects in toto are undeniably superb.

The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," aroused much speculation as to what a Chausson, to us chiefly made manifest heretofore as a writer of exquisite lyrics, chamber pieces, and symphonic poems, would have to say in a larger form. Now we know, thanks to M Monteux, and we have heard Chausson give utterance in a broader way to his wealth of thronging musical ideas. While not entirely devoid of gaiety the whole symphony is of sombre tone, the first movement massive and austere, relieved and awakened at the magic touch of the harp to an "allegro vivo" of haunting charm. The harp seemed to inspire Chausson (Saul-like) to a train of more cheerful thought. The second movement recalled thematically, time and time again, the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky. Interestingly worked out in his own way, the same ideas had presented themselves to Chausson, with a result in atmosphere quite similar. The third movement contains brilliant scoring for the strings, and an episode of striking beauty for the brass, in which a trumpet solo, done with remarkable purity of tone, arrested the attention. Many lovely melodies are developed in this symphony.

Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" is a startlingly realistic tonal narrative based

Pittsburg Dispatch

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

It has been two years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last played here and much water has flown under the Federal street bridge since then. Now the Boston Orchestra is not a virtuosi orchestra; it is a straightaway organization without any desire to over-accentuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, a virtuoso director; the nuage of a nuance and the subtlety of a suggestion concern him not at all, and for these and kindred blessings, great thanks. The last time Pierre Monteux was here was when the Russian ballet wiped the coal dust out of our collective eye—that we might see the better—so we are more or less familiar with his powers—and his restraint. He is a forceful conductor, but not a brilliant leader.

The program opened with a marvelous symphony by that most gifted of French song writers, Ernest Chausson. Chausson, with Vincent d'Indy (both pupils of Cesar Franck) and Gabriel Faure and Charles Bordes, were a potential faction in music in France. To them is due the Schola Cantorum. There were times last night when Chausson seemed to be peering out from beneath the Cesar Franck symphonic mantle, and there were other times when he seemed to be singing nothing but his charming chansons. The symphony was in three movements, "Lent," a morbid mood; "Tres lent," woe without the attendant wail, and "Anime," a battle-cock and shuttle-dore motivation, and a movement of great beauty. It may not be the sensational symphony of the year, but it is well worth a second hearing. We commend it to the City of Brotherly Love.

The Cesar Franck symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and, by the way, there were three of them, which was two too many, revealed Pere Franck without his customary halo. The poem was more cerebral than literary. Now the Balakireff symphonic poem "Thamar," which followed close on the heels of the Franck poem, was a chassis of another color. (Just why anyone should go to the "Follies" when they can read the scenario of a Russian symphonic poem, is a mystery.) Here we had another Russian excursion into sensuous Orientalism. Balakireff, leader of the "famous five" or "The Kouchka," with his Rimsky-Korsakow reminiscences—or was it the other way?—gave his poem a pastiche of episodes that were—well, to say the least, pages from "Vanity Fair" and all that. It was plangent and gorgeous and "Scherherezade" with another twist.

The Liszt "Les Preludes," with its old familiar friendliness, closed the program. It was Liszt in his apogee, when he forgot his tonsure and left bell, book and candle far behind. It was lovingly played and lovingly received.

Carnegie Hall was crowded last night and the consensus of opinion was the wish that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might return. There was also a slight wonderment among the ribald and unholy cognoscenti as to whether Leopold Stokowski would repeat the Boston program at his next visit and show us how it should be played—or are those things merely coincidental coniciences?

H. B. G.

m PRESS

lress Pittsburgh, Pa.

e DEC -8 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TONIGHT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie music hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburg for two years and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, French conductor. The program tonight will include several works new to Pittsburg. It follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20.

Lent: Allegro vivo: Tres lent: Anime.

Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" (The Wild Huntsman).

Symphonic Poem.

Balakireff, "Thamar," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra.

(After a Poem of Michail Lermontoff.)

Liszt, "Les Preludes." Symph

PRESS

Pittsburgh, Pa. DEC -9 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES IN CONCERT.

Interesting chiefly because of its pleasing unfamiliarily, the program given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Carnegie Music hall, with Pierre Monteux directing, made the fourth Ellis concert a delightful affair.

The composers represented were Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, and only "Les Preludes" by the last is really well-known here. The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," is really a wonderful work and was rendered in a masterly manner. Franck was represented by "Le Chasseur Maudit," a realistic tonal narrative with a terrific climax. Balakireff gave "Thamar," a typically eastern, sensuous riot of noise.

The audience was large and welcomed the orchestra, with its new leader, enthusiastically. Monteux had been heard here before with the Russian ballet, but his work shows

From SUN

Address: Pittsburg, Pa.

Date DEC -9

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GREETED BY CROWD

S. R. O. Audience, Bursting With Applause, Shows Regard for Hub Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux presented the fourth of the Ellis concerts last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience was typical of the Ellis series—a S. R. O. multitude with applause that knew no restraint. Pierre Monteux offered a program of numbers that with one exception were novelties in the nth degree. Also it was an anthology of poetry consisting of vers libres and some not quite so free. There were three symphonic poems following each other in rapid succession—and deadly intonation.

When Pierre Monteux came back from France he said he had "a novelty in the way of the Chausson symphony in B-flat major" and that symphony was certainly novel. It was a master work of three contrasted movements that must be heard again and again before judgment should be passed. Chausson, protegee of Franck, wrote in the French idiom and Monteux delineated it in the same way. The "Lent-Allegro" movement was a lovely lateral piece of craftmanship. The second "Tres lent" was replete with sombre beauty and the third "Anime" was a study in thunderous chromaticism. The orchestra gave the symphony an intimate, authoritative rendition.

The second half of the program comprised three symphonic poems. It was a curious bit of program architecture. Three poems, even if they were highly spiced, were quite, as the English say, "A little bit of too much." The program should have closed with the Russian orientation.

The first of the poems was the Cesar Franck "Le Chasseur Maudit" based upon an ambiguous story and narrated in a prosaic manner. It was not the sainted Franck at his best, though the orchestra played it brilliantly.

The second poem was the Balakireff "Thamar" based on a poem by Lermontoff. It was used by Monteux when he traveled with the Russian ballet. The story and the delineative music has a suggestion of the "Thousand and One Nights," it was crowded with amours, orgies, burning kisses and—some well played oboe phrases. Of the three poems it was the most vital and by far the most interesting. Balakireff was not the biggest composer of "the Nationalist five" as his group was called, but he was a dominating figure.

Lisat with his famous "Les Preludes" on the poem by Lamartine, was used to conclude this most enjoyable of orchestral concerts. Pittsburgh has heard "Les Preludes" ever since concerts have been given down at Exposition Hall, so the audience felt it knew every note of the inspired melodies and phrases. Pierre Monteux gave it a suave interpretation. The one outstanding feature about the Liszt "Les Preludes" is that it apparently has nothing to do with the text, which of course adds zest to any poem.

Pierre Monteux and his aggregation from the sacred hub made a most favorable impression. It is to be hoped they will return next year.

Dispatch

Pittsburg, Pa.

Fine Program for Boston Symphony

Pierre Monteux

A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after an absence of two years, is the treat in store for Ellis concert patrons tomorrow night in Carnegie Music Hall. The orchestra comes under the new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, who has entered upon one of the most successful seasons in the history of the celebrated orchestra.

The program, announced here for the

om Gazette Times

Pittsburg, Pa.

Music News and Notes

TWO ORCHESTRA concerts of widely divergent characte were given last week by t Boston Symphony Orchestra, un Pierre Monteux, and the Philadelp Orchestra, under Leopold Stokow In fact, the differences were so many and so pervasive, in all things from leader and men to programs, that i hardly seems worth while even t start comparison. Mr. Monteux lean toward a classic style in his insis ence upon the broa simplicity structural lines; Mr. Stokowski sho a more romantic vei in the flo tions with which he delights to s the constructive line. But such simple contrast must not be allowe to stand too crudely, for the forme showed delightful finesse in passage of the Chausson symphony, and non knows better than the latter how t build a climax. It is chiefly a ques tion of emphasis.

Mr. Monteux, it may be added, ca hardly be credited with a magica touch. One admires, one is satisfie of his scholarship and sincerity, bu one's intellectual and emotional re sponse is never brought by him to th point of self-forgetfulness. Such wiz ardry is by no means impossible t Mr. Stokowski, however, for when h is at his best he can "take the pris oned soul and lap it in Elysium, and in sweet madness rob it of itself"— which is more or less what he did on Friday evening.

If Milton had been living at that hour he would doubtless have ap proved the application of his words and then, remembering that he was Puritan, he would take occasion t point out the distinction he makes few lines later between such sorcer and the "sacred and home-felt de light" of The Lady's purer art. F the music with which Mr. Stokowsk made such effect was of the sensuou pagan sort that Milton most delight in, but felt himself in conscien bound to disapprove. It was mere decorative music, lacking the rich ness of human significance that is in separable from greatest art, but (es pecially the "Scheherezade") rich in the utmost technical refinement for the production of gorgeous sound and nervous reaction.

So far, so good; but even if we were disposed to overlook the fact that the program had no point of gravity in music whose beauty lay more than skin-deep, even if we put all possible stress upon the marvellous verve of its perfomance, we cannot overlook the fact that it was certainly not the sort of program we need and should have. Under the conditions which prevail in this city, which cannot support a great many concerts and must therefore crowd the whole range of its experience into the few it does have, the program is always the most important feature if the performance is at all adequate. And on this point the scales fall entirely to the credit of the Boston Orchestra.

Both the performances of last week, of course, were considerably more than adequate, and Mr. Monteux's program was much more nearly of the kind we should be given. Only one number could be called hackneyed, and "Les Preludes" deserved that epithet a dozen years ago more than it does now. Otherwise he presented works that still had the bloom of freshness upon them, and which were well worth a hearing. I would say still more for the Chausson symphony, an uncommonly interesting French work with which one would welcome opportunity (in moderation) to become more familiar.

Mr. Stokowsky's "all-Russian" program, on the contrary, was made up of the most threadbare works of that repertory. Only the "Pathetic Symphony" and the "Overture 1812" were missing. Any one of the numbers would have been welcome, if he had surrounded it with others that were not so much a matter of old routine; he has himself brought forward Russian compositions, such as the Borodine symphony, which would have sufficed; and there are other important works that have never been given here, or at least not for many years, that would have been still better.

Even the entire program as it stood might have been borne, if the preceding one had been different. This orchestra gives but 10 concerts a year in Pittsburgh, with only five different programs, and these afford the only, very meagre opportunity for a definitely educational or artistic policy. Four of these concerts are now spent, and not a single composition has been offered (I except Mme. Matzenauer's contribution) that does not suggest the "popular programs" that are generally offered in larger cities at reduced rates. There would be reason to offer such things at the Saturday matinees, where a rising generation less familiar with them may be looked for in the audience. But if the same program is to be repeated for evening and afternoon, the evening standard should be maintained. Mr. Stokowski is treating our public as children.

Why he does so is a mystery, and I can guess at no explanation that would be very creditable. It is certainly not because there is any lack of great and beautiful and delightful music in the boundless literature for the orchestra. And one is loath to suspect that, at the expense of the public, he is exploiting himself in rivalry with other conductors who have lately given these same works, especially as he is surely intelligent enough to know that he gained more prestige by "putting over" the Bach triple-concerto than would come to him by any superiority over a hundred others in the performance of far lighter works.

The other concert of the week was that given by the Paulist Choristers, a delightful event which, however, does not call for additional comment. Some very fine music was given, of which the Bach number stands out most clearly in the memory; and the solo work of John Finnegan, an uncommonly good tenor, and of little Thomas Coats, was very enjoyable—not to mention the reappearance of John McCloskey. It is to be hoped that the visits of this organization will become a regular feature of the season here.

GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

LEADER

Pittsburgh, Pa.

Symphony Orchestra On Concert Program

After an absence of two years, the Boston Symphony orchestra will return to Pittsburg for a concert at Carnegie Music hall on Monday evening, December 8, marking the fourth concert in the Ellis series under the management of May Beegle. Much interest is attached to the orchestra's visit here under its new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux has long been famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout his renowned "Concerts Monteux." He first came to the United States as conductor of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan opera house, the public came to know and admire his great abilities.

The orchestra is now enjoying one of the most brilliant seasons in its history.

CHRONICLE-TELEGRAPH

ss: Pittsburg, Pa.

NOV 8 8

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO BE HERE DECEMBER 8

After an absence of two years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will return to Pittsburgh for a concert at Carnegie Music Hall, Monday night December 8, marking the fourth concert in the Ellis series under the management of May Beegle. Much interest is attached to the orchestra's visit here under their new French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux has long been famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux." He first came to the United States as conductor of the Russian Ballet in 1916. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now enjoying one of the most brilliant seasons in its history.

RONICLE-TELEGRAPH

Pittsburg, Pa.

DEC 9 - 1919

BOSTON MUSICIANS SCORE

Large Audience Pleased With the Music Played by Famous Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestr was the attraction at Carnegie Mus Hall last night, giving the four concert of the Ellis series. The hou was quite sold out, for a concert this superb organization is a ra musical event. The new conductor the orchestra, Pierre Monteaux evinced a genuine mastery of th complex organization and kept his musicians up to their work, thus maintaining the reputation of Boston's great musical asset. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that a symphony orchestra of 100 men is an expensive concern. Its founder, Maj. Henry L. Higginson, died a fortnight ago, and it was stated, in accounts of his life, there was seldom a year, since its inception in 1881, when he was not called upon to make up deficits ranging from $2,000 to $40,000. But he never begrudged the money. It was his hobby.

Last night's program was delightful. The symphony was Chauson's Op 20, in B flat major, a work of rare enjoyment, and varied tonal effects. It has three movements, broadly conceived and nobly executed, and is a magnificent example of French instrumental composition. At its close the applause was generous and insistent, and Conductor Monteux caused his men to rise in acknowledgment, thus sharing the appreciation of the audience. The second half of the program was composed of three numbers, all of which were well received, and afforded a pleasing variety of theme. They included Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and the well-known "Les Preludes," by Liszt.

From POST

Address Pittsburgh, Pa.

Date

ELLIS CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series at Carnegie Music Hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburgh for two years and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the celebrated French conductor. The program tonight will include several interesting works new to Pittsburgh. The program:

(Chausson ...

Musical Excursion Furnished by Boston Orchestra Is Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth Ellis concert before a full house in Carnegie Music Hall last night, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The publication of the program for this concert produced among the musicians of the city a thrill of intense satisfaction. Out of material practically unfamiliar to us a master hand had selected only four compositions, all major works to be sure, but of such astounding variety, and of a superlativeness guaranteed by such names as Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, that the interest of all wide-awakes was kindled. We were to embark on an excursion that, at any rate, would lead us far from "the alley of chestnuts."

M Monteux as a conductor is far from sensational, in fact he gives the impression of a Gaul refined but somewhat repressed. However, his beat is decisive and his orchestra speaks for him, which after all is "the" way, for his effects in toto are undeniably superb.

The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," aroused much speculation as to what a Chausson, to us chiefly made manifest heretofore as a writer of exquisite lyrics, chamber pieces, and symphonic poems, would have to say in a larger form. Now we know, thanks to M Monteux, and we have heard Chausson give utterance in a broader way to his wealth of thronging musical ideas. While not entirely devoid of gaiety the whole symphony is of sombre tone, the first movement massive and austere, relieved and awakened at the magic touch of the harp to an "allegro vivo" of haunting charm. The harp seemed to inspire Chausson (Saul-like) to a train of more cheerful thought. The second movement recalled thematically, time and time again, the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky. Interestingly worked out in his own way, the same ideas had presented themselves to Chausson, with a result in atmosphere quite similar. The third movement contains brilliant scoring for the strings, and an episode of striking beauty for the brass, in which a trumpet solo, done with remarkable purity of tone, arrested the attention. Many lovely melodies are developed in this symphony.

Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" is a startlingly realistic tonal narrative based

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

It has been two years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last played here and much water has flown under the Federal street bridge since then. Now the Boston Orchestra is not a virtuosi orchestra; it is a straightaway organization without any desire to over-accentuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, a virtuoso director, the nuage of a nuance and the subtlety of a suggestion concern him not at all, and for these and kindred blessings, great thanks. The last time Pierre Monteux was here was when the Russian ballet wiped the coal dust out of our collective eye—that we might see the better—so we are more or less familiar with his powers—and his restraint. He is a forceful conductor, but not a brilliant leader.

The program opened with a marvelous symphony by that most gifted of French song writers, Ernest Chausson. Chausson, with Vincent d'Indy (both pupils of Cesar Franck) and Gabriel Faure and Charles Bordes, were a potential faction in music in France. To them is due the Schola Cantorum. There were times last night when Chausson seemed to be peering out from beneath the Cesar Franck symphonic mantle, and there were other times when he seemed to be singing nothing but his charming chansons. The symphony was in three movements, "Lent," a morbid mood; "Tres lent," woe without the attendant wail, and "Anime," a battle-cock and shuttle-dore motivation, and a movement of great beauty. It may not be the sensational symphony of the year, but it is well worth a second hearing. We commend it to the City of Brotherly Love.

The Cesar Franck symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and, by the way, there were three of them, which was two too many, revealed Cesar Franck without his customary halo. The poem was more cerebral than literary. Now the Balakireff symphonic poem "Thamar," which followed close on the heels of the Franck poem, was a chassis of another color. (Just why anyone should go to the "Follies" when they can read the scenario of a Russian symphonic poem, is a mystery.) Here we had another Russian excursion into sensuous Orientalism. Balakireff, leader of the "famous five" or "The Kouchka," with his Rimsky-Korsakow reminiscences—or was it the other way?—gave his poem a pastiche of episodes that were—well, to say the least, pages from "Vanity Fair" and all that. It was plangent and gorgeous and "Scherherezade" with another twist.

The Liszt "Les Preludes," with its old familiar friendliness, closed the program. It was Liszt in his apogee, when he forgot his tonsure and left bell, book and candle far behind. It was lovingly played and lovingly received.

Carnegie Hall was crowded last night and the consensus of opinion was that wish that the Boston Symphony Orchestra might return. There was also a slight wonderment among the ribald and unholy cognoscenti as to whether Leopold Stokowski would repeat the Boston program at his next visit and show us how it should be played—or are those things merely coincidental coinci- dences?

H. B. G.

m PRESS

dress Pittsburgh, Pa.

e DEC -8 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TONIGHT.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series in Carnegie music hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburg for two years and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, French conductor. The program tonight will include several works new to Pittsburg. It follows:

Chausson, Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20.
Lent; Allegro vivo: Tres lent: Anime.
Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" (The Wild Huntsman).
Symphonic Poem.
Balakireff, "Thamar," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra.
(After a Poem of Michail Lermontoff.)
Liszt, "Les Preludes," Symph...

PRESS

Pittsburgh, Pa.

DEC -9 1

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES IN CONCERT.

Interesting chiefly because of its pleasing unfamiliarily, the program given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Carnegie Music hall, with Pierre Monteux directing, made the fourth Ellis concert a delightful affair.

The composers represented were Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, and only "Les Preludes" by the last is really well-known here. The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," is really a wonderful work and was rendered in a masterly manner. Franck was represented by "Le Chasseur Maudit," a realistic tonal narrative with a terrific climax. Balakireff gave "Thamar," a typically eastern, sensuous riot of noise.

The audience was large and welcomed the orchestra, with its new leader, enthusiastically. Monteux had been heard here before with the Russian ballet, but his work shows

Pittsburg Dispatch

MUSIC--The Boston Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, came last night to Carnegie Music Hall to give the fourth concert in the Ellis series. The house was filled with a cordial audience that was also a curious one. Neither orchestra nor conductor, it is true, was strange in this city, for the orchestra came pretty regularly until the vicissitudes of war and the behavior of Dr. Muck interfered, and Mr. Monteaux was here about three years ago with Diaghileff's "Ballet Russe." But the man and the organization had not appeared in conjunction before and, as the Boston Symphony is one of our most treasured institutions, the circumstance had more than ordinary interest.

We were grateful to the conductor for the fresh program that he had prepared, especially in view of the threadbare list that Mr. Stokowski has arranged for later in the week. It consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B-flat and three symphonic poems—"Le Chasseur Maudit" by Cesar Franck, Balakireff's "Thamar," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The Liszt is anything but fresh, of course, and shows more blatant and sentimental with every repetition, but it was an exception. The Chausson and Franck numbers have not been played here for many years, if they ever were played, and "Thamar" has latterly been brought forward but once, and then in connection with the ballet.

The symphony is one of the strongest instrumental works that modern France has produced. Though in but three movements it is conceived on a large scale, with great breadth and seriousness of thought. The thematic material is varied and uncommonly interesting, with clearly defined melodic characteristics and virile rhythm: its working-out, moreover, is logical and expressive. The impressionistic orchestration was luminous, masterly in its way, but sometimes seemed rather slight in texture to bear the weight of the other qualities of the work.

As for the Franck tone-poem, any large work by this composer is to be welcomed, as things stand, for our concert halls know little of anything but this symphony. So it is a minor consideration that this particular composition is less interesting than either the symphony or the variations for piano and orchestra. The story he adopted at times drives him into a rather dull literalness, and at other times he forgets it too long while he develops his themes along abstract musical lines. Of the exotic "Thamar" one need only say that its colors are as glowing, its rhythms as piquant, its climaxes as barbaric as one has a right to expect from a nationalistic Russian composer.

The orchestra, both in the wind sections and in the violins, has in times past had a mellower tone, but it remains a great organization. The attack was excellent and the shading was generally responsive to the leader's direction. But this was not exacting—the readings of Mr. Monteux do not call for much nuance. His style is curiously like that which Mr. Messager showed with the Conservatoire Orchestra last year, with a stronger dramatic sense, perhaps, and with less fragile refinement of detail. He unfolds the broader outlines of a composition with a sure and effective gesture, but he scarcely attempts to soften or enrich them. There were passages in the second part of the program that were almost mechanical, and there were few moments of magic at any time, or even of that agility of thought we expect in a Frenchman. Yet at the same time his work is logical, sincere, and it may be that we hear too much of the "virtuoso" type of orchestral performance.

GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

Pittsburgh T

This Clipping Appeared in the
BUFFALO, (N. Y.) COMMERCIAL
DEC 11 1919

ORCHESTRA IN GREAT CONCERT

BY FRANK W. BALCH.

The great Boston Symphony orchestra, with a new conductor, Pierre Monteux, presented the concluding concert in the Ellis series in Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a large and highly enthusiastic audience.

Heard at both Chautauqua last summer and here a few weeks ago, Beethoven's Symphony, D major, No. 2, was presented with unusual warmth and great brilliancy in all of its four parts. This was the opening number on the program, and its reception so cordial that it appeared certain an extra treat in nature of an encore was due, but Conductor Monteux apparently does not believe that extra numbers add much to the attractiveness of an evening's program, for he doesn't give any, no matter how insistent the applause. At least he didn't last night.

There was a wealth of gorgeous tone-painting in Franck's musical setting for Burger's poem, The Wild Huntsman (Le Chasseur Maudit), and in Debussy's The Afternoon of a Faun, in the latter exquisite offering the beautiful harp being given considerable prominence.

Liszt's Les Preludes, also heard in Buffalo but a short time ago, was the last of the evening. The perfect rendition moved the audience to remain seated and lavish liberal ovations on conductor and his band of trained musicians.

This Clipping Appeared in the
BUFFALO, (N. Y.) ENQUIRER
DEC 11 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHARMS AT THE MUSIC HALL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, gave a concert last evening in the Elmwood Music hall. Two numbers, Beethoven's D major Symphony, No. 2, and Liszt's Les Preludes, included in the programme, were played here less than three weeks ago by the New York Symphony orchestra, who's conductor is Walter Damrosch. Cesar Franck's Le Chasseur Maudit was rendered and attracted great interest because of its intense dramatic theme, which is based on Burger's gruesome poem. The Wild Huntsman and Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme concluded the performance.

Mr. Monteux's quiet direction of the orchestra greatly impressed the audience throughout the evening, but especially during the rendition of the Franck composition when especial clearness of tone showed rare spontaniety and freshness of performance that was truly delightful. Last evening's concert was very different from similar performances for the past three seasons under the direction of Dr. Muck.

The acamadic style of Dr. Muck has been delightfully replaced by lighter, luminious playing, never marred for an instant by thickness or obscurity of tone. Monteux's achievement was cordially recognized and his men shared honor with him at the close of the concert.

The concert was the last of the Ellis course to be given this season. A second series will be given in Buffalo in 1920.

BUFFALO, N.Y.
DEC 11 1919
NEWS

LISZT PRELUDE BEYOND LEADER

Symphony Orchestra Pleases, But Pierre Monteux Not at Home in Entire Program.

By AMY GRAHAM.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the final concert of the Ellis series last night in Elmwood Music hall. The orchestra is conducted this year, its 39th season, by Pierre Monteux. This organization occupies a unique place in American music, its standards and equipment being of the finest quality. The years of association and training under some of the greatest conductors in the world, have brought about a unity, devotion and quality of performance that is as rare as it is beautiful.

Last night's program included Beethoven's D major symphony Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's Prelude, 3.

The symphony was played in conventional, even perfunctory manner, through the first two moveme; the scherzo, with its keener mental quality, evidently making stronger appeal to Mr. Monteux, to say nothing of being more within his power as an interpreter. With this as a prompter, the infectious spirit continued through the finale, which was most successfully and brilliantly presented.

With the poem by Franck came a remarkable infusion of greater vitality and multiplication of color effects in the orchestra. This was even more noticeable in the Debussy number. The notes of a phrase gave here and added there, as in inspired eloquence when the heart dictates both speech and mode of speaking. It needed no program notes to know that from a national and contemporary viewpoint, the music was infinitely closer akin to Mr. Monteux. The Franck composition, was, as always with this composer, singularly individual, though it holds in itself both past and future as it was to affect French music. The underlying poetical idea on which the work was based, was portrayed with extraordinary vividness, with the increased power given by music for the expression of feelings and their reaction.

The Debussy work, with its delicate and marvelously subtle painting of the curious imaginings of Mallarme, so evanescent as to all but escape being caught by poet or musician, received an exquisitely beautiful performance. The shading and shifting of phrase and color were endlessly amazing. Liszt's third prelude was played with all possible pomp and splendor but it seemed very much like putting a noble instrument to not exactly noble uses. Mr. Monteux is neither here nor in the symphony, on native ground and seems not to have sufficient resources as musician or conductor to compass in height and depth such a program as last night's in its entirety. It is just a case of stature and cubits.

A capacity audience was in attendance and gave spontaneous and increasingly enthusiastic proof of pleasure in the performance.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
DEC 11 1919
EXPRESS

Concert of the Boston Symphony Pierre Monteux as conductor

The last concert in the Ellis course for this season was given last evening in Elmwood Music hall by the Boston symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The programme included two works played here less than three weeks ago by the New York symphony orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, Beethoven's D major symphony, No. 2, and Liszt's Les Preludes. The other numbers of the programme were Cesar Franck's Le Chasseur Maudit, based on Burger's weird and gruesome poem, The Wild Huntsman, and Debussy's The Afternoon of a Faun, after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme.

The Franck work proved of special interest both because of the rarity of its performance in this city, and because of its intensely dramatic character. Portraying the story of a sacrilegious Count of the Rhine, who led his wild riders to the chase on the holy Sabbath, while the church bells called the pious to worship, and who for his ungodliness was accursed and condemned to flee, ever pursued by a pack of demons, this symphonic poem is a writing of thrilling effect. It bears few of the hallmarks of Franck the mystic, as we know him in his other works. The shifting harmonies which avoid the obvious and natural resolutions, the fragmentary melodies, that are found in his choral writings, his chamber music and in the symphony, are here absent. With well defined themes and quite conventional harmonic progressions, Le Chasseur Maudit is a tone picture of gripping nature, that fires the imagination and stirs the pulses.

In the performance of the Franck composition, as in the other numbers, the playing of the orchestra impressed particularly by its remarkable clarity. It was fairly luminous playing, never blurred by thickness or obscurity of tone. And whether due to the new conductor, the new material in the orchestra, or both, there was a rare spontaneity and freshness of performance that was delightful. Mr. Monteux directs his forces quietly, but there is a dynamic energy in his movements that is felt, not alone by his players, but by the hearers, who are transported with him into the very spirit of the music he presents. It is quite different from the academic performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra during its last three seasons under Dr. Muck. Great beauty of tone and all the essentials of splendid orchestral playing marked last evening's concert, and, above and beyond all, was that vital force and fervor

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Famous Orchestra Appears After Long Absence With New Leader.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in Cleveland last night for the first time in several years. As was easy to foresee, the Grays armory was crowded to capacity.

For three decades this orchestra was the model and exemplar for all to follow. Naturally there was, aside from the anticipatory pleasure in the performance, much interest to discover, in so far as the playing of a single program could reveal it, what might be the methods and artistic viewpoint of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, and what changes, if any, had taken place in the orchestra itself in the stressful years just past. For this orchestra has come close to being, if it has not actually been, a national institution.

Well, there have been changes, and it would be idle to say that they have been wholly for the better. As to the personnel, we believe it is mostly the same—as to this we are unable to speak with authority—but yet there have been important changes in this respect. As to interpretation, by which of course we mean the readings of Mr. Monteux and as to the tones he summons from his players, the difference is still more marked.

Never have we heard the orchestra play with such vitality, with such vigor, with such tremendous impacts of sound in swelling fortissimos, in crashing sforzandos. And this, although its numbers seemed less than of old.

The Bostonians of our earlier acquaintance not infrequently had moments of somnolence, as a virtuoso, making light of technical obstacles, may, unless he take heed lapse into perfunctariness. Yet they had unvarying suavity and beauty of tone.

There were no somnolent moments last night; but we could have wished that with the abounding spirit with which the new Bostonians played, there had been joined a warmer euphony, and a more justly balanced ensemble. Plainly, Mr. Monteux is a believer in the broad outline, in the boldly set forth melodic line. And here we are by no means inclined to disagree with him. But along with these, varying them, supplementing them, there should be the subtle inflections of phrase, the cunning working out of details, the artful gradations of sound.

In a word, it appeared to us that orchestra and conductor had not fully found themselves. Another season, and there will be a different story to tell. For there is splendid material in the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux is a gifted, magnetic and enthusiastic leader.

The principal offering was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. It was played in highly dramatic fashion, not wholly, it must be confessed, without exaggeration in emphasis and (in the last movement) in the quite unusual prolongation of the pauses.

Since Mr. Monteux was at one time director of the Russian ballet, it may be assumed that Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," which was at one time often used by the Russian dancers, is particularly a piece to appeal to him. It may be, at that, that it was not used during Mr. Monteux's regime. But we think it was. In any case, it was well done; but we missed something of the poesy and delicate fancy that should inform its exquisite orchestral tracery.

The concert closed with Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Mr. Monteux was cordially greeted and generously—after the third movement of the symphony, stormily—applauded throughout the concert.

The soloist was Jean Bedetti, principal cellist of the orchestra, who was heard in Boellman's "Symphonic Variations." Mr. Bedetti possesses a beautiful tone, notable facility, and plays with much expressiveness. The audience showed its pleasure in his performance by warm and long continued applause, recalling him to the stage several times.

CLEVELAND

om LEADER
dress Pittsburgh, Pa.
te DEC 8 19

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series at Carnegie Music hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburg for two years, and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteaux, the celebrated French conductor. The program tonight will include several interesting works new to Pittsburg, and follows.

Chausson, symphony in B flat major. ....Op2. 20. Lent; Allegro vivo;.... Trees lent; Anime.

Franck..... "Lo Chasseur Mondit" (The Wild Huntsman) Symphonic Poem.

Balakiroff..... "Thamar" Symphonic poem for orchestra After a poem of Michail Lermontoff)

Lis t..... "Les Prelades" Symphonic poem No. 3 (After Lamartime).

Gazette Schenectady Dec. 15th 1919

Boston Symphony Delights a Large Audience at Armory

Beethoven Work Favorite of Program—No-Encore Tradition Preserved.

A large audience heard with delight the beautiful program of the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday night in the state armory. Ben Franklin brought the orchestra here, and music lovers are duly grateful for the privilege of hearing this greatest of symphony organizations of America in one of its interesting recitals. There were the programs with the valuable notes by Philip Hale, too, which always mean so much to the understanding of the music, if one does not read them while the music is being performed. For skimming quickly over beforehand and reading leisurely for remembrance afterward, these notes are an important and enjoyable part of a Boston Symphony concert.

Ths year's conductor, Pierre Monteux, seemed to have his orchestra at just the point of perfection in training that is expected of the players, and he led them through the beautiful intricacies of four splendid orchestra numbers with a manner of conducting which was quiet but not soremote in the high realms of art but that he could not take the applause with a friendly smile for his appreciative admirers. There was a moment after the last number when some thought that an old tradition was broken and that the Boston Symphony would play an encore, but not so. Monteaux merely wished his players to take the applause and when they had all risen and bowed he led the way off the stage.

When a symphony concert is only an occasional privilege as it is in Schenectady, it is a great satisfaction to have a Beethoven symphony on the program. The second, in D major, chosen for this concert, is a very grand and beautiful one. The second, the larghetto, a full-yolced song of many instruments melting in colorful tones of wonderful harmonies, seemed the loveliest thing ever heard as played by these artists. The scherzo is a delightful flower like thing, always with that Beethoven sadness coming like a "flower in the crannied wall." Whe the big composition came to its imposing finale it seemed to the hearers that there could be nothing finer on that or any program and many kept this idea after the concert, the Beethoven being the favorite.

The Balakireff symphonic poem, "Thamar" was startlingly different in style, not only from the preceding number but different from most symphony music. It is program music and the story of the poem which it illustrates is one of Oriental color and passion, tragedy and storm. Many persons did not like it. And it is a curious bit of evidence for its authentic appeal that those same persons would without doubt see the Russian Ballet present the same thing as a ballet and would think they liked it, because the gorgeous spectacle would actually dim their perception of the real feeling of the piece. But it is a splendid story, an Arabian Night's tale and just as entertaining, if not taken too seriously. But how those raging waters of Terek could frighten one!

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" was beautifully given and was well liked. There are many wonderfully fine effects in it, of the quieter sort and the ending is in one of the composer's original moods, the very long, high violin note, held against the harmonious tones of the others. The Liszt symphonic poem was most interesting and gave especially pleasant opportunity to note the uses of the different instrumental choirs and how the composer used them to get his fine effects, the violas, harps, horns, oboes, clarinets and the sunny woodwinds. It has a characteristic Liszt ending, brilliant and loud, which is one o fthe things that makes an audience applaud the louder. But it was rather for the whole concert the audience applauded at the close last night, and expressed sincere satisfaction in th program.

thought

Crowd"

MUSIC--The Boston Orchestr

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux as conductor, came last night to Carnegie Music Hall to give the fourth concert in the Ellis series. The house was filled with a cordial audience that was also a curious one. Neither orchestra nor conductor, it is true, was strange in this city, for the orchestra came pretty regularly until the vicissitudes of war and the behavior of Dr. Muck interfered, and Mr. Monteaux was here about three years ago with Diaghileff's "Ballet Russe." But the man and the organization had not appeared in conjunction before and, as the Boston Symphony is one of our most treasured institutions, the circumstance had more than ordinary interest.

We were grateful to the conductor for the fresh program that he had prepared, especially in view of the threadbare list that Mr. Stokowski has arranged for later in the week. It consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B-flat and three symphonic poems—"Le Chasseur Maudit" by Cesar Franck, Balakireff's "Thamar," and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The Liszt is anything but fresh, of course, and shows more blatant and sentimental with every repetition, but it was an exception. The Chausson and Franck numbers have not been played here for many years, if they ever were played, and "Thamar" has latterly been brought forward but once, and then in connection with the ballet.

The symphony is one of the strongest instrumental works that modern France has produced. Though in but three movements it is conceived on a large scale, with great breadth and seriousness of thought. The thematic material is varied and uncommonly interesting, with clearly defined melodic characteristics and virile rhythm: its working-out, moreover, is logical and expressive. The impressionistic orchestration was luminous, masterly in its way, but sometimes seemed rather slight in texture to bear the weight of the other qualities of the work.

As for the Franck tone-poem, any large work by this composer is to be welcomed, as things stand, for our concert halls know little of anything but this symphony. So it is a minor consideration that this particular composition is less interesting than either the symphony or the variations for piano and orchestra. The story he adopted at times drives him into a rather dull literalness, and at other times he forgets it too long while he develops his themes along abstract musical lines. Of the exotic "Thamar" one need only say that its colors are as glowing, its rhythms as piquant, its climaxes as barbaric as one has a right to expect from a nationalistic Russian composer.

The orchestra, both in the wind sections and in the violins, has in times past had a mellower tone, but it remains a great organization. The attack was excellent and the shading was generally responsive to the leader's direction. But this was not exacting—the readings of Mr. Monteux do not call for much nuance. His style is curiously like that which Mr. Messager showed with the Conservatoire Orchestra last year, with a stronger dramatic sense, perhaps, and with less fragile refinement of detail. He unfolds the broader outlines of a composition with a sure and effective gesture, but he scarcely attempts to soften or enrich them. There were passages in the second part of the program that were almost mechanical, and there were few moments of magic at any time, or even of that agility of thought we expect in a Frenchman. Yet at the same time his work is logical, sincere, and it may be that we hear too much of the "virtuoso" type of orchestral performance.

GLENDINNING KEEBLE.

Pittsburgh T

This Clipping Appeared in the
BUFFALO, (N. Y.) COMMERCIAL

DEC 11 1919

ORCHESTRA IN GREAT CONCERT

BY FRANK W. BALCH.

The great Boston Symphony orchestra, with a new conductor, Pierre Monteux, presented the concluding concert in the Ellis series in Elmwood Music Hall last evening before a large and highly enthusiastic audience.

Heard at both Chautauqua last summer and here a few weeks ago, Beethoven's Symphony, D major, No. 2, was presented with unusual warmth and great brilliancy in all of its four parts. This was the opening number on the program, and its reception so cordial that it appeared certain an extra treat in nature of an encore was due, but Conductor Monteux apparently does not believe that extra numbers add much to the attractiveness of an evening's program, for he doesn't give any, no matter how insistent the applause. At least he didn't last night.

There was a wealth of gorgeous tone-painting in Franck's musical setting for Burger's poem, The Wild Huntsman (Le Chasseur Maudit), and in Debussy's The Afternoon of a Faun, in the latter exquisite offering the beautiful harp being given considerable prominence.

Liszt's Les Preludes, also heard in Buffalo but a short time ago, was the last of the evening. The perfect rendition moved the audience to remain seated and lavish liberal ovations on conductor and his band of trained musicians.

This Clipping Appeared in the
BUFFALO, (N. Y.) ENQUIRER

DEC 11 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CHARMS AT THE MUSIC HALL

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, gave a concert last evening in the Elmwood Music hall. Two numbers, Beethoven's D major Symphony, No. 2, and Liszt's Les Preludes, included in the programme, were played here less than three weeks ago by the New York Symphony orchestra, who's conductor is Walter Damrosch. Cesar Franck's Le Chasseur Maudit was rendered and attracted great interest because of its intense dramatic theme, which is based on Burger's gruesome poem. The Wild Huntsman and Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme concluded the performance.

Mr. Monteux's quiet direction of the orchestra greatly impressed the audience throughout the evening, but especially during the rendition of the Franck composition when especial clearness of tone showed rare spontaniety and freshness of performance that was truly delightful. Last evening's concert was very different from similar performances for the past three seasons under the direction of Dr. Muck.

The acamadic style of Dr. Muck has been delightfully replaced by lighter, luminious playing, never marred for an instant by thickness or obscurity of tone. Monteux's achievement was cordially recognized and his men shared honor with him at the close of the concert.

The concert was the last of the Ellis course to be given this season. A second series will be given in Buffalo in 1920.

BUFFALO, N.Y.

DEC 11 1919

NEWS

LISZT PRELUDE BEYOND LEADER

Symphony Orchestra Pleases, But Pierre Monteux Not at Home in Entire Program.

By AMY GRAHAM.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave the final concert of the Ellis series last night in Elmwood Music hall. The orchestra is conducted this year, its 39th season, by Pierre Monteux. This organization occupies a unique place in American music, its standards and equipment being of the finest quality. The years of association and training under some of the greatest conductors in the world, have brought about a unity, devotion and quality of performance that is as rare as it is beautiful.

Last night's program included Beethoven's D major symphony Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Liszt's Prelude, 3.

The symphony was played in conventional, even perfunctory manner, through the first two moveme; the scherzo, with its keener mental quality, evidently making stronger appeal to Mr. Monteux, to say nothing of being more within his power as an interpreter. With this as a prompter, the infectious spirit continued through the finale, which was most successfully and brilliantly presented.

With the poem by Franck came a remarkable infusion of greater vitality and multiplication of color effects in the orchestra. This was even more noticeable in the Debussy number. The notes of a phrase gave here and added there, as in inspired eloquence when the heart dictates both speech and mode of speaking. It needed no program notes to know that from a national and contemporary viewpoint, the music was infinitely closer akin to Mr. Monteux. The Franck composition, was, as always with this composer, singularly individual, though it holds in itself both past and future as it was to affect French music. The underlying poetical idea on which the work was based, was portrayed with extraordinary vividness, with the increased power given by music for the expression of feelings and their reaction.

The Debussy work, with its delicate and marvelously subtle painting of the curious imaginings of Mallarme, so evanescent as to all but escape being caught by poet or musician, received an exquisitely beautiful performance. The shading and shifting of phrase and color were endlessly amazing. Liszt's third prelude was played with all possible pomp and splendor but it seemed very much like putting a noble instrument to not exactly noble uses. Mr. Monteux is neither here nor in the symphony, on native ground and seems not to have sufficient resources as musician or conductor to compass in height and depth such a program as last night's in its entirety. It is just a case of stature and cubits.

A capacity audience was in attendance and gave spontaneous and increasingly enthusiastic proof of pleasure in the performance.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Pierre Monteux as conductor

The last concert in the Ellis course for this season was given last evening in Elmwood Music hall by the Boston symphony orchestra under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux. The programme included two works played here less than three weeks ago by the New York symphony orchestra under Mr. Damrosch, Beethoven's D major symphony, No. 2, and Liszt's Les Preludes. The other numbers of the programme were Cesar Franck's Le Chasseur Maudit, based on Burger's weird and gruesome poem, The Wild Huntsman, and Debussy's The Afternoon of a Faun, after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme.

The Franck work proved of special interest both because of the rarity of its performance in this city, and because of its intensely dramatic character. Portraying the story of a sacrilegious Count of the Rhine, who led his wild riders to the chase on the holy Sabbath, while the church bells called the pious to worship, and who for his ungodliness was accursed and condemned to flee, ever pursued by a pack of demons, this symphonic poem is a writing of thrilling effect. It bears few of the hallmarks of Franck the mystic, as we know him in his other works. The shifting harmonies which avoid the obvious and natural resolutions, the fragmentary melodies, that are found in his choral writings, his chamber music and in the symphony, are here absent. With well defined themes and quite conventional harmonic progressions, Le Chasseur Maudit is a tone picture of gripping nature, that fires the imagination and stirs the pulses.

In the performance of the Franck composition, as in the other numbers, the playing of the orchestra impressed particularly by its remarkable clarity. It was fairly luminous playing, never blurred by thickness or obscurity of tone. And whether due to the new conductor, the new material in the orchestra, or both, there was a rare spontaneity and freshness of performance that was delightful. Mr. Monteux directs his forces quietly, but there is a dynamic energy in his movements that is felt, not alone by his players, but by the hearers, who are transported with him into the very spirit of the music he presents. It is quite different from the academic performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra during its last three seasons under Dr. Muck. Great beauty of tone and all the essentials of splendid orchestral playing marked last evening's concert, and, above and beyond all, was that vital force and fervor

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PLEASES

Famous Orchestra Appears After Long Absence With New Leader.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in Cleveland last night for the first time in several years. As was easy to foresee, the Grays armory was crowded to capacity.

For three decades this orchestra was the model and exemplar for all to follow. Naturally there was, aside from the anticipatory pleasure in the performance, much interest to discover, in so far as the playing of a single program could reveal it, what might be the methods and artistic viewpoint of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux, and what changes, if any, had taken place in the orchestra itself in the stressful years just past. For this orchestra has come close to being, if it has not actually been, a national institution.

Well, there have been changes, and it would be idle to say that they have been wholly for the better. As to the personnel, we believe it is mostly the same—as to this we are unable to speak with authority—but yet there have been important changes in this respect. As to interpretation, by which of course we mean the readings of Mr. Monteux, and as to the tones he summons from his players, the difference is still more marked.

Never have we heard the orchestra play with such vitality, with such vigor, with such tremendous impacts of sound in swelling fortissimos, in crashing sforzandos. And this, although its numbers seemed less than of old.

The Bostonians of our earlier acquaintance not infrequently had moments of somnolence, as a virtuoso, making light of technical obstacles, may, unless he take heed lapse into perfunctariness. Yet they had unvarying suavity and beauty of tone.

There were no somnolent moments last night; but we could have wished that with the abounding spirit with which the new Bostonians played, there had been joined a warmer euphony, and a more justly balanced ensemble. Plainly, Mr. Monteux is a believer in the broad outline, in the boldly set forth melodic line. And here we are by no means inclined to disagree with him. But along with these, varying them, supplementing them, there should be the subtle inflections of phrase, the cunning working out of details, the artful gradations of sound.

CLEVELAND

In a word, it appeared to us that orchestra and conductor had not fully found themselves. Another season, and there will be a different story to tell. For there is splendid material in the orchestra, and Mr. Monteux is a gifted, magnetic and enthusiastic leader.

The principal offering was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony. It was played in highly dramatic fashion, not wholly, it must be confessed, without exaggeration in emphasis and (in the last movement) in the quite unusual prolongation of the pauses.

Since Mr. Monteux was at one time director of the Russian ballet, it may be assumed that Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," which was at one time often used by the Russian dancers, is particularly a piece to appeal to him. It may be, at that, that it was not used during Mr. Monteux's regime. But we think it was. In any case, it was well done; but we missed something of the poesy and delicate fancy that should inform its exquisite orchestral tracery.

The concert closed with Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque."

Mr. Monteux was cordially greeted and generously—after the third movement of the symphony, stormily—applauded throughout the concert.

The soloist was Jean Bedetti, principal cellist of the orchestra, who was heard in Boellman's "Symphonic Variations." Mr. Bedetti possesses a beautiful tone, notable facility, and plays with much expressiveness. The audience showed its pleasure in his performance by warm and long continued applause, recalling him to the stage several times.

om LEADER

dress Pittsburgh, Pa.

te DEC 8 19

Boston Orchestra Plays Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth concert in the Ellis series at Carnegie Music hall tonight. This orchestra has not been heard in Pittsburg for two years, and returns under the leadership of Pierre Monteaux, the celebrated French conductor. The program tonight will include several interesting works new to Pittsburg, and follows.

Chausson, symphony in B flat major. ....Op2. 20. Lent; Allegro vive;.... Trees lent; Anime.

Franck..... "Lo Chasseur Mondit" (The Wild Huntsman) Symphonic Poem.

Balakiroff..... "Thamar" Symphonic .poem ..for .orchestra After a poem of Michail Lermontoff)

Lis t.....Les Prelades" Symphonic poem No. 3 (After Lamartime).

Gazette Schenectady Dec. 15th 1919

Boston Symphony Delights a Large Audience at Armory

Beethoven Work Favorite of Program—No-Encore Tradition Preserved.

A large audience heard with delight the beautiful program of the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday night in the state armory. Ben Franklin brought the orchestra here, and music lovers are duly grateful for the privilege of hearing this greatest of symphony organizations of America in one of its interesting recitals. There were the programs with the valuable notes by Philip Hale, too, which always mean so much to the understanding of the music, if one does not read them while the music is being performed. For skimming quickly over beforehand and reading leisurely for remembrance afterward, these notes are an important and enjoyable part of a Boston Symphony concert.

This year's conductor, Pierre Monteux, seemed to have his orchestra at just the point of perfection in training that is expected of the players, and he led them through the beautiful intricacies of four splendid orchestra numbers with a manner of conducting which was quiet but not soremote in the high realms of art but that he could not take the applause with a friendly smile for his appreciative admirers. There was a moment after the last number when some thought that an old tradition was broken and that the Boston Symphony would play an encore, but not so. Monteaux merely wished his players to take the applause and when they had all risen and bowed he led the way off the stage.

When a symphony concert is only an occasional privilege as it is in Schenectady, it is a great satisfaction to have a Beethoven symphony on the program. The second, in D major, chosen for this concert, is a very grand and beautiful one. The second, the larghetto, a full-voiced song of many instruments melting in colorful tones of wonderful harmonies, seemed the loveliest thing ever heard as played by these artists. The scherzo is a delightful flower like thing, always with that Beethoven sadness coming like a "flower in the crannied wall." Whe the big composition came to its imposing finale it seemed to the hearers that there could be nothing finer on that or any program and many kept this idea after the concert, the Beethoven being the favorite.

The Balakireff symphonic poem, "Thamar" was startlingly different in style, not only from the preceding number but different from most symphony music. It is program music and the story of the poem which it illustrates is one of Oriental color and passion, tragedy and storm. Many persons did not like it. And it is a curious bit of evidence for its authentic appeal that those same persons would without doubt see the Russian Ballet present the same thing as a ballet and would think they liked it, because the gorgeous spectacle would actually dim their perception of the real feeling of the piece. But it is a splendid story, an Arabian Night's tale and just as entertaining, if not taken too seriously. But how those raging waters of Terek could frighten one!

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" was beautifully given and was well liked. There are many wonderfully fine effects in it, of the quieter sort and the ending is in one of the composer's original moods, the very long, high violin note, held against the harmonious tones of the others. The Liszt symphonic poem was most interesting and gave especially pleasant opportunity to note the uses of the different instrumental choirs and how the composer used them to get his fine effects, the violas, harps, horns, oboes, clarinets and the sunny woodwinds. It has a hcaracteristic Liszt ending, brilliant and loud, which is one o fthe things that makes an audience applaud the louder. But it was rather for the whole concert the audience applauded at the close last night, and expressed sincere satisfaction in th program.

thoughts

olay it could

Crowd"

From DEC 5 - 1919
TRIBUNE,
New York City

Coleridge Poem, Translated Into Music, a Success

Exceptional Merit Shown by Griffes, American Composer; Boston Symphony Plays Piece

The feature of a concert of modern music superbly played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first performance here of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, which was given its first hearing in Boston last Friday. It is the best piece of musical writing by an American we have heard within a year and altogether the most encouraging sign of life made by an American composer during a far longer period.

Any attempt at an orchestral transcription of the whole of Coleridge's poem, which Swinburne called "the supreme model of music in our language," would be a perilous undertaking, however gifted the composer, but Mr. Griffes was sensible in confining himself to extracts from the poem, those lines describing the stately "pleasure dome with caves of ice," where "Alph, the sacred river, ran through caverns measureless to man down to a sunless sea," the outlines of the palace "with walls and towers girdled round," the gardens with fountains and "sunny spots of greenery," closing with a return to the first mood suggesting the sacred river and the "caves of ice."

A Gift of Expression

Griffes was born at Elmira, N. Y., five years ago. He is that rare thing, an American composer with imagination, the gift of expression, pronounced originality. Although he studied abroad, his music is neither an echo of Berlin or Paris. If any influence is apparent it is that of the modern Russians. From the eerie beginning to the fanciful ending his music charmed and fascinated. It was the more effective because no prodigious effort had been made to dazzle with cunning and bizarre orchestration. Yet there was new harmonic and orchestra color, a new expression of the Oriental that Mr. Griffes has stamped with his own individuality.

Chausson's beautiful Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20, with its impressive ending, Balakireff's "Thamar," and Felix Mottl's cleverly orchestrated version of Chabrier's piano piece, the Hourree Fantasque, a tribute to his native Auvergne, were the other numbers on an enjoyable program.

The afternoon concert by the New York Symphony Society consisted chiefly in a repetition of works played at last Saturday's and Sunday's concerts by the same organization.

Grainger Stimulating

These included Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, Grieg's piano concerto played by Percy Grainger, and Mr. Grainger's children's march, "Over the Hills and Far Away." There was one piece, an Introduction and Allegro for strings by Edgar Elgar, which had not so recently appeared upon the society's programs. This music just misses distinction by the failing of over elaboration and the reiteration of the principal theme until its beauty appears stale.

Mr. Grainger gave a stimulating performance of Grieg's concerto, with a certain tonal brittleness. Yet the Concerto is full of poetry and gracious melodies that lend themselves easily to a more romantic, less angular treatment. As for Mr. Grainger's little march, of which Mr. Damrosch is evidently enamored, since he has already played it twice and will do so again at two concerts next week, it is of very little consequence. The composer has taken a commonplace little tune and written around it, in his usual fashion, elaborate exercises in harmony for the various portions of the orchestra individually and collectively, not forgetting a piano part which he himself played.

TELEGRAM
ess: New York City.
DEC

The Boston Symphony in the evenin under Pierre Monteux's leadership, pr sented for the first time a symphon poem based on Coleridge's "Kubla Kahn by the American composer, Charles Ton linson Griffes.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat was th principal work by the Boston players.

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate DEC 5 1

Bostons' Second Concert.

On the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second Thursday night concert, given last night in Carnegie Hall, was Chausson's B flat major Symphony, Balak'reff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar"; Chabrier's "Bouree Fantasque," and a new composition by Charles Griffes named "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan."

To the Chausson symphony has always been brought much nagging imputation of borrowing from older and more famous works. It may be—and certainly the theme fiend may reward his search with at least a few rags of reminiscent melody—but it matters not. For Chausson's vivid handling of the whole work (even of the "Tristan" strain) has enriched it with the romance of his glow and given it a beauty as genuine as independent.

Mr. Griffes is a young American composer whose orchestral illustrations in New York have been limited to a poem for flute—outside of some modern experiments in modern quarters. He has not accomplished better or bigger things than in "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which is frequently brilliant in its elaborate and skilful orchestration. There is a swift rush of colors in his picture of Coleridge's dream locale—and no one other than a librarian would quarrel with him for his tinkering with the title. He belongs among the most promising Americans and his fulfilment has already begun.

The orchestra played, it need scarcely be told, with the excellence assured by its personnel and practice. Of the conducting by Mr. Monteux descriptions have often been given ere this. Last night his work was typical in its elegance and finish and likewise in its only half hearted blaze.

UN
New York City
DEC 5 1919

CONCERT FEATURES GRIFFES TONE POEM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Oriental Work of

HONORED BY AUDIENCE

Interesting Programme Heard at Afternoon Performance in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Chausson's symphony in B flat, opus 20, Charles T. Griffes's tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" orchestrated by Felix Motte.

The melodic Orientalist who lives in Tarrytown is a neighbor and deserves first consideration. Why shall not a prophet over against Nyack have honor in his own country? We have heard much of Mr. Griffes of late. We shall hear more. He comes "into his own." Every man should. Mr. Griffes's music about Kubla Khan's country residence was heard for the first time. The poem of Coleridge naturally suggested it.

So Mr. Griffes instrumented "Alph, the Sacred River," outlined in melodic uprisings the growth of the palace, made the fountains play in the garden and the leaves shiver on the trees, let us hear the sounds of revelry by night from within the castle (an Oriental "Loin du Bal") and then caused the symphonic curtain to descend on the sacred river wending its way "down to a sunless sea."

Many Instruments Needed.

It took a lot of instruments to do all this—piano (used as an orchestral member), celesta, two harps, bass drum, cymbals, gong and all the other things commonly found in up to date assemblies of tone poem singers. The new tone poem is good. It says things in its own way. It Orientalizes as to the manner born. It has atmosphere. It sounds full and rich. And it is agreeable to the ear. Mr. Griffes handles the orchestra very well and he composes with freedom of spirit, not with hard labor of a tired brain. His music has verve and vibrancy.

Chausson's symphony is not a stranger here, though Paris is its home. It is a good symphony, opulent in clearly drawn melodic ideas, which are treated with skill and fancy. Of course any one who wishes to do so can find in it casual resemblances to Cesar Franck and Wagner, and THE SUN's reviewer even noted one recalling Dvorak's American symphony. But nevertheless this symphony is the personal product of Chausson's imagination and it is good to hear.

The playing of the symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's poem. The American composer was present and visibly received

Times DEC 5 - 1919
New York City

MUSIC

BY RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York last evening, in Carnegie Hall, a program that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a program of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat; Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Felix Motti's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same program.

It was the most extensive work of Mr. Griffes that has as yet been heard here. He has attracted considerable attention of late by compositions that have shown an originality of talent, possession of ideas and the ability to set them forth in suitable and striking form, the one most recently heard having been a "Poem" for flute and orchestra played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. That heard last night is a work of more ambitious scope. As its title indicates, it is an attempt to put into music ideas and images suggested by Coleridge's poem, "Kubla Khan." The verses the composer had in mind were those describing the "stately pleasure dome"; Alph, the sacred river running through "caverns measureless to man"; the fountains, the sunny spots of greenery; and most of all, and at greatest length, the dancing and revelry within.

The dancing and revelry are, of course, Oriental, and they have given Mr. Griffes the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in its melodic intervals in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes.

The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose.

It was much applauded; and the composer, in one of the first tier boxes, rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.

The rest of the program was not new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is noble and beautiful music, one of the finest products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that fittingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that resides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with it, without too much restraint in the brass section.

Balakireff's "Thamar" has been heard here as the basis of a ballet danced by the Russians and had been heard before in concert. It is full of illustrative traits, dark landscape, womanly fascination, oriental orgies and their fateful outcome, which are depicted with vivid power but at somewhat too great length. In this, too, Mr. Monteux sought to lay on thickly the orchestral colors. There are in this composition several suggestions of a better known work, Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Scheherazade," both in themes and in certain peculiarities of rhythm; suggestions that would make it interesting to know how much the one was really influenced by the other, the two composers being comrades and workers for the accomplishment of a common purpose.

A late Carnegie Hall concert yesterday

FROM
EVENING POST,
New York City DEC 5 - 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck was undoubtedly a great orchestral leader, although he was too academic and metronomic to satisfy those to whom emotional expression is the soul of music. His chief fault was his inability to make a well-balanced programme. He could have learned much in this respect of Josef Stransky or of Walter Damrosch, but he persevered in his perverse course, despite all criticism. There is no sense in devoting a whole programme to the classical school, another to the romantic and a third to modern composers. What audiences want are contrast and variety.

Is Pierre Monteux going to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor as a programme maker? At last night's second Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it seemed as if he had decided to do so. To put Chausson's symphony in B flat, Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantastigne" on one and the same programme was a good deal like having a dinner menu made up of Irish stew, and roast mutton and lamb soufflée.

It made a decided bore of last night's concert, although individually each of the pieces played had merit. Most of them, though comparatively short, were nevertheless too long.

ments.

There are eloquent passages in the Chausson symphony which always make one bewail the fact that this talented French composer was killed by a bicycle accident when he was only forty-four years old. He was, particularly, a master of orchestral coloring, and the source of his inspiration was Richard Wagner. In the first movement there are also thematic hints of "Rhinegold," while the beautifully mournful très lente begins quite in the manner of the opening bars of the third act of "Tristan and Isolde."

Balakireff's "Thamar" also opens in the Wagnerian vein, suggesting the forest sounds in "Siegfried" plus the grunts of Fafner. His subject, as well as his nationality, naturally predisposed him to Orientalize melodically. A quaintly fascinating mingling of Oriental and ultra-modern atmosphere is found in "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." The composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, is an American whose works have lately been a good deal in evidence. He was in a box last night, and after his piece had been played colorfully he had to rise half a dozen times to bow his thanks for the abundant applause. The spirit of Coleridge's poem is well reflected in the music, and there is an exquisite oboe solo dyed in Oriental color that Rimsky-Korsakoff might have been proud to have composed.

DEC 5 - 1919
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

GRIFFES AND OTHERS.

PIERRE MONTEUX last night completely forsook the classic paths which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has customarily followed at Carnegie Hall, playing a programme that was all modern, quite unfamiliar, and mostly rather exotic. The nearest approach to conventionality was in a symphony by Chausson, with suggestions of Cesar Franck and Wagner in its dignified and often distinguished measures.

New Yorkers were able to express their greatest enthusiasm on a new tone poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles T. Griffes, who teaches school in Tarrytown and was present yesterday to acknowledge some very spontaneous applause. Coleridge's unfinished description of that mysterious palace that rose in Xanadu, above the sacred river Alph, gave the composer a splendid opportunity to splash broadcast the oriental colors which he knows so well how to put into musical form. The orchestration was of Stravinskian complexity, running from vague, sluggish streams of neutral sound in the double basses to crashing rhythms in brass and drums that must have inspired the most bored of sensuous tyrants. Mr. Griffes has added distinctly to his reputation with this picturesque composition.

Balakirew's "Thamar," also oriental, and remembered as a peculiarly nerve-racking scene in the Russian ballet's repertoire, led to a sprightly and not too significant "Bourree Fantasque" by Chabrier, which sent every one home with the feeling that simple tunes and harmonies had vanished forever. The orchestra played well, of course.

om EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
te

NEW AMERICAN MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

C. T. Griffes' "Kubla-Khan" Is Heard—Notes on Other Concerts of the Day.

Pierre Monteux brought with him on his current month's trip from Boston a sheaf of scores that do not often lie on an orchestral conductor's desk. One of them, indeed, he obtained via Tarrytown, and elucidated for the first time for New York concertgoers. Last evening's entertainment in Carnegie Hall, as provided by the Boston Orchestra, was therefore of unusual interest from the point of view of its content.

The new piece was a symphonic poem—a bombastic and awkward term that ought to be flung into the dustbin of nomenclature—written by Charles T. Griffes, of Elmira and the aforementioned Tarrytown, and, probably it needs not the saying, has nothing whatever to do with either. It is called "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mr. Griffes was stirred to its creation by those lines in Coleridge's poem referring to this fantastically fanciful resort on the sacred River Alph and suggestive of what went on therein.

Mr. Griffes' music proved two things conclusively—that a composer's birth in a city of New York's provincial "southern tier" and his continuance in a town on the Hudson precludes neither the possession of genuine musical skill and imagination on his part nor the performance of his music when it is of such fashioning on the part of the usual agencies in these United States. The American composer, in a word, has no difficulties more than another, provided he be a good composer as well as an American one. Unfortunately, there are more of the latter than the former—whereby hangs the tale of their exorcism.

Much of Mr. Griffes' music has come to the light of a hearing in the past two years and its progress before the concertgoer's consideration has, in general, indicated the composer's own. It had been his inclination to speak and apparently to think in the idiom of the modern French orchestrists—the perspicacious young American naturally recognizes that the German idiom has at least temporarily exhausted itself in a final climatic burst of noisily elaborate rhodomontade down the blind alley of Richard Strauss.

In this fancy-piquing "Kubla-Khan" piece—which was written in 1912, but revised three years ago—Mr. Griffes still thinks and speaks in the modern French idiom, but the material of his thought has become largely his own and the manner of his speech has become orchestrally racy with his individual utterance. He now displays a vigorous romantic impulse and a knowing and neat instrumental ingenuity. Mr. Griffes was present last night and acknowledged from his box the very cordial reception his music was given by the audience. It was played very prettily indeed by Mr. Monteux and his men.

The Griffes piece headed the second half of the programme, which was further devoted to the Russian (Balakirev's) "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bouree fantaskue" as orchestrated by Felix Mottl. The evening opened with a performance of Chausson's symphony in B flat. Mr. Monteux is not the first to try excessive orchestral stir as a transfusion through which this music of Chausson might attain some momentary prolongation, or rather semblance of life. To vary the figure slightly, the symphony is, indeed, like Poe's M. Valdemar, who, though dead, escapes dissolution until the hypnotic spell upon him is released; then, in a flash, he becomes the grave food he would have been had not animation been curiously extended. Conductors now and then fasten the hypnosis of their enthusiasm upon this Chausson symphony, as Mr. Monteux did last night—enthusiasm vigorous and with much ado to it—but the music emits only a cadaverous groan and shrinks still further from exposure as soon as the spell of Richard Wagner and Cesar Franck is loosed from it.

DEC 5
From Herald
New York City

New American Music Played by Men from Boston

Symphonic Poem by Native Composer and Unfamiliar Symphony by Frenchman Heard.

There was more enthusiasm over last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall than was shown for the first pair of programmes last month. Pierre Monteux has good command of his new men now, and in a little known symphony of Ernest Chausson demonstrated that he has real skill in interpreting French music. Chausson's music is not the greatest, but it is musicianly, and, if not highly original, it has elements that hold the interest.

Last night's symphony (opus 20) is not marked by high sounding themes. Yet the orchestration is rich and the treatment of leading motives effective. The first movement was stirring as Mr. Monteux directed it. Sometimes the brass and wood wind choirs were not quite in perfect balance with the strings. This was noted particularly at the close of the slow movement, but, on the whole, it was an admirable performance and it interested the audience.

There was a new American composition, a symphonic poem by Charles T. Griffes, called "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of Coleridge). Built in the rambling manner of the modern French atmospheric school, it is full of color. It sounds well. There were whole tone scales, but not too many, and shimmering effects in the strings and percussion instruments. Not much original thematic material was displayed, but it is nevertheless a work worth hearing.

Mr. Griffes is extremely talented. Only recently has he become known here in a substantial way. The Symphony Society played a poem for flute and orchestra of his recently and the Flonzaley Quartet played one of his works last year. His music will have a hearing with several of the best American orchestras this season. Mr. Griffes' symphonic poem was heartily applauded, and deservedly.

Other orchestral selections were Balakireff's "Thamar," heard here as a ballet with the Ballet Russe, and Chabrier's "Bourée Fantastique." The whole programme was unhackneyed and skilfully arranged. Mr. Monteux appears to be an

rom DEC 5 - 1919
RIBUNE,
New York City

Coleridge Poem, Translated Into Music, a Success

Exceptional Merit Shown by Griffes, American Composer; Boston Symphony Plays Piece

The feature of a concert of modern music superbly played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Carnegie Hall was the first performance here of "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, which was given its first hearing in Boston last Friday. It is the best piece of musical writing by an American we have heard within a year and altogether the most encouraging sign of life made by an American composer during a far longer period.

Any attempt at an orchestral transcription of the whole of Coleridge's poem, which Swinburne called "the supreme model of music in our language," would be a perilous undertaking, however gifted the composer, but Mr. Griffes was sensible in confining himself to extracts from the poem, those lines describing the stately "pleasure dome with caves of ice," where "Alph, the sacred river, ran through caverns measureless to man down to a sunless sea," the outlines of the palace "with walls and towers girdled round," the gardens with fountains and "sunny spots of greenery," closing with a return to the first mood suggesting the sacred river and the "caves of ice."

A Gift of Expression

Griffes was born at Elmira, N. Y., five years ago. He is that rare an American composer with nation, the gift of expression, pronounced originality. Although he studied abroad, his music is neither an echo of Berlin or Paris. If any influence is apparent it is that of the modern Russians. From the eerie beginning to the fanciful ending his music charmed and fascinated. It was the more effective because no prodigious effort had been made to dazzle with cunning and bizarre orchestration. Yet there was new harmonic and orchestra color, a new expression of the Oriental that Mr. Griffes has stamped with his own individuality.

Chausson's beautiful Symphony in B flat major, Op. 20, with its impressive ending, Balakireff's "Thamar," and Felix Mottl's cleverly orchestrated version of Chabrier's piano piece, the Hourree Fantasque, a tribute to his native Auvergne, were the other numbers on an enjoyable program.

The afternoon concert by the New York Symphony Society consisted chiefly in a repetition of works played at last Saturday's and Sunday's concerts by the same organization.

Grainger Stimulating

These included Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, Grieg's piano concerto played by Percy Grainger, and Mr. Grainger's children's march, "Over the Hills and Far Away." There was one piece, an Introduction and Allegro for strings by Edgar Elgar, which had not so recently appeared upon the society's programs. This music just misses distinction by the failing of over elaboration and the reiteration of the principal theme until its beauty appears stale.

Mr. Grainger gave a stimulating performance of Grieg's concerto, with a certain tonal brittleness. Yet the Concerto is full of poetry and gracious melodies that lend themselves easily to a more romantic, less angular treatment. As for Mr. Grainger's little march, of which Mr. Damrosch is evidently enamored, since he has already played it twice and will do so again at two concerts next week, it is of very little consequence. The composer has taken a commonplace little tune and written around it, in his usual fashion, elaborate exercises in harmony for the various portions of the orchestra individually and collectively, not forgetting a piano part which he himself played.

1 TELEGRAM
ess: New York City.
DEC

The Boston Symphony in the evening under Pierre Monteux's leadership, presented for the first time a symphonic poem based on Coleridge's "Kubla Kahn," by the American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes.

Chausson's Symphony in B flat was the principal work by the Boston players.

om EVENING SUN
ddress New York City
ate DEC 5

Bostons' Second Concert.

On the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second Thursday night concert, given last night in Carnegie Hall, was Chausson's B flat major Symphony, Balakireff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar"; Chabrier's "Bouree Fantasque," and a new composition by Charles Griffes named "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan."

To the Chausson symphony has always been brought much nagging imputation of borrowing from older and more famous works. It may be—and certainly the theme fiend may reward his search with at least a few rags of reminiscent melody—but it matters not. For Chausson's vivid handling of the whole work (even of the "Tristan" strain) has enriched it with the romance of his glow and given it a beauty as genuine as independent.

Mr. Griffes is a young American composer whose orchestral illustrations in New York have been limited to a poem for flute—outside of some modern experiments in modern quarters. He has not accomplished better or bigger things than in "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which is frequently brilliant in its elaborate and skilful orchestration. There is a swift rush of colors in his picture of Coleridge's dream locale—and no one other than a librarian would quarrel with him for his tinkering with the title. He belongs among the most promising Americans and his fulfilment has already begun.

The orchestra played, it need scarcely be told, with the excellence assured by its personnel and practice. Of the conducting by Mr. Monteux descriptions have often been given ere this. Last night his work was typical in its elegance and finish and likewise in its only half hearted blaze.

UN
s New York City
DEC 5 1919

CONCERT FEATURES GRIFFES TONE POEM

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Oriental Work of [illegible]

HONORED BY AUDIENCE

Interesting Programme Heard at Afternoon Performance in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Chausson's symphony in B flat, opus 20, Charles T. Griffes's tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" orchestrated by Felix Motte.

The melodic Orientalist who lives in Tarrytown is a neighbor and deserves first consideration. Why shall not a prophet over against Nyack have honor in his own country? We have heard much of Mr. Griffes of late. We shall hear more. He comes "into his own." Every man should. Mr. Griffes's music about Kubla Khan's country residence was heard for the first time. The poem of Coleridge naturally suggested it.

So Mr. Griffes instrumented "Alph, the Sacred River," outlined in melodic uprisings the growth of the palace, made the fountains play in the garden and the leaves shiver on the trees, let us hear the sounds of revelry by night from within the castle (an Oriental "Loin du Bal") and then caused the symphonic curtain to descend on the sacred river wending its way "down to a sunless sea."

Many Instruments Needed.

It took a lot of instruments to do all this—piano (used as an orchestral member), celesta, two harps, bass drum, cymbals, gong and all the other things commonly found in up to date assemblies of tone poem singers. The new tone poem is good. It says things in its own way. It Orientalizes as to the manner born. It has atmosphere. It sounds full and rich. And it is agreeable to the ear. Mr. Griffes handles the orchestra very well and he composes with freedom of spirit, not with hard labor of a tired brain. His music has verve and vibrancy.

Chausson's symphony is not a stranger here, though Paris is its home. It is a good symphony, opulent in clearly drawn melodic ideas, which are treated with skill and fancy. Of course any one who wishes to do so can find in it casual resemblances to Cesar Franck and Wagner, and THE SUN's reviewer even noted one recalling Dvorak's American symphony. But nevertheless this symphony is the personal product of Chausson's imagination and it is good to hear.

The playing of the symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's poem. The American composer was present and visibly received

Times DEC 5 - 1919
New York City

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York last evening, in Carnegie Hall, a program that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a program of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Ernest Chausson's symphony in B flat; Charles Tomlinson Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Felix Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same program.

It was the most extensive work of Mr. Griffes that has as yet been heard here. He has attracted considerable attention of late by compositions that have shown an originality of talent, possession of ideas and the ability to set them forth in suitable and striking form, the one most recently heard having been a "Poem" for flute and orchestra played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. That heard last night is a work of more ambitious scope. As its title indicates, it is an attempt to put into music ideas and images suggested by Coleridge's poem, "Kubla Khan." The verses the composer had in mind were those describing the "stately pleasure dome"; Alph, the sacred river running through "caverns measureless to man"; the fountains, the sunny spots of greenery; and most of all, and at greatest length, the dancing and revelry within.

The dancing and revelry are, of course, Oriental, and they have given Mr. Griffes the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in its melodic intervals in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes.

The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose.

It was much applauded; and the composer, in one of the first tier boxes, rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.

The rest of the program was not new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is noble and beautiful music, one of the finest products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that fittingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that resides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with it, without too much restraint in the brass section.

Balakireff's "Thamar" has been heard here as the basis of a ballet danced by the Russians and had been heard before in concert. It is full of illustrative traits, dark landscape, womanly fascination, oriental orgies and their fateful outcome, which are depicted with vivid power but at somewhat too great length. In this, too, Mr. Monteux sought to lay on thickly the orchestral colors. There are in this composition several suggestions of a better known work, Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Scheherazade," both in themes and in certain peculiarities of rhythm; suggestions that would make it interesting to know how much the one was really influenced by the other, the two composers being comrades and workers for the accomplishment of a common purpose.

At its Carnegie Hall concert yesterday

From
EVENING POST,
New York City
DEC 5 - 1919

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Muck was undoubtedly a great orchestral leader, although he was too academic and metronomic to satisfy those to whom emotional expression is the soul of music. His chief fault was his inability to make a well-balanced programme. He could have learned much in this respect of Josef Stransky or of Walter Damrosch, but he persevered in his perverse course, despite all criticism. There is no sense in devoting a whole programme to the classical school, another to the romantic and a third to modern composers. What audiences want are contrast and variety.

Is Pierre Monteux going to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor as a programme maker? At last night's second Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it seemed as if he had decided to do so. To put Chausson's symphony in B flat, Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Balakireff's "Thamar," and Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantastigne" on one and the same programme was a good deal like having a dinner menu made up of Irish stew, and roast mutton and lamb soufflée.

It made a decided bore of last night's concert, although individually each of the pieces played had merit. Most of them, though comparatively short, were nevertheless too long.

ments.

There are eloquent passages in the Chausson symphony which always make one bewail the fact that this talented French composer was killed by a bicycle accident when he was only forty-four years old. He was, particularly, a master of orchestral coloring, and the source of his inspiration was Richard Wagner. In the first movement there are also thematic hints of "Rhinegold," while the beautifully mournful très lente begins quite in the manner of the opening bars of the third act of "Tristan and Isolde."

Balakireff's "Thamar" also opens in the Wagnerian vein, suggesting the forest sounds in "Siegfried" plus the grunts of Fafner. His subject, as well as his nationality, naturally predisposed him to Orientalize melodically. A quaintly fascinating mingling of Oriental and ultra-modern atmosphere is found in "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." The composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, is an American whose works have lately been a good deal in evidence. He was in a box last night, and after his piece had been played colorfully he had to rise half a dozen times to bow his thanks for the abundant applause. The spirit of Coleridge's poem is well reflected in the music, and there is an exquisite oboe solo dyed in Oriental color that Rimsky-Korsakoff might have been proud to have composed.

ESTABLISHED 1881 1919
From
EVENING MAIL,
New York City

GRIFFES AND OTHERS.

PIERRE MONTEUX last night completely forsook the classic paths which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has customarily followed at Carnegie Hall, playing a programme that was all modern, quite unfamiliar, and mostly rather exotic. The nearest approach to conventionality was in a symphony by Chausson, with suggestions of Cesar Franck and Wagner in its dignified and often distinguished measures.

New Yorkers were able to expend their greatest enthusiasm on a new tone poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by Charles T. Griffes, who teaches school in Tarrytown and was present yesterday to acknowledge some very spontaneous applause. Coleridge's unfinished description of that mysterious palace that rose in Xanadu, above the sacred river Alph, gave the composer a splendid opportunity to splash broadcast the oriental colors which he knows so well how to put into musical form. The orchestration was of Stravinskian complexity, running from vague, sluggish streams of neutral sound in the double basses to crashing rhythms in brass and drums that must have inspired the most bored of sensuous tyrants. Mr. Griffes has added distinctly to his reputation with this picturesque composition.

Balakirew's "Thamar," also oriental, and remembered as a peculiarly nerve-racking scene in the Russian ballet's repertoire, led to a sprightly and not too significant "Bourree Fantasque" by Chabrier, which sent every one home with the feeling that simple tunes and harmonies had vanished forever. The orchestra played well, of course.

om EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
te

NEW AMERICAN MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

C. T. Griffes' "Kubla-Khan" Is Heard—Notes on Other Concerts of the Day.

Pierre Monteux brought with him on his current month's trip from Boston a sheaf of scores that do not often lie on an orchestral conductor's desk. One of them, indeed, he obtained via Tarrytown, and elucidated for the first time for New York concert-goers. Last evening's entertainment in Carnegie Hall, as provided by the Boston Orchestra, was therefore of unusual interest from the point of view of its content.

The new piece was a symphonic poem—a bombastic and awkward term that ought to be flung into the dustbin of nomenclature—written by Charles T. Griffes, of Elmira and the aforementioned Tarrytown, and, probably it needs not the saying, has nothing whatever to do with either. It is called "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mr. Griffes was stirred to its creation by those lines in Coleridge's poem referring to this fantastically fanciful resort on the sacred River Alph and suggestive of what went on therein.

Mr. Griffes' music proved two things conclusively—that a composer's birth in a city of New York's provincial "southern tier" and his continuance in a town on the Hudson precludes neither the possession of genuine musical skill and imagination on his part nor the performance of his music when it is of such fashioning on the part of the usual agencies in these United States. The American composer, in a word, has no difficulties more than another, provided he be a good composer as well as an American one. Unfortunately, there are more of the latter than the former—whereby hangs the tale of their exorcism.

Much of Mr. Griffes' music has come to the light of a hearing in the past two years and its progress before the concertgoer's consideration has, in general, indicated the composer's own. It had been his inclination to speak and apparently to think in the idiom of the modern French orchestrists—the perspicacious young American naturally recognizes that the German idiom has at least temporarily exhausted itself in a final climatic burst of noisily elaborate rhodomontade down the blind alley of Richard Strauss.

In this fancy-piquing "Kubla-Khan" piece—which was written in 1912, but revised three years ago—Mr. Griffes still thinks and speaks in the modern French idiom, but the material of his thought has become largely his own and the manner of his speech has become orchestrally racy with his individual utterance. He now displays a vigorous romantic impulse and a knowing and neat instrumental ingenuity. Mr. Griffes was present last night and acknowledged from his box the very cordial reception his music was given by the audience. It was played very prettily indeed by Mr. Monteux and his men.

The Griffes piece headed the second half of the programme, which was further devoted to the Russian (Balakirev's) "Thamar" and Chabrier's "Bouree fantaskue" as orchestrated by Felix Mottl. The evening opened with a performance of Chausson's symphony in B flat. Mr. Monteux is not the first to try excessive orchestral stir as a transfusion through which this music of Chausson might attain some momentary prolongation, or rather semblance of life. To vary the figure slightly, the symphony is, indeed, like Poe's M. Valdemar, who, though dead, escapes dissolution until the hypnotic spell upon him is released; then, in a flash, he becomes the grave food he would have been had not animation been curiously extended. Conductors now and then fasten the hypnosis of their enthusiasm upon this Chausson symphony, as Mr. Monteux did last night—enthusiasm vigorous and with much ado to it—but the music emits only a cadaverous groan and shrinks still further from exposure as soon as the spell of Richard Wagner and Cesar Franck is loosed from it.

From Herald
New York City

New American Music Played by Men from Boston

Symphonic Poem by Native Composer and Unfamiliar Symphony by Frenchman Heard.

There was more enthusiasm over last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall than was shown for the first pair of programmes last month. Pierre Monteux has good command of his new men now, and in a little known symphony of Ernest Chausson demonstrated that he has real skill in interpreting French music. Chausson's music is not the greatest, but it is musicianly, and, if not highly original, it has elements that hold the interest.

Last night's symphony (opus 20) is not marked by high sounding themes. Yet the orchestration is rich and the treatment of leading motives effective. The first movement was stirring as Mr. Monteux directed it. Sometimes the brass and wood wind choirs were not quite in perfect balance with the strings. This was noted particularly at the close of the slow movement, but, on the whole, it was an admirable performance and it interested the audience.

There was a new American composition, a symphonic poem by Charles T. Griffes, called "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of Coleridge). Built in the rambling manner of the modern French atmospheric school, it is full of color. It sounds well. There were whole tone scales, but not too many, and shimmering effects in the strings and percussion instruments. Not much original thematic material was displayed, but it is nevertheless a work worth hearing.

Mr. Griffes is extremely talented. Only recently has he become known here in a substantial way. The Symphony Society played a poem for flute and orchestra of his recently and the Flonzaley Quartet played one of his works last year. His music will have a hearing with several of the best American orchestras this season. Mr. Griffes' symphonic poem was heartily applauded, and deservedly.

Other orchestral selections were Balakireff's "Thamar," heard here as a ballet with the Ballet Russe, and Chabrier's "Bourée Fantastique." The whole programme was unhackneyed and skilfully arranged. Mr. Monteux appears to be an

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 6 1919
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

STON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux and His Band Display Treasures of Big Repertoire.

DAMROSCH ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Percy Grainger Soloist at Afternoon Performance at Carnegie Hall.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening went further and fared even better than at its first in the now apparent determination of Conductor Pierre Monteux to ransack the extensive and admirably eclectic repertoire of his famous organization for symphonic works calculated to pique the curiosity of the rising generation of music lovers and to flatter the stabilized tastes of the elders. The selection of programs by the Boston leader seems to be directed by an extremely shrewd knowledge both of "what to do" and "how to do it," an irresistible combination of motives when put into effect, as Mr. Monteux did last evening, and an example in orchestral resourcefulness that well might be emulated by some of his self-satisfied contemporaries.

Thus Chausson's b-flat major symphony began this attractive evening, to be followed upon a rising tide of enthusiasm plus curiosity on the part of a packed and self-conscious audience by Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a delightfully fugitive and fluorescent symphonic diversion upon the poem by Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Balakireff's "Thamar" a Feature.

The third number, "Thamar," Balakireff's gleaming and ominous Symphonic Poem after Michail Lermontoff's epochal, if not epical, poem, again advanced the cumulative success of the ingenious and yet scholarly program, a success made emphatic and unqualified through the surpassing excellence of the playing.

The concert ended with Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique," best known as a baffling favorite and a formidable enticement for ambitious pianists, but now a genuine symphonic number of great beauty and legitimate importance, as orchestrated by Felix Mottl for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a most enticing program, consummately realized by Conductor Monteux and his musicians and thoroughly enjoyed and applauded by a crowded audience, which displayed an almost proprietary interest in and admiration of the proceedings; a happy circumstance, I think, and one which suggests the thought that it will be better for all of our great symphony orchestras when the boards of trustees, guarantors and subscribers display less, while the public shows more, of this same "proprietary interest" in the programs and performances of the concerts.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC -5 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Program Introduces Significant New Composition—Two More Pianists.

For the second of its Thursday programs in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening Chausson's B-Flat Major Symphony, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar"; Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," with Felix Mottl's orchestration, and a new composition by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, entitled "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn." The playing of Boston's chief source of pride may be passed over with a word. In personnel, and consequently in potentiality, the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains, in the writer's opinion at least, America's premier orchestra; but at present it is suffering from too much, or too little, direction, as you choose to view the symptoms of dissolution. Any orchestra is measured by the stature of its leader, and in the particular case, Pierre Monteux does not fill the shoes of his illustrious predecesors. The comparisons thrusts itself upon any discerning hearer. Last evening, in fact, the band committed mistakes of a purely technical nature; things unheard of in the hey-day of Nikisch, Fiedler, Gericke and Muck.

The Chausson symphony always affords food for both thought and conversation, for all who enjoy impeaching any composer of plagiarism. Last evenings intermission was made horrible for the writer by the mouthings of one of America's self-styled best composers, against whom might have been directed practically every charge he leveled at Chausson. Granted the borrowings are many, there is also the retouching and saving grace of Chausson's own personality. Hence, the final result is always just. The third act of "Tristan and Isolda" sounds throughout the slow movement, but it is, none the less, Chausson.

Young Mr. Griffes, who spends his time teaching young women something about music in one of the Hudson River finishing schools, is fast becoming a familar name on our concert program. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," inspired by Coleridge's poem of more trenchant title, is a shimmering web of orchestral color, of technical brilliance. In the larger sense the title does not matter; the composition standing on its own feet will rank high among contemporary compositions. In its favor are plan, substance, balance and other purely compositional values. More to the point, its measures fall delightfully and stimulatingly upon ear and fancy. It would be indeed a pity were further, if not immediate, opportunity denied the public of gaining familiarity with this music.

om EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
te

There were three other orchestral concerts on Saturday and Sunday, one of them being that of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Monteux added himself to the number of conductors who feed New York with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" symphony to the point of nausea. It is not difficult to understand that he, too, wanted to dish up this gratefully seasoned soup, fish, meat, entremet and fearfully black coffee all in one, but, from the listener's standpoint, there is such a thing as being overfed, not to say fed up. Moreover, there was considerably less art in the presentation of the meal than in Mr. Philip Hale's unusually apt discussion of it in his program notes. It seemed that Mr. Monteux either could not have read these very carefully or that he did not accept their point of view. The Boston Orchestra's afternoon was concluded with Florent Schmitt's suite made from his ballet, "La Tragedie de Salome," and Isaac Albeniz's "Catalonia." The latter was almost commonplace in its poverty-stricken handling of its folk material, and the former, without stage delight of a houseful.

From
WORLD, 1919
New York City

MUSIC
By James Gibbons Huneker

THE BAND FROM BOSTON PLAYS.

The band from Boston played at Carnegie Hall last night with much more zest than at the first concert last month. One reason for the change was the programme; the second, the more tonic weather; last, but not least, Pierre Monteux was in an expansive mood. He had something he could get his teeth, rather, his baton into. No exhumed classics; in a word, a modern scheme that suited the taste of a large and typical Boston Symphony Orchestra audience.

And then the novelty, which seemed to drop from the sky, though it was only from Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson. The new music did not portray our familiar waters, but that immemorial stream celebrated in the poetry of Coleridge, "Kubla Khan," one of whose lines stirs the rhythm of the pulse: "Where Alph, the sacred river ran." Think of it, up the State was a modest teacher of piano and all the while he marked despairing fingering for hopeless pupils, his brain cells made darkly magnificent pictures of the sacred Alph, and of the English poet's "dome of pleasure—a miracle of rare device, a sunny pleasure—dome with caves of ice!"

Furthermore, this young tone-poet possessed the art and science and imagination to see, visual hearing, and render his dream of another's dream, opium-haunted, a smoky enchantment.

Above all, imagination, armed with that open sesame a composer, even lacking in experience, may unlock many doors, some leading into strange abodes; doors that make vistas in some visionary landscape. The composer of this tone-poem is named Charles Tomlinson Griffes, and he hails from Elmira. In Europe he studied, inter alia, with the composer of "Haensel und Gretel," Engelbert Humperdinck, which fact may account for the gorgeous and sombre instrumentation, though not for the young man's indisputable fancy.

If Samuel Taylor Coleridge were alive he would reprimand us for speaking in one breath of both imagination and fancy. So let us agree on the more elastic vocable, fantasy. Mr. Griffes is a fantasist, and, while all programmes to music, whether absolute or poetic, are arbitrary, there is no mistaking the authenticity of the mood, or moods, evoked by the interesting combinations of Griffes. To call it neo-Russian, or neo-French would be easy.

You think of Rimski-Korsakov, sometimes of Tchaikovsky, of Liszt, Berlioz and Richard Strauss. Yet it is, all said and done, Griffes. He has individuality. He holds your attention and you are sorry when the last silvery tinkle of the Celesta is sounded. Asiatic coloring, tom-toms and a travailing till we see the dome which casts its shadow in the waves of the sacred Alph. Formally speaking, the loop is a wide, loose wire; however, a loop is there, not a mere arabesque, but a narrative tone that carries you on to the mystic close.

The composition, because of its indubitable touch of the imagination, coupled with its subtle demi-tints and veiled impressionism, was so well liked by the audience the composer had to bow from his box three or four times. He seemed more surprised than his hearers. In Boston the work was received in a similarly enthusiastic manner.

The Chausson symphony in B flat major, which began an enjoyable evening, is elating. Never original, with its Wagnerian echoes, including the Ring, Tristan and Parsifal, its colors are fading, its ideas conventional. Perhaps the beautiful slow movement may save it. Alas! that music and the beauty of women should so quickly pass (said the sentimentalist). The number was vigorously interpreted. In the case of "Thamar," by Mily Balakirev, Mr. Monteux was on familiar territory. He conducted the ballet when the Russian dancers produced, or reduced, this symphonic poem to choreographic form. The programme ended with a Bourree Fantasque by Chabrier, scored from the piano part by Felix Mottl. We missed it.

But—"In Xanadu did Kubla Kahn a stately pleasure dome decree!" One touch of fancy, of imagination—Oh! let the categories go hang, and enjoy the charming music of Griffes.

h EVENING GLOBE
ress New York City
DEC. 5 - 1919

Music.

New Piece by Griffes Done by Boston Symphony.

Charles T. Griffes, whom we have come to look on as a New York City composer, though he happens to reside in Tarrytown, contributed a symphonic poem entitled "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" to the programme played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, and it turned out the feature of the concert. But there were, of course, other pieces on the programme, and it is just as well to consider them in their order.

The concert opened with the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson. There is a curious charm to this very Tristanish symphony, a charm in which the circumstances of the composer's life and his untimely death have their part. For all its harking back to Wagner's love tragedy, it is music that also looks forward. But to what? Some have felt this symphony to be more an aspiration than an achievement. Therein lies, perhaps, its chief strength and beauty. Knowing the fate of its author, one easily finds in it something of the feverish longing, the peculiar pathos of the foredoomed. There are greater symphonies which move less the comprehending listener. It is easy to believe that Mr. Monteux led it con amore.

Mr. Griffes is unquestionably one of the most gifted composers this country has produced. No one that has followed his work in the last few years—and chances to follow it have not been lacking—could deny his talent. He writes in the extreme modern vein. To do so is in the opinions of some hearers an unpardonable sin, of others a supreme virtue. That side of the question seems not to concern Mr. Griffes. Apparently he writes as he feels and his sole solicitude is to express fully what he seeks to express. And therein is the whole artistic root of the matter.

This symphonic poem was written in 1912 and revised "somewhat" (we are informed) in 1916. Subsequently Mr. Griffes has written other music which doubtless approaches nearer to his maturer ideals. Still, this seems to be his first composition for full modern orchestra performed in New York and as such it is bound to spread his fame among all those who believe that an admirable specimen of an elephant is intrinsically superior to a perfect white mouse.

Needless to say, it [illegible]

m Vorld DEC 7 1919
ew York City

MUSIC
By James Gibbons Huneker

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE.

It was a pleased audience that left Carnegie Hall yesterday after two hours of modern music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the expert baton of Pierre Monteux. As was customary, there were no solo singers or performers; the programme was the "guest" and a welcome one, for it offered the pathetic symphony of Tchaikovsky and several novelties by Floren Schmitt of Paris, and "Catalonia," by the Spaniard, Isaac Albeniz. Variety enough in sooth to satisfy musical gluttons.

The great Russian's B minor symphony wears well. Dr. Antonin Dvorak insisted that the work was more of a suite than symphonic in character, basing his belief on the introduction of two movements which at first blush do not seem cognate, though affiliated with the whole. It is not altogether without a grain of truth, this criticism of one celebrated composer by another. The movements in question lack the nobility of accent and tragic pathos of the first and fourth sections. But psychologically the ear as well as the spirit craves contrast; too much woe would weary. As to the inclusion of the march-like theme in the allegro molto, the name of Raff comes to the mind. One of the most popular marches a quarter of a century ago was from his Lenore symphony. Let us enjoy the gift from the gods without worrying over its form. It is magnificent music, and there's an end on it!

When we call the Schmitt suite "Salome," based on a mimodrama, a ballet-pantomime, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, a novelty, we mean a novelty to us. It was made over into an orchestral suite by the composer. It is interesting, though we miss the gestures and plastic poses of the dance. Mr. Hale tells that it was Loie Fuller who first interpreted the original composition at Paris in 1907. It is picture[illegible]

ESTABLISHED [illegible] DEC [illegible] 1919
From Herald
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert.

At its second matinee concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an unusual programme of Russian, French and Spanish music. The symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," is familiar to all concert goers, but it was followed by two novel works, Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedie of Salome" and a suite of Albanez called "Catalonia."

The symphony was played rather unevenly. There often was roughness in the brass section and the kettledrum completely drowned the remainder of the orchestra once or twice in the third movement. There was, however, a note of sincerity and of strength in Pierre Monteux's reading of this often played work. The finale was admirable, but the audience liked best the allegro molto vivace, played with more force than finesse, and the conductor had his men rise in response to prolonged applause.

[illegible] is the famous poem of Coleridge's dream that inspired Mr. Griffes. He even specifies lines 1 to 11 and 32 to 36 of the poem as those to which the music refers. No two men are going to read and feel such a poem as "Kubla Khan" in just the same way. It is also possible that if Mr. Griffes were composing his symphonic poem now he would be inspired differently from his inspiration of 1912. Be all that as it may, the fact remains that Mr. Griffes has written imaginative and personal music, and he has written it with a technic that gets it over to his hearers and with a singularly fine and engrossing skill in instrumental coloring. Mr. Griffes is still young. He seems to be now just on the edge of a period of valuable productivity. Brilliantly performed, the work aroused marked enthusiasm, in response to which Mr. Griffes bowed many times from a box.

It is rather curious that Mr. Monteux should have chosen as the next piece on his programme Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar." But such he did, leading it with the understanding of long familiarity. In some respects the contiguity tempts to a comparison between the Russian work of more than a generation ago and the modern American piece—a comparison which will not, however, be made here. "Thamar" last night sounded long and not always vital. There is some of it in the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which, in spite of the fact that it has been played here too much of late, is the more vigorous and engaging work.

The concert ended with the "Bourréefantasque" of Chabrier, orchestrated by Felix Mottl. Chabrier is one French composer whom our public knows too little, although his "Espana" is now played here so often. The "Bourrée fantasque" is a brilliant piano piece and Mottl made a brilliant transcription of it for orchestra. The Boston men played it with immense gusto, riveting attention that began to wander before Queen Thamar had done with her traitorous treatment of her deluded guests.

PITTS SANBORN.

"Il Trovatore" Repeated.

"Il Trovatore" was repeated at the matinee in the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday. The first time this season it was heard at a recent popular Saturday night's performance. On this occasion Giulio Crimi and Leon Rothier were in the cast with Claudia Muzio, Jeanne Gordon and Amato. Papi conducted. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

Schimtt's work was played here by the Boston Symphony concert six years ago, but otherwise it has been neglected in New York, though it is a composition of real worth. It would have sounded better as a pantomime, for which it was written, as it is descriptive music, but there are many effective passages and there is an abundance of color in the orchestral scoring. A small chorus of women's voices off stage was extremely effective. The whole thing sounded brilliant. It is very modern and very difficult to play. There is an excellent description of a storm near the close.

Albanez' work was not so successful. It is rather trivial, and the orchestra played as if it had little conviction of its worth. The audience was as listless in its applause as the men were in their playing.

ESTABLISHED 1881 DEC 5 1919

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

STON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux and His Band Display Treasures of Big Repertoire.

DAMROSCH ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Percy Grainger Soloist at Afternoon Performance at Carnegie Hall.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert of the season at Carnegie Hall last evening went further and fared even better than at its first in the now apparent determination of Conductor Pierre Monteux to ransack the extensive and admirably eclectic repertoire of his famous organization for symphonic works calculated to pique the curiosity of the rising generation of music lovers and to flatter the stabilized tastes of the elders. The selection of programs by the Boston leader seems to be directed by an extremely shrewd knowledge both of "what to do" and "how to do it," an irresistible combination of motives when put into effect, as Mr. Monteux did last evening, and an example in orchestral resourcefulness that well might be emulated by some of his self-satisfied contemporaries.

Thus Chausson's b-flat major symphony began this attractive evening, to be followed upon a rising tide of enthusiasm plus curiosity on the part of a packed and self-conscious audience by Griffes's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," a delightfully fugitive and fluorescent symphonic diversion upon the poem by Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

Balakireff's "Thamar" a Feature.

The third number, "Thamar," Balakireff's gleaming and ominous Symphonic Poem after Michail Lermontoff's epochal, if not epical, poem, again advanced the cumulative success of the ingenious and yet scholarly program, a success made emphatic and unqualified through the surpassing excellence of the playing.

The concert ended with Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique," best known as a baffling favorite and a formidable enticement for ambitious pianists, but now a genuine symphonic number of great beauty and legitimate importance, as orchestrated by Felix Mottl for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a most enticing program, consummately realized by Conductor Monteux and his musicians and thoroughly enjoyed and applauded by a crowded audience, which displayed an almost proprietary interest in and admiration of the proceedings; a happy circumstance, I think, and one which suggests the thought that it will be better for all of our great symphony orchestras when the boards of trustees, guarantors and subscribers display less, while the public shows more, of this same "proprietary interest" in the programs and performances of the concerts.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 5 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

Carnegie Hall Program Introduces Significant New Composition—Two More Pianists.

For the second of its Thursday programs in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played last evening Chausson's B-Flat Major Symphony, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar"; Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," with Felix Mottl's orchestration, and a new composition by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, entitled "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Kahn." The playing of Boston's chief source of pride may be passed over with a word. In personnel, and consequently in potentiality, the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains, in the writer's opinion at least, America's premier orchestra; but at present it is suffering from too much, or too little, direction, as you choose to view the symptoms of dissolution. Any orchestra is measured by the stature of its leader, and in the particular case, Pierre Monteux does not fill the shoes of his illustrious predecesors. The comparisons thrusts itself upon any discerning hearer. Last evening, in fact, the band committed mistakes of a purely technical nature; things unheard of in the hey-day of Nikisch, Fiedler, Gericke and Muck.

The Chausson symphony always affords food for both thought and conversation, for all who enjoy impeaching any composer of plagiarism. Last evenings intermission was made horrible for the writer by the mouthings of one of America's self-styled best composers, against whom might have been directed practically every charge he leveled at Chausson. Granted the borrowings are many, there is also the retouching and saving grace of Chausson's own personality. Hence, the final result is always just. The third act of "Tristan and Isolda" sounds throughout the slow movement, but it is, none the less, Chausson.

Young Mr. Griffes, who spends his time teaching young women something about music in one of the Hudson River finishing schools, is fast becoma familar name on our concert program. "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," inspired by Coleridge's poem of more trenchant title, is a shimmering web of orchestral color, of technical brilliance. In the larger sense the title does not matter; the composition standing on its own feet will rank high among contemporary compositions. In its favor are plan, substance, balance and other purely compositional values. More to the point, its measures fall delightfully and stimulatingly upon ear and fancy. It would be indeed a pity were further, if not immediate, opportunity denied the public of gaining familiarity with this music.

om EVENING JOURNAL
dress New York City
te _____

There were three other orchestral concerts on Saturday and Sunday, one of them being that of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Monteux added himself to the number of conductors who feed New York with the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" symphony to the point of nausea. It is not difficult to understand that he, too, wanted to dish up this gratefully seasoned soup, fish, meat, entremet and fearfully black coffee all in one, but, from the listener's standpoint, there is such a thing as being overfed, not to say fed up. Moreover, there was considerably less art in the presentation of the meal than in Mr. Philip Hale's unusually apt discussion of it in his program notes. It seemed that Mr. Monteux either could not have read these very carefully or that he did not accept their point of view. The Boston Orchestra's afternoon was concluded with Florent Schmitt's suite made from his ballet, "La Tragedie de Salome," and Isaac Albeniz's "Catalonia." The latter was almost commonplace in its poverty-stricken handling of its folk material, and the former, without stage delight of a houseful.

From WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC
By James Gibbons Huneker

THE BAND FROM BOSTON PLAYS.

The band from Boston played at Carnegie Hall last night with much more zest than at the first concert last month. One reason for the change was the programme; the second, the more tonic weather; last, but not least, Pierre Monteux was in an expansive mood. He had something he could get his teeth, rather, his baton into. No exhumed classics; in a word, a modern scheme that suited the taste of a large and typical Boston Symphony Orchestra audience.

And then the novelty, which seemed to drop from the sky, though it was only from Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson. The new music did not portray our familiar waters, but that immemorial stream celebrated in the poetry of Coleridge, "Kubla Khan," one of whose lines stirs the rhythm of the pulse: "Where Alph, the sacred river ran." Think of it, up the State was a modest teacher of piano and all the while he marked despairing fingering for hopeless pupils, his brain cells made darkly magnificent pictures of the sacred Alph, and of the English poet's "dome of pleasure—a miracle of rare device, a sunny pleasure—dome with caves of ice!"

Furthermore, this young tone-poet possessed the art and science and imagination to see, visual hearing, and render his dream of another's dream, opium-haunted, a smoky enchantment.

Above all, imagination, armed with that open sesame a composer, even lacking in experience, may unlock many doors, some leading into strange abodes; doors that make vistas in some visionary landscape. The composer of this tone-poem is named Charles Tomlinson Griffes, and he hails from Elmira. In Europe he studied, inter alia, with the composer of "Haensel und Gretel," Engelbert Humperdinck, which fact may account for the gorgeous and sombre instrumentation, though not for the young man's indisputable fancy.

If Samuel Taylor Coleridge were alive he would reprimand us for speaking in one breath of both imagination and fancy. So let us agree on the more elastic vocable, fantasy. Mr. Griffes is a fantasist, and, while all programmes to music, whether absolute or poetic, are arbitrary, there is no mistaking the authenticity of the mood, or moods, evoked by the interesting combinations of Griffes. To call it neo-Russian, or neo-French would be easy.

You think of Rimski-Korsakov, sometimes of Tchaikovsky, of Liszt, Berlioz and Richard Strauss. Yet it is, all said and done, Griffes. He has individuality. He holds your attention and you are sorry when the last silvery tinkle of the Celesta is sounded. Asiatic coloring, tom-toms and a travailing till we see the dome which casts its shadow in the waves of the sacred Alph. Formally speaking, the loop is a wide, loose wire; however, a loop is there, not a mere arabesque, but a narrative tone that carries you on to the mystic close.

The composition, because of its indubitable touch of the imagination, coupled with its subtle demi-tints and veiled impressionism, was so well liked by the audience the composer had to bow from his box three or four times. He seemed more surprised than his hearers. In Boston the work was received in a similarly enthusiastic manner.

The Chausson symphony in B flat major, which began an enjoyable evening, is elating. Never original, with its Wagnerian echoes, including the Ring, Tristan and Parsifal, its colors are fading, its ideas conventional. Perhaps the beautiful slow movement may save it. Alas! that music and the beauty of women should so quickly pass (said the sentimentalist). The number was vigorously interpreted. In the case of "Thamar," by Mily Balakirev, Mr. Monteux was on familiar territory. He conducted the ballet when the Russian dancers produced, or reduced, this symphonic poem to choreographic form. The programme ended with a Bourree Fantasque by Chabrier, scored from the piano part by Felix Mottl. We missed it.

But—"In Xanadu did Kubla Kahn a stately pleasure dome decree!" One touch of fancy, of imagination—Oh! let the categories go hang, and enjoy the charming music of Griffes.

EVENING GLOBE
ress New York City
DEC. 5 - 1919

Music.

New Piece by Griffes Done by Boston Symphony.

Charles T. Griffes, whom we have come to look on as a New York City composer, though he happens to reside in Tarrytown, contributed a symphonic poem entitled "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" to the programme played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last evening, and it turned out the feature of the concert. But there were, of course, other pieces on the programme, and it is just as well to consider them in their order.

The concert opened with the B flat symphony of Ernest Chausson. There is a curious charm to this very Tristanish symphony, a charm in which the circumstances of the composer's life and his untimely death have their part. For all its harking back to Wagner's love tragedy, it is music that also looks forward. But to what? Some have felt this symphony to be more an aspiration than an achievement. Therein lies, perhaps, its chief strength and beauty. Knowing the fate of its author, one easily finds in it something of the feverish longing, the peculiar pathos of the foredoomed. There are greater symphonies which move less the comprehending listener. It is easy to believe that Mr. Monteux led it con amore.

Mr. Griffes is unquestionably one of the most gifted composers this country has produced. No one that has followed his work in the last few years—and chances to follow it have not been lacking—could deny his talent. He writes in the extreme modern vein. To do so is in the opinions of some hearers an unpardonable sin, of others a supreme virtue. That side of the question seems not to concern Mr. Griffes. Apparently he writes as he feels and his sole solicitude is to express fully what he seeks to express. And therein is the whole artistic root of the matter.

This symphonic poem was written in 1912 and revised "somewhat" (we are informed) in 1916. Subsequently Mr. Griffes has written other music which doubtless approaches nearer to his maturer ideals. Still, this seems to be his first composition for full modern orchestra performed in New York and as such it is bound to spread his fame among all those who believe that an admirable specimen of an elephant is intrinsically superior to a perfect white mouse.

Needless to say, it is [illegible] poem of Coleridge's dream that inspired Mr. Griffes. He even specifies lines 1 to 11 and 32 to 36 of the poem as those to which the music refers. No two men are going to read and feel such a poem as "Kubla Khan" in just the same way. It is also possible that if Mr. Griffes were composing his symphonic poem now he would be inspired differently from his inspiration of 1912. Be all that as it may, the fact remains that Mr. Griffes has written imaginative and personal music, and he has written it with a technic that gets it over to his hearers and with a singularly fine and engrossing skill in instrumental coloring. Mr. Griffes is still young. He seems to be now just on the edge of a period of valuable productivity. Brilliantly performed, the work aroused marked enthusiasm, in response to which Mr. Griffes bowed many times from a box.

It is rather curious that Mr. Monteux should have chosen as the next piece on his programme Balakireff's symphonic poem "Thamar." But such he did, leading it with the understanding of long familiarity. In some respects the contiguity tempts to a comparison between the Russian work of more than a generation ago and the modern American piece—a comparison which will not, however, be made here. "Thamar" last night sounded long and not always vital. There is some of it in the "Scheherazade" suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff, which, in spite of the fact that it has been played here too much of late, is the more vigorous and engaging work.

The concert ended with the "Bourréefantasque" of Chabrier, orchestrated by Felix Mottl. Chabrier is one French composer whom our public knows too little, although his "España" is now played here so often. The "Bourrée fantasque" is a brilliant piano piece and Mottl made a brilliant transcription of it for orchestra. The Boston men played it with immense gusto, riveting attention that began to wander before Queen Thamar had done with her traitorous treatment of her deluded guests.

PITTS SANBORN.

m
World DEC 7 1919
ew York City

MUSIC
By James Gibbons Huneker

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE.

It was a pleased audience that left Carnegie Hall yesterday after two hours of modern music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the expert baton of Pierre Monteux. As was customary, there were no solo singers or performers; the programme was the "guest" and a welcome one, for it offered the pathetic symphony of Tchaikovsky and several novelties by Floren Schmitt of Paris, and "Catalonia," by the Spaniard, Isaac Albeniz. Variety enough in sooth to satisfy musical gluttons.

The great Russian's B minor symphony wears well. Dr. Antonin Dvorak insisted that the work was more of a suite than symphonic in character, basing his belief on the introduction of two movements which at first blush do not seem cognate, though affiliated with the whole. It is not altogether without a grain of truth, this criticism of one celebrated composer by another. The movements in question lack the nobility of accent and tragic pathos of the first and fourth sections. But psychologically the ear as well as the spirit craves contrast; too much woe would weary. As to the inclusion of the march-like theme in the allegro molto, the name of Raff comes to the mind. One of the most popular marches a quarter of a century ago was from his Lenore symphony. Let us enjoy the gift from the gods without worrying over its form. It is magnificent music, and there's an end on it!

When we call the Schmitt suite "Salome," based on a mimodrama, a ballet-pantomime, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, a novelty, we mean a novelty to us. It was made over into an orchestral suite by the composer. It is interesting, though we miss the gestures and plastic poses of the dance. Mr. Hale tells that it was Loie Fuller who first interpreted the original composition at Paris in 1907. It is pictur[illegible] as we heard it yesterday afternoon. A slow, doleful landscape, the abhorred Dead Sea, the castellated fortress, Macharis, in Flaubert's masterly story, "Herodias," and in the beautiful and touching "Mary Magdalen" of Edgar Saltus; the sultry, sensual dances of Salome and the lightnings of the outraged heavens are all evoked by the enormously clever composer. He also evoked the sisters three, the fishlike Rhine Daughters, Isolde of Cornwall and Erin, and the "rose of hell," Kundry, the wandering Jewess of "Parsifal." A small female chorus, not on the stage, reminded us of Debussy.

But all is fair in wars and scores, and if Mr. Schmitt is not too original he is ingenious, and also keeps good company. The Albeniz "Catalonia," with its lusty open air atmosphere, proved refreshing; in spots it betrays broad humor. Conductor Monteux was in splendid form. The first three movements of the symphony were inspiring and brilliant and the last, while it did not sound the depths, was well within the dynamic scheme of the conductor. Too much crepe was not hung on the front doorbell. The band nobly responded. It sounded more like its old self for the first time in years. The brass and wood choirs deserve special commendation. They were hard pressed by the swinging tempo of the march, though not overblown. Musical ozone was indeed within the walls of sleepy old Carnegie Hall at this enjoyable matinee.

"Il Trovatore" Repeated.

"Il Trovatore" was repeated at the matinee in the Metropolitan Opera House yesterday. The first time this season it was heard at a recent popular Saturday night's performance. On this occasion Giulio Crimi and Leon Rothier were in the cast with Claudia Muzio, Jeanne Gordon and Amato. Papi conducted. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

From Herald
New York City

Boston Symphony Concert.

At its second matinee concert of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an unusual programme of Russian, French and Spanish music. The symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," is familiar to all concert goers, but it was followed by two novel works, Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedie of Salome" and a suite of Albanez called "Catalonia."

The symphony was played rather unevenly. There often was roughness in the brass section and the kettledrum completely drowned the remainder of the orchestra once or twice in the third movement. There was, however, a note of sincerity and of strength in Pierre Monteux's reading of this often played work. The finale was admirable, but the audience liked best the allegro molto vivace, played with more force than finesse, and the conductor had his men rise in response to prolonged applause.

Schimtt's work was played here by the Boston Symphony concert six years ago, but otherwise it has been neglected in New York, though it is a composition of real worth. It would have sounded better as a pantomime, for which it was written, as it is descriptive music, but there are many effective passages and there is an abundance of color in the orchestral scoring. A small chorus of women's voices off stage was extremely effective. The whole thing sounded brilliant. It is very modern and very difficult to play. There is an excellent description of a storm near the close.

Albanez' work was not so successful. It is rather trivial, and the orchestra played as if it had little conviction of its worth. The audience was as listless in its applause as the men were in their playing.

Music.

Spanish Novelty on Boston Symphony Programme.

What seems to have been the first public performance in New York of any orchestral piece by a Spanish composer occurred at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The work given is the "Catalonia" of Isaac Albeniz, a composer hitherto chiefly known to the local public through some brilliant piano pieces illustrative of life in Spain.

For the concert of the Symphony Society on Nov. 13 Walter Damrosch announced the performance of "La Procesion del Rocio," by the Spaniard Joaquin Turina, but at a late hour substituted the overture to Lalo's opera of Breton legend and folk color, "Le Roi d'Ys." Unfortunately the official bulletin of the Symphony Society did not note the change, with the result that some listeners carried away a belief that the Breton misting was a Spanish dew. Mr. Damrosch has not yet come around to giving the Turina piece a public hearing. The "Catalonia" of Albeniz, I understand, was rehearsed by the Philharmonic Society a year or two ago, but there was no public performance.

Now, Albeniz composed a great deal of music aside from his piano pieces. Curiosity in regard to it is natural. "Catalonia" is described as the first member of a tripartite suite, but there is no record of the other sections having been written. It is a jocular, boisterous piece, based on a single theme of folk character. At one point an imitation of strolling musicians interrupts the festivities. The whole thing might depict a peasant merrymaking or a Catalonian village fair. It is open-air music, forthright and muscularly gay. Under a cloudless sky you see the swarthy merrymakers and hear the clatter of their castanets, while the southern sun drenches them with heat and light. In rude jest the harmonies bite and stab, instruments gurgle or shriek with joy. Musically the piece is by no means so rich as the Frenchman Chabrier's rhapsody "España." Nevertheless if it were repeated a few times I believe it has very good chances of becoming as popular with audiences. This in spite of the singular apathy of the audience on Saturday. But the audience on Saturday deserves a special word later on.

The dashing performance of "Catalonia" came at the end of a three-piece programme, after the orchestra had given of its best for nearly half an hour in the Tragédie de Salomé of Florent Schmitt, that modern French composer of Alsatian parentage. This work has a curious history. Originally it was written for small orchestra to be performed at Jacques Rouché's little Paris playhouse Le Théâtre des Arts in connection with a mute drama by Robert d'Humières. The first performance occurred Nov. 9, 1907. Loie Fuller was the Salome of that production and Lea Teffegen, then billed under the name of Lou van Tel, was the John the Baptist.

Schmitt heard the tragedy in larger sonorities than the small orchestra of the Théâtre des Arts could render, so he rewrote the score for the huge apparatus of the full modern orchestra. In its new form the music accompanied a performance of the mute drama at the Châtelet in Paris during a season organized in the spring of 1912 by Mme Trouhanova, who impersonated Salome. Later the Diaghileff ballet took it up, presenting it in London and at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris, with Karsavina as Salome, in the summer of 1913.

In due time Jacques Rouché of the Théâtre des Arts became director of the Paris Opéra and along with him went his lieutenant, Louis Laloy as its secretary general. These gentlemen bethought themselves last spring of the "Salomé" of years ago and presented the work on the great stage of the Opéra (in the enlarged version, of course), with Ida Rubinstein as Salomé. The town was then full of the A. E. F. and the august direction of the Opéra seemed to have got it fixed in its head that Ida name Salome spelled box office success. For after "La Tragédie de Salomé" was shelved for the time being to afford Mlle Rubinstein a holiday, the management brought forward the curious "Salome" of the former naval officer Mariotte composed, as in the case of Richard Strauss's "Salome," to Oscar Wilde's text).

Some Paris reviewers labored to contrast favorably the "art" of Mariotte with the rank "sensationalism" of Richard Strauss. If they be right, then à bas l'art! I spent an unforgettable evening at the Opéra early last July listening to the granitic, anti-sensuous music of Mariotte and watching with bewilderment the manœuvres of Lucienne Bréval, burdened with years and adipose tissue, as she lumbered through the paces of Herodias's young daughter. Of course, the Dance of the Seven Veils was allotted to a member of the ballet, who naturally did not pad her youthful slimness into the semblance of the venerable singer she was for the moment replacing. I think the Opéra management miscalculated the temper of the A. E. F., for certainly no doughboy that sat through the Mariotte monstrosity once would ever conceivably get anywhere near it again. At any rate, repetitions of this "Salome" were few.

On the other hand, the "Tragédie de Salomé" of Schmitt had considerable success. I was myself disappointed in the celebrated Ida Rubinstein, and the mock-Bakst scenery, doubtless supposed by somebody or other to be fiercely "modern," and the illuminated masks of the decapitated prophet bursting out all over the back drop were more for laughter than for tears. However, the Opéra maintains a capable corps de ballet. But the performance by the orchestra did not compare with that on Saturday.

The suite, in two parts, played on Saturday (not for the first time in New York, by the way), is, I suppose, the suite made by the composer for concert use which was brought out at a Colonne concert in Paris, Jan. 8, 1911. The action which Schmitt's music was written to accompany takes place on the terrace of Herod's palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. A storm is gathering. There are visions of the engulfed cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Women's voices resound from the depths. More of boding and the inexorable march of fate reside in the music than of voluptuous appeal. After the sorry game with John is over, the music culminates in the remorse and terror of the girl as the head of the Prophet whose death she caused confronts her here, there, and everywhere. The storm bursts in a cataclysm of nature Salome is "swept about by an infernal frenzy."

The scoring of the piece is exceedingly rich, sufficiently oriental in suggestion, and dark with a sense of irrevocable doom. Some pages, especially the earlier dances, lose something when separated from the action. On the other hand, much of the music I found more impressive Saturday than with the distraction of a sometimes incongruous spectacle before my eyes. Of course, the performance on Saturday was superb, for not only did the orchestra play well, but Mr. Monteux conducts this work as from a tripod. Still it is a music more remarkable for its intention, its dramatic feeling, and its sumptuous scoring than for thematic originality and worth.

Before the more or less unfamiliar elements of the programme Mr. Monteux led a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. One wondered if in bringing this symphony over here from Boston Mr. Monteux had any idea of how often it has been played in New York, of how one local orchestra has almost specialized in it and two others—Well, coals to Newcastle or not, after the scherzo-march one saw the quality of his wisdom. The great audience applauded like a battery of Big Berthas, and without further ado a triumphant conductor could properly have his men stand up and bow with him before the bombardment.

This same audience, from emotional exhaustion due to the symphony perhaps, responded not at all to the vast sonorities of the Schmitt "Salomé" and scurried out after "Catalonia" with scarcely a hand for the jocund players. And yet "Catalonia" surely exhibits promise of an easy popularity.

PITTS SANBORN.

snows imagination. But we should grasp its content with greater certainty could we but behold some new Loie Fuller in the act of miming the heroine and brutally disrobed by the pursuing Herod flashing one breathless white instant in a glare of lightnng. In 1918 the time was not ripe for the performance of the drama of Robert d'Humieres. But "facilis decensus Averni." Since the peaceful advent of "Aphrodite" we may hope to advance soon to the true dance of the seven veils.

The time for a general revision of appreciations of the works of Tschaikowsky seems to be at hand. Doubtless much light could be thrown on their nature by a new study of their aesthetic qualities in the light of the racial and political debacle in Russia. Tschaikowsky may unconsciously have been a prophet of doom. Certainly all that is most unhealthy, febrile, hectic in his compositions stands forth more clearly to-day than it did ten years ago.

The "Pathetic" at some moments yesterday seemed a pathological symphony in which neurasthenia was predominant in its demand for treatment. Mr. Monteux took much comfort from the first movement, which he conducted with better artistic results than he obtained from anything else on his programme. The orchestra obeyed the conductor in all things and the honorable brass blowers earned their money.

The third number was Florent Schmitt's "Salome" music, inspired not by Wilde's play, which Strauss has set with discordant and horrible realism, but by a poem by D'Humieres from which Loie Fuller arranged a set of dances for Paris, using the skeleton of this now highly developed orchestral music as the accompaniment and support. That anything so lovely as this complex score, richly tinged with orientalism, could spring from so degraded a story as that of Salome, renews in art the natural marvel of a lovely flower growing from filth. The music creates an eastern scene in the imagination and the crooning of its voices behind the scenes raises a vision of Arab tents hidden amid palm trees. For the completeness of the illusion the audience was indebted to an admirable performance, in which the conductor, Pierre Monteux, showed more enthusiasm that the intricate score should not go amiss than in anything which he has led as yet in Brooklyn.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Mme. Homer, Soloist, Delights Audience at Academy.

Musical Brooklyn was at the Academy of Music last night, the occasion being the second appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteaux, conducting and Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, as the soloist.

The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic) in B minor, Op. 74, in four movements, and Leader Monteaux made even a greater impression, if that were possible, than in his earlier appearance in this borough as leader of the Boston Orchestra. His work with the baton is so artistic and masterful and with so little apparent effort that one instinctly feels the moods of the theme as they flow from the tip of his wand.

Mme. Homer, as her many admirers in Brooklyn know, has a deep, rich contralto voice, and she was in magnificent form last night. Her rendition of "Ombra mai fu," from Act I., Scene 1, of the opera "Xerxes," was magnificent, and "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos," was another number that called for much applause.

"The Tragedy of Salome," a suite for orchestra by Schmitt, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, was the closing number by the orchestra. This was received with much applause.

The audience last night was typical of Brooklyn's best traditions.

From Times DEC 7- 1919
New York City

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played two more pieces now or unfamiliar to its audience at its second concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon: movements from Florent Schmitt's music for "The Tragedy of Salomé," a "mute drama," and the first movement of Isaac Albeniz's suite, "Catalonia." It began with a performance of Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony.

Florent Schmitt's music to "Salomé" obviously needs the explanation or the illustration of the pantomime for its complete understanding. It was presented yesterday in two movements: the first including the prelude and a "Dance of Pearls"; the second "The Enchantments of the Sea," "Dance of the Lightnings," and "Dance of Fear." The music is strongly marked in mood and the dances, some of them tinged with an Oriental color, have the propulsive movement and the picturesque expression that are to be carried out by the miming of the dancer and that are properly complementary to it.

Schmitt's musical nature is more robust and more powerful than that of some of his colleagues of the contemporaneous French school; his ideas are strong and musically significant, they are submitted to a treatment at once plastic and vigorous; fecund, often harsh, but stimulating in harmonic devices, vividly colored in orchestration. There is in this music the suggestion of the vague inquietude, the mystery, the orgiastic revel, the wild abandon of the dancer, the final terror. There are new and strange orchestra effects, as the deep gasps of the lowest wood wind at the close of the "Dance of Fear." In "The Enchantments of the Sea" a small chorus of women's voices is distantly heard from behind the scene, increasing in sonority; their chant is Oriental; it is said to be a song noted down on the banks of the Dead Sea. It is, at any rate, singularly effective in underlining the expression of the movement.

Albeniz's suite is called "of a folk ure," and this folk nature is obvious e section played; a somewhat boisus tune of a markedly Spanish acforms the basis of it, treated inly with clangorous instrumenta- It has an "al fresco" character, y cheerful, and, while the composer s it upon some riotous modern harnies, there is little search in it for thing hidden from the clear light of day.

The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes, likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from a symphony in the way of "thrills"; this has aged rapidly and seems now more pious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors in Tschaikowsky's list. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday. The audience spent most of its applause upon it, and had little left for Schmitt and Albeniz.

From RIBUNE, DEC 7 - 1919
New York City

Boston Symphony Concludes Second Visit of Season

Colorful Suite by Alsatian Could Be Supplemented by Motion Pictures With Fine Effect, Says Reviewer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its second visit to New York of this season with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There were three numbers on the program—the first an almost too familiar one, for Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony can be heard too often, since it is not of the stuff of which classics are made—the second an unfamiliar composition, though it had had a previous hearing in New York; the third a novelty. This last was the first part of "Catalonia," by Albeniz, a suite based on a national air, bright and stirring in itself and happily treated in the transcription, with a bit of humor suggestive of the playing of an itinerant band of musicians, the notion of which may have been borrowed from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony or Beethoven's "Pastoral," in both of which it appears.

The second piece in the list was a suite composed by Florent Schmitt for a pantomimic play by Robert d'Humières entitled "La Tragédie du Salomé." It was with this composition, played by the Boston Orchestra on January 10, 1914, that the Alsatian composer was introduced to a New York audience. It made so strong an impression upon The Tribune's musical reviewer then that he set it down as far and away the most significant instrumental composition which had come out of France since Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune." That impression was confirmed yesterday, though we are again moved to deplore that music so intimately associated with scenery and action cannot be given with its proper pictorial accompaniment. We are not jesting when we add that a performance would not lose in dignity if the pictures were of the moving kind.

"The Tragedy of Salome" is crowded with lurid incidents which have been vividly translated into tones by Schmitt, who is a Debussy of more solid substance than his model, and though his music is fascinating in itself it could be made more so if eyes could aid ears. The plan ought to commend itself to Mr. Eastman as an instructive feature in his educational scheme for Rochester. Why not? Many years ago, long before moving pictures were dreamed of, somebody in Germany—in Düsseldorf, we belief—tried to heighten the effect of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" by exhibiting an old-fashioned panorama while the music was playing. Programmatic music ought to be accompanied by a program. A concert book can serve the purpose in a measure, but Mr. Hale's admirable annotations are not allowed in Carnegie Hall and comparatively few people remember that they may be had from distributors in the street. Some persons would have been spared yesterday if they

New York City Sun
DEC 7 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SAD MATINEE

Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," Last Word in Musical Pessimism.

SCHMITT'S "SALOME" ALSO

French Pianist Has Recital in Aeolian Hall—Concert by Philharmonic.

The tired matinee girls who went home from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon must have wished in the secret recesses of their little souls that they had their dear, kind, old Dr. Muck back again, no matter what dreadful newspapers said about him. He never compelled them to sit through two hours of such supremely modern music.

Think of it! There was Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the last word in musical pessimism; the orchestral suite made from Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," a proclamation of the ultimate cataclysm of the world, the flesh and the devil, especially the second; and the first movement of Albeniz's "Catalonia," a folk song suite in which the naive lyrics of a simpleminded people are made to prance violently on the richly caparisoned steeds of modern orchestration.

Those little matinee girls must have been exhausted. How sweet the use of afternoon tea to the soul, weary from overweight of tone poems. Of course they all liked the third movement of the Tschaikowsky symphony. That is always applauded no matter how badly it is played and the nine muses know it was pretty badly played yesterday. But there was almost no applause for Schmitt's wild vision of the lustful daughter of Herodias. Not even the weird chanting of the unseen chorus (very well done) cheered the sombre souls. Nor did the "Catalonia" evoke raptures. It was a sad occasion.

Schmitt's Music Interesting.

Schmitt's "Salome" music was introduced to us at a matinee of the Boston musicians on January 10, 1914. The composition impressed THE SUN'S music reviewer at that time as well worth while, and that impression was renewed yesterday. The music is interesting to the student of orchestral technic by reason of its color scheme, its mastery of modern harmony, its ingenious employment of instrumental combinations such as the blending of stopped trumpets in chord effects instead of using them for solo purposes only, curious treatments of harp harmonics and arpeggiated pizzicati in the strings.

But of course details do not constitute a work of art. Schmitt's compo-

m EAGLE
ress Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 6- 19

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Louise Homer Soloist of a Fine Program at the Academy.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn at the Academy last night had a strong although somewhat monotonous program, consisting of two long works for the orchestra separated by a group of songs by that perennial favorite, Louise Homer. The opening was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, in which the tragedy of the Russian spirit pours itself forth with an authority and poignancy reached in no other art form. The great work is familiar alike to audience and band and it will almost play itself in the hands of these fine musicians. That is pretty nearly what it did last night, at any rate for the first two movements. In the third, supposed to show the hectic rebellion of man in the grasp of Fate, there was a gripping intensity which brought enthusiastic applause and called the orchestra to its feet in response to the tribute. The last movement, the lament so tragic in its despair that it has moved to protest that such music should be written or played, carried its weight of woe as always.

Madame Homer, radiant and in perfect voice, sang three songs. The first was Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," and the second that air which Handel wrote for a soprano love song in his opera "Xerxes," but which has come to popular favor on the 'cello and violin as the "Largo." It lies in Madame Homer's voice almost as gratefully as on a 'cello and the applause for it was long and hearty. The singer really came into her own, however, with the old Verdi war horse, "O Don Fatale," to which her fine, large operatic style and her amplitude of vocal resource are fully fitted. She sang it superbly

From STANDARD UNION DEC 7- 19
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

"We live in an age when men treat art as if it were meant to be a form of autobiography," declared one of the chief personages in the novel of "Dorian Gray." It was in reality Oscar Wilde himself speaking in a work of literary art that later proved to be itself an autobiography of the author. But the quotation applies with singular force to the "Pathetique" symphony of Tschaikowsky which opened the programme of the second Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Friday evening. Many who know the work, and it is known by thousands, find in its measures music in which they hear reflected their own personal lives, with its "illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories and end," to quote from Mr. Philip Hale's descriptive notes. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, vouchsafed an interpretation of the famous score different from that of any other contemporary musician, treating it not as a personal document but as absolute music free from the restriction of relation to any definite fixed programme that might have lurked in its composer's mind at the time of the symphony's composition. Mr. Monteux's reading was unusual in its illumination of the conventional details of the work, revealing with remarkable clearness its form and melody, even to the extent of flashing the light on several unsuspected phrases. But, with all this clearness of architectural joint, so useful to the deep student of music, those well acquainted with the symphony could not but have felt a noticeable lack of lyric and tragic poetry of the soul so strikingly expressed in its score. The sombre, lugubrious, Russian color of the first and closing movements was lightened by a French touch, Mr. Monteux's own. The third movement was given as fine a virtuoso reading as has ever been heard in Brooklyn, it being necessary for the players to rise thrice

Music.

Spanish Novelty on Boston Symphony Programme.

What seems to have been the first public performance in New York of any orchestral piece by a Spanish composer occurred at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The work given is the "Catalonia" of Isaac Albeniz, a composer hitherto chiefly known to the local public through some brilliant piano pieces illustrative of life in Spain.

For the concert of the Symphony Society on Nov. 13 Walter Damrosch announced the performance of "La Procesion del Rocio," by the Spaniard Joaquin Turina, but at a late hour substituted the overture to Lalo's opera of Breton legend and folk color, "Le Roi d'Ys." Unfortunately, the official bulletin of the Symphony Society did not note the change, with the result that some listeners carried away a belief that the Breton misting was a Spanish dew. Mr. Damrosch has not yet come around to giving the Turina piece a public hearing. The "Catalonia" of Albeniz, I understand, was rehearsed by the Philharmonic Society a year or two ago, but there was no public performance.

Now, Albeniz composed a great deal of music aside from his piano pieces. Curiosity in regard to it is natural. "Catalonia" is described as the first member of a tripartite suite, but there is no record of the other sections having been written. It is a jocular, boisterous piece, based on a single theme of folk character. At one point an imitation of strolling musicians interrupts the festivities. The whole thing might depict a peasant merrymaking or a Catalonian village fair. It is open-air music, forthright and muscularly gay. Under a cloudless sky you see the swarthy merrymakers and hear the clatter of their castanets, while the southern sun drenches them with heat and light. In rude jest the harmonies bite and stab; instruments gurgle or shriek with joy. Musically the piece is by no means so rich as the Frenchman Chabrier's rhapsody "España." Nevertheless if it were repeated a few times I believe it has very good chances of becoming as popular with audiences. This in spite of the singular apathy of the audience on Saturday. But the audience on Saturday deserves a special word later on.

The dashing performance of "Catalonia" came at the end of a three-piece programme, after the orchestra had given of its best for nearly half an hour in the "Tragédie de Salomé" of Florent Schmitt, that modern French composer of Alsatian parentage. This work has a curious history. Originally it was written for small orchestra to be performed at Jacques Rouché's little Paris playhouse Le Théâtre des Arts in connection with a mute drama by Robert d'Humières. The first performance occurred Nov. 9, 1907. Loie Fuller was the Salome of that production and Lou Tellegen, then billed under the name of Lou van Tel, was the John the Baptist.

Schmitt heard the tragedy in larger sonorities than the small orchestra of the Théâtre des Arts could render, so he rewrote the score for the huge apparatus of the full modern orchestra. In its new form the music accompanied a performance of the mute drama at the Châtelet in Paris during a season organized in the spring of 1912 by Mme Trouhanowa, who impersonated Salome. Later the Diaghileff ballet took it up, presenting it in London and at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées in Paris, with Karsavina as Salome, in the summer of 1913.

In due time Jacques Rouché of the Théâtre des Arts became director of the Paris Opéra and along with him went his lieutenant, Louis Laloy as its secretary general. These gentlemen bethought themselves last spring of the "Salomé" of years ago and presented the work on the great stage of the Opéra (in the enlarged version, of course), with Ida Rubinstein as Salomé. The town was then full of the A. E. F. and the august direction of the Opéra seemed to have got it fixed in its head that the name Salome spelled box office success. For after "La Tragédie de Salomé" was shelved for the time being to afford Mlle Rubinstein a holiday, the management brought forward the curious "Salomé" of the former naval officer Mariotte composed, as in the case of Richard Strauss's "Salome," to Oscar Wilde's text).

Some Paris reviewers labored to contrast favorably the "art" of Mariotte with the rank "sensationalism" of Richard Strauss. If they be right, then à bas l'art! I spent an unforgettable evening at the Opéra early last July listening to the granitic, anti-sensuous music of Mariotte and watching with bewilderment the manœuvres of Lucienne Bréval, burdened with years and adipose tissue, as she lumbered through the paces of Herodias's young daughter. Of course, the Dance of the Seven Veils was allotted to a member of the ballet, who naturally did not pad her youthful slimness into the semblance of the venerable singer she was for the moment replacing. I think the Opéra management miscalculated the temper of the A. E. F., for certainly no doughboy that sat through the Mariotte monstrosity once would ever conceivably get anywhere near it again. At any rate, repetitions of this "Salome" were few.

On the other hand, the "Tragédie de Salomé" of Schmitt had considerable success. I was myself disappointed in the celebrated Ida Rubinstein, and the mock-Bakst scenery, doubtless supposed by somebody or other to be fiercely "modern," and the illuminated masks of the decapitated prophet bursting out all over the back drop were more for laughter than for tears. However, the Opéra maintains a capable corps de ballet. But the performance by the orchestra did not compare with that on Saturday.

The suite, in two parts, played on Saturday (not for the first time in New York, by the way), is, I suppose, the suite made by the composer for concert use which was brought out at a Colonne concert in Paris, Jan. 8, 1911. The action which Schmitt's music was written to accompany takes place on the terrace of Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Sea. A storm is gathering. There are visions of the engulfed cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Women's voices resound from the depths. More of boding and the inexorable march of fate reside in the music than of voluptuous appeal. After the sorry game with John is over, the music culminates in the remorse and terror of the girl as the head of the prophet whose death she caused confronts her here, there, and everywhere. The storm bursts in a cataclysm of nature Salome is "swept about by an infernal frenzy."

The scoring of the piece is exceedingly rich, sufficiently oriental in suggestion, and dark with a sense of irrevocable doom. Some pages, especially the earlier dances, lose something when separated from the action. On the other hand, much of the music I found more impressive Saturday than with the distraction of a sometimes incongruous spectacle before my eyes. Of course, the performance on Saturday was superb, for not only did the orchestra play well, but Mr. Monteux conducts this work as from a tripod. Still it is a music more remarkable for its intention, its dramatic feeling, and its sumptuous scoring than for thematic originality and worth.

Before the more or less unfamiliar elements of the programme Mr. Monteux led a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony. One wondered if in bringing this symphony over here from Boston Mr. Monteux had any idea of how often it has been played in New York, of how one local orchestra has almost specialized in it and two others—Well, coals to Newcastle or not, after the scherzo-march one saw the quality of his wisdom. The great audience applauded like a battery of Big Berthas, and without further ado a triumphant conductor could properly have his men stand up and bow with him before the bombardment.

This same audience, from emotional exhaustion due to the symphony perhaps, responded not at all to the vast sonorities of the Schmitt "Salomé" and scurried out after "Catalonia" with scarcely a hand for the jocund players. And yet "Catalonia" surely exhibits promise of an easy popularity.

PITTS SANBORN.

From Times
New York City
DEC 7 - 1919

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played two more pieces now or unfamiliar to its audience at its second concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon: movements from Florent Schmitt's music for "The Tragedy of Salomé," a "mute drama," and the first movement of Isaac Albeniz's suite, "Catalonia." It began with a performance of Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony.

Florent Schmitt's music to "Salomé" obviously needs the explanation or the illustration of the pantomime for its complete understanding. It was presented yesterday in two movements; the first including the prelude and a "Dance of Pearls"; the second "The Enchantments of the Sea," "Dance of the Lightnings," and "Dance of Fear." The music is strongly marked in mood and the dances, some of them tinged with an Oriental color, have the propulsive movement and the picturesque expression that are to be carried out by the miming of the dancer and that are properly complementary to it.

Schmitt's musical nature is more robust and more powerful than that of some of his colleagues of the contemporaneous French school; his ideas are strong and musically significant, they are submitted to a treatment at once plastic and vigorous; fecund, often harsh, but stimulating in harmonic devices, vividly colored in orchestration. There is in this music the suggestion of the vague inquietude, the mystery, the orgiastic revel, the wild abandon of the dancer, the final terror. There are new and strange orchestra effects, as the deep gasps of the lowest wood wind at the close of the "Dance of Fear." In "The Enchantments of the Sea" a small chorus of women's voices is distantly heard from behind the scene, increasing in sonority; their chant is Oriental; it is said to be a song noted down on the banks of the Dead Sea. It is, at any rate, singularly effective in underlining the expression of the movement.

Albeniz's suite is called "of a folk ure," and this folk nature is obvious e section played; a somewhat bois- s tune of a markedly Spanish ac- forms the basis of it, treated in- sly with clangorous instrumenta- It has an "al fresco" character, ly cheerful, and, while the composer ts it upon some riotous modern har- nies, there is little search in it for thing hidden from the clear light of day.

The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes, likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from a symphony in the way of "thrills"; this has aged rapidly and seems now more it has less lasting than its two obvious predecessors in Tschaikowsky's immediate predecessors in Tschaikowsky's list. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday. The audience spent most of its applause upon it, and had little left for Schmitt and Albeniz.

New York City Sun
DEC 7 1919

Boston Symphony Concludes Second Visit of Season

Colorful Suite by Alsatian Could Be Supplemented by Motion Pictures With Fine Effect, Says Reviewer

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its second visit to New York of this season with a concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. There were three numbers on the program—the first an almost too familiar one, for Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony can be heard too often, since it is not of the stuff of which classics are made—the second an unfamiliar composition, though it had had a previous hearing in New York; the third a novelty. This last was the first part of "Catalonia," by Albeniz, a suite based on a national air, bright and stirring in itself and happily treated in the transcription, with a bit of humor suggestive of the playing of an itinerant band of musicians, the notion of which may have been borrowed from Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony or Beethoven's "Pastoral," in both of which it appears.

The second piece in the list was a suite composed by Florent Schmitt for a pantomimic play by Robert d'Humières entitled "La Tragédie du Salomé." It was with this composition, played by the Boston Orchestra on January 10, 1914, that the Alsatian composer was introduced to a New York audience. It made so strong an impression upon The Tribune's musical reviewer then that he set it down as far and away the most significant instrumental composition which had come out of France since Debussy's "L'Après-midi d'un Faune." That impression was confirmed yesterday, though we are again moved to deplore that music so intimately associated with scenery and action cannot be given with its proper pictorial accompaniment. We are not jesting when we add that a performance would not lose in dignity if the pictures were of the moving kind.

"The Tragedy of Salome" is crowded with lurid incidents which have been vividly translated into tones by Schmitt, who is a Debussy of more solid substance than his model, and though his music is fascinating in itself it could be made more so if eyes could aid ears. The plan ought to commend itself to Mr. Eastman as an instructive feature in his educational scheme for Rochester. Why not? Many years ago, long before moving pictures were dreamed of, somebody in Germany—in Düsseldorf, we belief—tried to heighten the effect of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony" by exhibiting an old-fashioned panorama while the music was playing. Programmatic music ought to be accompanied by a program. A concert book can serve the purpose in a measure, but Mr. Hale's admirable annotations are not allowed in Carnegie Hall and comparatively few people remember that they may be had from distributors in the street. Some perplexity would have been spared yes-

---

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SAD MATINEE

Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," Last Word in Musical Pessimism.

SCHMITT'S "SALOME" ALSO

French Pianist Has Recital in Aeolian Hall—Concert by Philharmonic.

The tired matinee girls who went home from the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon must have wished in the secret recesses of their little souls that they had their dear, kind, old Dr. Muck back again, no matter what dreadful newspapers said about him. He never compelled them to sit through two hours of such supremely modern music.

Think of it! There was Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, the last word in musical pessimism; the orchestral suite made from Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," a proclamation of the ultimate cataclysm of the world, the flesh and the devil, especially the second; and the first movement of Albeniz's "Catalonia," a folk song suite in which the naive lyrics of a simpleminded people are made to prance violently on the richly caparisoned steeds of modern orchestration.

Those little matinee girls must have been exhausted. How sweet the use of afternoon tea to the soul, weary from overweight of tone poems. Of course they all liked the third movement of the Tschaikowsky symphony. That is always applauded no matter how badly it is played and the nine muses know it was pretty badly played yesterday. But there was almost no applause for Schmitt's wild vision of the lustful daughter of Herodias. Not even the weird chanting of the unseen chorus (very well done) cheered the sombre souls. Nor did the "Catalonia" evoke raptures. It was a sad occasion.

Schmitt's Music Interesting.

Schmitt's "Salome" music was introduced to us at a matinee of the Boston musicians on January 10, 1918. The composition impressed THE SUN'S music reviewer at that time as well worth while, and that impression was renewed yesterday. The music is interesting to the student of orchestral technic by reason of its color scheme, its mastery of modern harmony, its ingenious employment of instrumental combinations such as the blending of stopped trumpets in chord effects instead of using them for solo purposes only, curious treatments of harp harmonics and arpeggiated pizzicati in the strings.

But of course details do not constitute a work of art. Schmitt's compo-

---

m EAGLE
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 6 - 19

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Louise Homer Soloist of a Fine Program at the Academy.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony season in Brooklyn at the Academy last night had a strong although somewhat monotonous program, consisting of two long works for the orchestra separated by a group of songs by that perennial favorite, Louise Homer. The opening was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, in which the tragedy of the Russian spirit pours itself forth with an authority and poignancy reached in no other art form. The great work is familiar alike to audience and band and it will almost play itself in the hands of these fine musicians. That is pretty nearly what it did last night, at any rate for the first two movements. — In the third, supposed to show the hectic rebellion of man in the grasp of Fate, there was a gripping intensity which brought enthusiastic applause and called the orchestra to its feet in response to the tribute. The last movement, the lament so tragic in its despair that it has moved to protest that such music should be written or played, carried its weight of woe as always.

Madame Homer, radiant and in perfect voice, sang three songs. The first was Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," and the second that air which Handel wrote for a soprano love song in his opera "Xerxes," but which has come to popular favor on the 'cello and violin as the "Largo." It lies in Madame Homer's voice almost as gratefully as on a 'cello and the applause for it was long and hearty. The singer really came into her own, however, with the old Verdi war horse, "O Don Fatale," to which her fine, large operatic style and her amplitude of vocal resource are fully fitted. She sang it superbly snows imagination. But we should grasp its content with greater certainty could we but behold some new Loie Fuller in the act of miming the heroine and brutally disrobed by the pursuing Herod flashing one breathless white instant in a glare of lightnng. In 1918 the time was not ripe for the performance of the drama of Robert d'Humieres. But "facilis decensus Averni." Since the peaceful advent of "Aphrodite" we may hope to advance soon to the true dance of the seven veils.

The time for a general revision of appreciations of the works of Tschaikowsky seems to be at hand. Doubtless much light could be thrown on their nature by a new study of their aesthetic qualities in the light of the racial and political debacle in Russia. Tschaikowsky may unconsciously have been a prophet of doom. Certainly all that is most unhealthy, febrile, hectic in his compositions stands forth more clearly to-day than it did ten years ago.

The "Pathetic" at some moments yesterday seemed a pathological symphony in which neurasthenia was predominant in its demand for treatment. Mr. Monteux took much comfort from the first movement, which he conducted with better artistic results than he obtained from anything else on his programme. The orchestra obeyed the conductor in all things and the honorable brass blowers earned their money.

CITIZEN
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Mme. Homer, Soloist, Delights Audience at Academy.

Musical Brooklyn was at the Academy of Music last night, the occasion being the second appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteaux, conducting and Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, as the soloist.

The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic) in B minor, Op. 74, in four movements, and Leader Monteaux made even a greater impression, if that were possible, than in his earlier appearance in this borough as leader of the Boston Orchestra. His work with the baton is so artistic and masterful and with so little apparent effort that one instinctly feels the moods of the theme as they flow from the tip of his wand.

Mme. Homer, as her many admirers in Brooklyn know, has a deep, rich contralto voice, and she was in magnificent form last night. Her rendition of "Ombra mai fu," from Act I., Scene 1, of the opera "Xerxes," was magnificent, and "O Don Fatale," from the opera "Don Carlos," was another number that called for much applause.

"The Tragedy of Salome," a suite for orchestra by Schmitt, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, was the closing number by the orchestra. This was received with much applause.

The audience last night was typical of Brooklyn's best traditions.

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 7-

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

"We live in an age when men treat art as if it were meant to be a form of autobiography," declared one of the chief personages in the novel of "Dorian Gray." It was in reality Oscar Wilde himself speaking in a work of literary art that later proved to be itself an autobiography of the author. But the quotation applies with singular force to the "Pathetique" symphony of Tschaikowsky which opened the programme of the second Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Friday evening. Many who know the work, and it is known by thousands, find in its measures music in which they hear reflected their own personal lives, with its "illusions, desires, loves, struggles, victories and end," to quote from Mr. Philip Hale's descriptive notes. Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, vouchsafed an interpretation of the famous score different from that of any other contemporary musician, treating it not as a personal document but as absolute music free from the restriction of relation to any definite fixed programme that might have lurked in its composer's mind at the time of the symphony's composition. Mr. Monteux's reading was unusual in its illumination of the conventional details of the work, revealing with remarkable clearness its form and melody, even to the extent of flashing the light on several unsuspected phrases. But, with all this clearness of architectural joint, so useful to the deep student of music, those well acquainted with the symphony could not but have felt a noticeable lack of lyric and tragic poetry of the soul so strikingly expressed in its score. The sombre, lugubrious, Russian color of the first and closing movements was lightened by a French touch, Mr. Monteux's own. The third movement was given as fine a virtuoso reading as has ever been heard in Brooklyn, it being necessary for the players to rise thrice and her richness of tone and her fine authority quickened regret that she is not this season a member of the company at the Metropolitan.

The third number was Florent Schmitt's "Salome" music, inspired not by Wilde's play, which Strauss has set with discordant and horrible realism, but by a poem by D'Humieres from which Loie Fuller arranged a set of dances for Paris, using the skeleton of this now highly developed orchestral music as the accompaniment and support. That anything so lovely as this complex score, richly tinged with orientalism, could spring from so degraded a story as that of Salome, renews in art the natural marvel of a lovely flower growing from filth. The music creates an eastern scene in the imagination and the crooning of its voices behind the scenes raises a vision of Arab tents hidden amid palm trees. For the completeness of the illusion the audience was indebted to an admirable performance, in which the conductor, Pierre Monteux, showed more enthusiasm that the intricate score should not go amiss than in anything which he has led as yet in Brooklyn.

New York City
DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

AT any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The psychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

> Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when contrasted by the wildly radical procedure of avowing a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.

> "The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair æsthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.
>
> Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.
>
> Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that 'the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life'—they will doubtless even go on calling the solemnly beautiful fourth movement "the Cathedral scene." And audiences may not inconceivably thank them for it, even if the lovable but illogical Schumann is committed thereby to the indiscretion of "showing his heart to the world."
>
> The present writer declined to accept the invitation to prayer since he long ago made up his mind that Robert Schumann poured out his heart in his music without mental or artistic reservations. But this observer of musical activities is inclined to admit that despite its argumentative character this comment of Mr. Gilman's is suggestive to the listener to the E flat symphony, and that is of course what a programme note should be.
>
> But the impersonal method of Mr. Hale, which would be difficult to imitate, is the ideal one. Naturally he sometimes has something to say for himself, but as a rule he contrives with remarkable skill to put before the reader of his work a mass of information and suggestion uncolored by his own feelings or convictions. That, it seems to this writer, is the ideal method.

Schmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, snappy rhythms are featured.

In one movement voices "back stage" are heard, adding nothing to the color of the whole. They sound "de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the

Mr. Monteux has ... formance at the Symphony ... the first times in Boston two of ... Roussel's "Evocations." The composer, Parisian "modernist" of the second rank, is little known hereabouts, but Chicago, at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous, square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

> The playing of Chausson's symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's tone-poem.

Again, in The Times of Sunday Mr. Aldrich, having heard Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony and the suite from Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," comments:

> The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from this symphony in the way of "thrills." It has aged rapidly and seems now more obvious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday.

Items and Incidents

There is nothing to record of the concert of Mr. McCormack in Symphony Hall yes-

Meanwhile it is an open secret that if Mr. Monteux fulfills a present purpose and devotes the final pair of Symphony Concerts next May to Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," Mr. McCormack will undertake the tenor part in it. Should the project fail, he will sing as "soloist" in a pair of concerts.

choruses of Händel's "Solomon."

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.
>
> The rest of the programme was ne new to New York, though not familia Chausson's symphony, which has bee more than once played here, is nob and beautiful music, one of the fine products of the modern—but not t most modern—French school; mus deeply felt, poetical in spirit, express in a rich instrumental garb that tingly clothes its substance, and w a fine feeling for the beauty that sides in beautiful form. It was play with careful elaboration by Mr. M teux, evidently in sympathy with without too much restraint in the br section. In "Thamar" also, the c ductor sought to lay on thickly the chestral coloring.

...mmist"

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon gave an exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony that was engrossing. Besides the programme held Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Sal... " and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

Clipped from the
PITTSBURGH POST
Date DEC 9 - 19...

-:- MUS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

It has been two years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last played here and much water has flown under the Federal street bridge since then. Now the Boston Orchestra is not a virtuosi orchestra; it is a straightaway organization without any desire to over-accentuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, a virtuoso director, the nuage of a nuance and the subtlety of a suggestion concern him not at all, and for these and kindred blessings, great thanks. The last time Pierre Monteux was here was when the Russian ballet wiped the coal dust out of our collective eye—that we might see the better—so we are more or less familiar with his powers—and his restraint. He is a forceful conductor, but not a brilliant leader.

The program opened with a marvelous symphony by that most gifted of French song writers, Ernest Chausson. Chausson, with Vincent d'Indy (both pupils of César Franck) and Gabriel Faure and Charles Bordes, were a potential faction in music in France. To them is due the Schola Cantorum. There were times last night when Chausson seemed to be peering out from beneath the Cesar Franck symphonic mantle, and there were other times when he seemed to be singing nothing but his charming chansons. The symphony was in three movements, "Lent," a morbid mood; "Tres lent," woe without the attendant wail, and "Anime," a battle-cock and shuttle-dore motivation, and a movement of great beauty. It may not be the sensational symphony of the year, but it is well worth a second hearing. We commend it to the City of Brotherly Love.

The Cesar Franck symphonic p... "Le Chasseur Maudit," and, by the ... there were three of them, whic... two too many, revealed Pere... without his customary halo.

New York City

DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

At any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The psycychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

> Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when confronted by the wildly radical procedure of avowing a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.
>
> "The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair æsthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.
>
> Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.
>
> Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that 'the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life'—they will doubtless even go on calling the solemnly beautiful fourth movement "the Cathedral scene." And audiences may not inconceivably thank them for it, even if the lovable but illogical Schumann is committed thereby to the indiscretion of "showing his heart to the world."
>
> The present writer declined to accept the invitation to prayer since he ong ago made up his mind that Robert Schumann poured out his heart in his music without mental or artistic reservations. But this observer of musical activities is inclined to admit that despite its argumentative character this comment of Mr. Gilman's is suggestive to the listener to the E flat symphony, and that is of course what a programme note should be.

But the impersonal method of Mr. Hale, which would be difficult to imitate, is the ideal one. Naturally he sometimes has something to say for himself, but as a rule he contrives with remarkable skill to put before the reader of his work a mass of information and suggestion uncolored by his own feelings or convictions. That, it seems to this writer, is the ideal method.

Schmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, snappy rhythms are featured.

In one movement voices "back stage" are heard, adding nothing to the color of the whole. They sound "de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the

---

Mr. Monteux has ... performance at the Symphony ... the first times in Boston two of ... Roussel's "Evocations." The composer, Parisian "modernist" of the second rank, is little known hereabouts, but Chicago, at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous, square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

> The playing of Chausson's symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's tone-poem.

Again, in The Times of Sunday Mr. Aldrich, having heard Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony and the suite from Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," comments:

> The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from this symphony in the way of "thrills." It has aged rapidly and seems now more obvious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday.

Items and Incidents

There is nothing to record of the concert of Mr. McCormack in Symphony Hall yes...

Meanwhile it is an open secret that if Mr. Monteux fulfills a present purpose and devotes the final pair of Symphony Concerts next May to Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," Mr. McCormack will undertake the tenor part in it. Should the project fail, he will sing as "soloist" in a pair of concerts.

choruses of Händel's "Solomon."

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.
>
> The rest of the programme was not new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is noble and beautiful music, one of the finest products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that fittingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that resides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with it; without too much restraint in the brass section. In "Thamar" also, the conductor sought to lay on thickly the orchestral coloring.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon gave an exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony that was engrossing. Besides the programme held Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia," a folk suite in three parts.

-:- MUS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

been two years since the Bos-phony Orchestra last played d much water has flown under eral street bridge since then, e Boston Orchestra is not a orchestra; it is a straight-ganization without any desire to entuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, conductor, a virtuoso director, e of a nuance and the subtlety gestion concern him, not at all, these and kindred blessings, nks. The last time Pierre Mon- here was when the Russian ed the coal dust out of our eye—that we might see the we are more or less familiar owers—and his restraint. He l conductor, but not a bril-

am opened with a marvelous that most gifted of French Ernest Chausson. Chaus-ncent d'Indy (both pupils of k) and Gabriel Faure and es, were a potential fac- in France. To them is a Cantorum. There were t when Chausson seemed out from beneath the symphonic mantle, and r times when he seemed othing but his charming symphony was in three ent," a morbid mood; without the attendant ne," a battle-cock and vation, and a movement It may not be the hony of the year, but second hearing. We he City of Brotherlck, symphonic p fit," and, by the of them, whic ealed Pere ary halo

New York City

DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

At any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The psychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when confronted by the wildly radical pro-

---

...chmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, ...appy rhythms are featured. ...n one movement voices "back ...age" are heard, adding nothing to ...e color of the whole. They sound ...de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the ...cedure ... a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.

"The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair aesthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.

Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.

Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that "the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life"—they will doubtless even go on calling the solemnly beautiful fourth movement "the Cathedral scene." And audiences may not inconceivably thank them for it, even if the lovable but illogical Schumann is committed thereby to the indiscretion of "showing his heart to the world."

The present writer declined to accept the invitation to prayer since he

...ong ago made up his mind that Robert Schumann poured out his heart in his music without mental or artistic reservations. But this observer of musical activities is inclined to admit that despite its argumentative character this comment of Mr. Gilman's is suggestive to the listener to the E flat symphony, and that is of course what a programme note should be.

But the impersonal method of Mr. Hale, which would be difficult to imitate, is the ideal one. Naturally he sometimes has something to say for himself, but as a rule he contrives with remarkable skill to put before the reader of his work a mass of information and suggestion uncolored by his own feelings or convictions. That, it seems to this writer, is the ideal method.

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.

The rest of the programme was ... new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is not ... and beautiful music, one of the fine products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that ... tingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that ... sides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with ... without too much restraint in the brass section. In "Thamar" also, the conductor sought to lay on thickly the ... chestral coloring.

...mist"

Mr. Monteux ... formance at the ... the first times in Boston ... Roussel's "Evocations." The ... Parisian "modernist" of the ... is little known hereabouts, but Chausson ... at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous, square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

The playing of Chausson's symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's tone-poem.

Again, in The Times of Sunday Mr. Aldrich, having heard Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony and the suite from Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," comments:

The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from this symphony in the way of "thrills." It has aged rapidly and seems now more obvious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday.

Items and Incidents

There is nothing to record of the concert of Mr. McCormack in Symphony Hall yes...

Meanwhile it is an open secret that if Mr. Monteux fulfills a present purpose and devotes the final pair of Symphony Concerts next May to Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," Mr. McCormack will undertake the tenor part in it. Should the project fail, he will sing as "soloist" in a pair of concerts.

choruses of Händel's "Solomon."

PUBLISHED ... DEC - 9 1919

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon gave an exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony that was engrossing. Besides the programme held Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Sa..." and Albeniz's "Catalonia," ...

Clipped from the
PITTSBURGH POST
Date DEC 9 - 19...

MUS...

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

It has been two years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last played here and much water has flown under the Federal street bridge since then. Now the Boston Orchestra is not a virtuosi orchestra; it is a straightaway organization without any desire to over-accentuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, a virtuoso director, the nuage of a nuance and the subtlety of a suggestion concern him not at all, and for these and kindred blessings, great thanks. The last time Pierre Monteux was here was when the Russian ballet wiped the coal dust out of our collective eye—that we might see the better—so we are more or less familiar with his powers—and his restraint. He is a forceful conductor, but not a brilliant leader.

The program opened with a marvelous symphony by that most gifted of French song writers, Ernest Chausson. Chausson, with Vincent d'Indy (both pupils of César Franck) and Gabriel Faure and Charles Bordes, were a potential faction in music in France. To them is due the Schola Cantorum. There were times last night when Chausson seemed to be peering out from beneath the Cesar Franck symphonic mantle, and there were other times when he seemed to be singing nothing but his charming chansons. The symphony was in three movements, "Lent," a morbid mood; "Tres lent," woe without the attendant wail, and "Anime," a battle-cock and shuttle-dore motivation, and a movement of great beauty. It may not be the sensational symphony of the year, but it is well worth a second hearing. We commend it to the City of Brotherly Love.

The Cesar Franck symphonic p... "Le Chasseur Maudit," and, by the ... there were three of them, whic... two too many, revealed Pere... without his customary halo.

New York City

DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

At any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The psychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when confronted by the wildly radical procedure of devoting a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.

"The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair æsthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.

Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.

Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that 'the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life'—they will doubtless even go on calling the solemnly beautiful fourth movement "the Cathedral scene." And audiences may not inconceivably thank them for it, even if the lovable but illogical Schumann is committed thereby to the indiscretion of "showing his heart to the world."

The present writer declined to accept the invitation to prayer since he long ago made up his mind that Robert Schumann poured out his heart in his music without mental or artistic reservations. But this observer of musical activities is inclined to admit that despite its argumentative character this comment of Mr. Gilman's is suggestive to the listener to the E flat symphony, and that is of course what a programme note should be.

But the impersonal method of Mr. Hale, which would be difficult to imitate, is the ideal one. Naturally he sometimes has something to say for himself, but as a rule he contrives with remarkable skill to put before the reader of his work a mass of information and suggestion uncolored by his own feelings or convictions. That, it seems to this writer, is the ideal method.

Schmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, snappy rhythms are featured.

In one movement voices "back stage" are heard, adding nothing to the color of the whole. They sound "de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the

Mr. Monteux has [illegible] performance at the Symphony Concert the first times in Boston two of Albert Roussel's "Evocations." The composer, Parisian "modernist" of the second rank, is little known hereabouts, but Chicago at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous, square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

> The playing of Chausson's symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's tone-poem.

Again, in The Times of Sunday Mr. Aldrich, having heard Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony and the suite from Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," comments:

> The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from this symphony in the way of "thrills." It has aged rapidly and seems now more obvious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday.

Items and Incidents

There is nothing to record of the concert of Mr. McCormack in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Meanwhile it is an open secret that if Mr. Monteux fulfills a present purpose and devotes the final pair of Symphony Concerts next May to Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," Mr. McCormack will undertake the tenor part in it. Should the project fail, he will sing as "soloist" in a pair of concerts.

choruses of Händel's "Solomon."

ESTABLISHED 1891

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon gave an exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony that was engrossing. Besides the programme held Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Sa[illegible]" and Albeniz's "Catalonia."

Clipped from the
PITTSBURGH POST

Date DEC 8 19

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

> The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.
>
> The rest of the programme was new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is not and beautiful music, one of the fine products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that tingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that sides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with without too much restraint in the brass section. In "Thamar" also, the conductor sought to lay on thickly the chestral coloring.

—mmist"

-:- MUS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

It has been two years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last played here and much water has flown under the Federal street bridge since then. Now the Boston Orchestra is not a virtuosi orchestra; it is a straightaway organization without any desire to over-accentuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, a virtuoso director, the nuage of a nuance and the subtlety of a suggestion concern him not at all, and for these and kindred blessings, great thanks. The last time Pierre Monteux was here was when the Russian ballet wiped the coal dust out of our collective eye—that we might see the better—so we are more or less familiar with his powers—and his restraint. He is a forceful conductor, but not a brilliant leader.

The program opened with a marvelous symphony by that most gifted of French song writers, Ernest Chausson. Chausson, with Vincent d'Indy (both pupils of César Franck) and Gabriel Faure and Charles Bordes, were a potential faction in music in France. To them is due the Schola Cantorum. There were times last night when Chausson seemed to be peering out from beneath the Cesar Franck symphonic mantle, and there were other times when he seemed to be singing nothing but his charming chansons. The symphony was in three movements, "Lent," a morbid mood; "Tres lent," woe without the attendant wail, and "Anime," a battle-cock and shuttle-dore motivation, and a movement of great beauty. It may not be the sensational symphony of the year, but it is well worth a second hearing. We commend it to the City of Brotherly Love.

The Cesar Franck symphonic p[oem] "Le Chasseur Maudit," and by the [way] there were three of them, whi[ch] two too many, revealed Pere without his customary halo.

New York City

DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

AT any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The pscychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when confronted by the wildly radical procedure of avowing a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.

"The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair aesthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.

Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.

Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that 'the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life'—they will doubtless even go on calling the solemnly beautiful fourth movement "the Cathedral scene." And audiences may not inconceivably thank them for it, even if the lovable but illogical Schumann is committed thereby to the indiscretion of "showing his heart to the world."

The present writer declined to accept the invitation to prayer since he long ago made up his mind that Robert Schumann poured out his heart in his music without mental or artistic reservations. But this observer of musical activities is inclined to admit that despite its argumentative character this comment of Mr. Gilman's is suggestive to the listener to the E flat symphony, and that is of course what a programme note should be.

But the impersonal method of Mr. Hale, which would be difficult to imitate, is the ideal one. Naturally he sometimes has something to say for himself, but as a rule he contrives with remarkable skill to put before the reader of his work a mass of information and suggestion uncolored by his own feelings or convictions. That, it seems to this writer, is the ideal method.

Schmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, snappy rhythms are featured.

In one movement voices "back stage" are heard, adding nothing to the color of the whole. They sound "de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.

The rest of the programme was not new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is noble and beautiful music, one of the finest products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that fittingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that resides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with it; without too much restraint in the brass section. In "Thamar" also, the conductor sought to lay on thickly the orchestral coloring.

—

...mmist"

...ainge

Mr. Monteux has ... performance at the Symphony Concert the first times in Boston two of ... Roussel's "Evocations." The composer, Parisian "modernist" of the second rank, is little known hereabouts, but Chicago at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous, square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

The playing of Chausson's symphony was not as good as the music, for Pierre Monteux is an enthusiast in fortes. He indulges in a piano sometimes, but he seems to be happiest when he sets the trombones and trumpets raging and the tympani imagining a vain thing. Something more of refinement would have helped both the symphony and Mr. Griffes's tone-poem.

Again, in The Times of Sunday Mr. Aldrich, having heard Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony and the suite from Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," comments:

The playing of the orchestra was not, in finish and beauty, all that it might have been or has been. Mr. Monteux had evidently prepared Schmitt's music with great care. His reading of the symphony has been surpassed in poignancy, in rhythmic firmness and incisiveness, in the stir of its climaxes likewise in technical finish and precision. But it is not a very high task to extract all that can be extracted from this symphony in the way of "thrills." It has aged rapidly and seems now more obvious and less lasting than its two immediate predecessors. But there have been better performances of it than that heard yesterday.

Items and Incidents

There is nothing to record of the concert of Mr. McCormack in Symphony Hall yes...

Meanwhile it is an open secret that if Mr. Monteux fulfills a present purpose and devotes the final pair of Symphony Concerts next May to Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," Mr. McCormack will undertake the tenor part in it. Should the project fail, he will sing as "soloist" in a pair of concerts.

choruses of Händel's "Solomon."

...ESTABLISHED 1691

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon gave an exposition of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" symphony that was engrossing. Besides the programme held Schmitt's suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," and Albeniz's "Catalonia," a folk suite in three parts.

-:- MUS

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall.

...been two years since the Bos...phony Orchestra last played ...d much water has flown under ...eral street bridge since then; ...e Boston Orchestra is not a ... orchestra; it is a straight... ganization without any desire to ...entuate. Nor is Pierre Monteux, ... conductor, a virtuoso director, ...e of a nuance and the subtlety ...gestion concern him not at all, ... these and kindred blessings, ...nks. The last time Pierre Mon... here was when the Russian ...ped the coal dust out of our ... eye—that we might see the ... we are more or less familiar ...owers—and his restraint. He ...l conductor, but not a bril...

...am opened with a marvelous ...y that most gifted of French ... Ernest Chausson, Chaus...ncent d'Indy (both pupils of ...k) and Gabriel Faure and ...es, were a potential fac... in France. To them is ...la Cantorum. There were ...t when Chausson seemed ... out from beneath the ... symphonic mantle, and ...r times when he seemed ...othing but his charming ... symphony was in three ...ent," a morbid mood; ...e without the attendant ...ne," a battle-cock and ...vation, and a movement ... It may not be the ...hony of the year, but ... second hearing. We ...he City of Brotherl...

...ck symphonic p... ...fit," and by the ... of them, whi... ...ealed. Pere... ...ery halo.

New York City

DEC 7 1919

Many Persons Erroneously Believe They Can Hear Music Intelligently and Read Programme Notes at the Same Time

By W. J. HENDERSON.

AT any orchestral concert scores of persons who are supposedly listeners to the music may be seen with their eyes fixed on programme notes. They honestly believe that they are hearing the music intelligently and reading about it at the same time. Now one might eat skilfully cooked food and read an account of its preparation at the same moment, because he would be performing two distinctly separate processes. But how can one achieve two intellectual operations on the same topic at the same instant? How can you read about a melody and absorb both the music and its literary explanation simultaneously?

Many times the writer has propounded this question to music lovers and has invariably been rewarded with an amazed stare as if he were partly demented to make such an inquiry. People do believe that they can read the history of Beethoven's troubles or Shubert's facility while they are listening to and actually comprehending the musical continuity of the fifth or the unfinished symphony.

The poor music reviewer admits that he cannot do it. The pscychologists agree with him. Napoleon could dictate several different letters at the same time, but natuarlly he had to dictate to each secretary in turn. He had only one mouth. But in his brain what took place? He laid down one letter and took up the next, and such was his faculty of retention that when he reached the first letter again in its turn he could go on where he left off. Or did Napoleon sometimes say: "Ah, let me see, Miss Smith, where was I?"

However, the programme note is with us. It is here to stay. Who invented the blessed thing and why? What is it for? Who gets any benefit from it? How do the writers of programme books discharge their duties? These are pertinent questions. Some cannot be answered by the present writer. He does not know who invented programme notes nor why. But he may hazard some conjecture as to the purpose of the notes.

How Many Know What a Symphoyn Is?

Perhaps once upon a time some one wished to know why a composer called his composition a "symphony," but that question seems never to be asked now. At any rate all programme notes coming under the eye of this writer take it for granted that music lovers know what a symphony is. But just try the experiment of asking one of them. The chances are a thousand to one that (unless he happens to be a professional) he cannot answer you.

Generally speaking, a composition which appears on a programme with the simple designation "Symphony in A major" needs no programme note whatever beyond perhaps the dates of the composer's birth and death and the year in which the work was produced. If the writer of the note is to go any further, there is no limit. The determination of the question whether notes should be long or short depends upon the use to which they are to be put. If auditors are to read them in the concert room they cannot be too brief, because they ought to read between numbers, not while the music is going on. If, however, programme books are intended to be distributed before concerts they may be as long as the writers deem essential to their purposes.

Very few people get any benefit from programme notes. Many persons are annoyed by the persistent rustling of the paper while idlers turn over the leaves in their profound examination of the advertisements. Herein lies perhaps the principal reason for the existence of long programme notes. They can be made to carry a valuable amount of advertising, which brief notes cannot.

The purpose of a programme note should be to give just as much information as is absolutely necessary to the enlightenment of the listener and no more. None of the programme books which come to the desk of this writer quite meet this requirement. The greatest author of programme notes in this country, and probably in all countries, is Philip Hale, who makes those for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ideal Programme Notes.

Mr. Hale's work is issued in the form of a pamphlet of some sixty or seventy pages, of which a considerable part is occupied by advertising. It was never intended that patrons of the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, should sit in their seats trying to read all these "ads." and notes while the concert was in progress. The little booklets are obviously designed for preparation and reminiscence. Mr. Hale's system presupposes devotion on the part of the music lover, but it is a devotion richly repaid, for these booklets are mines of history, erudition, anecdote and human interest. They are creations of literary art and when in the course of time Mr. Hale ends his labors they will remain in libraries an imperishable monument to his learning, his patience, wide sympathies and his literary taste.

The broad scope of Mr. Hale's plan enables him to include long analyses of the compositions to be performed, and this the present writer believes to be the least beneficial part of all programme notes. Not more than one concertgoer in 500 is capable of assimilating the technical information thus imparted. In the field of what is called programme music it can be employed advantageously in so far as it identifies for the listener the representative themes, or "leading motives," and explains in some measure the composer's delineative scheme. But beyond that it has little value.

Nevertheless, the analytical method is in high favor. It is used—to quote instances immediately at hand—in the programme books of the Chicago, Minneapolis, Philadelphia and Los Angeles orchestras. For the Chicago organization the notes are written with signal ability by Felix Borowski, who has established a reputation not only as a musician but also as a critic. His analyses are helped by the use of extracts from the compositions described, and it should be said that for persons who can read music such quotations are essential. No description of a theme will enable a music lover to recognize it as the printed notes will.

Philip Goepp, who writes the notes for the Philadelphia Orchestra, makes less elaborate analyses than Mr. Borowski, and contrives in comparatively brief space to give considerable information and no small amount of excellent suggestion. Carlo Fischer writes the notes for the Minneapolis Orchestra. He gives extended analyses of compositions with illustrations in notation. The name of the writer of the Los Angeles programme books has escaped the notice of THE SUN'S music reviewer, but the notes are a combination of historical and analytical without excerpts in notation.

Programme Notes in This City.

In this city the Philharmonic Society's programme notes are prepared by W. H. Humiston, assistant conductor of the organization, and those of the New Symphony Orchestra by Lawrence Gilman. Daniel Gregory Mason formerly wrote those of the Symphony Society, but his name does not appear in the Bulletin this season. Mr. Humiston writes very brief notes and endeavors to confine himself to such information as may meet the immediate needs of the auditor after he reaches the concert hall.

Mr. Gilman has introduced into the realm of the programme note a new force. He does not hesitate to embark upon constructive or instructive criticism and even indulges in mild polemics at times. His notes at any rate provide pungent stimulation to the jaded mind. When Mr. Bodanzky lately conducted a brilliant performance of Schumann's E flat symphony, commonly called the "Rhenish," Mr. Gilman sought to prepare the minds of the listeners with these words:

Thus the E flat symphony might be placed among that indeterminate class of compositions which is neither out and out "absolute" music (if there is any such thing as "absolute" music that is 100 per cent. "absolute") nor out and out programme music; though the insatiable Professor Niecks boldly gathers it into that far sweeping critical dragnet, Programme Music in the Last Four Centuries. Schumann, like many composers of programme music, was sometimes as timorous and furtive when confronted by the wildly radical procedure of [illegible] a title for a piece of music with a poetic or pictorial basis as a man who has dared to wear a straw hat on a hot October day.

"The theory that a piece of music is bad unless it is 'self-sufficing' and 'self-explanatory,'" says that clear sighted critical realist, Ernest Newman, "is a mere nightmare of the armchair æsthetician. There are thousands of pages in Bach that only yield up their full secret to us when we get some outside light upon the sequence of poetic ideas in his mind at the time of writing," and he cites the case of many of the chorale preludes, for example.

Elsewhere he has shrewdly said: "If melody, harmony and development are all shaped and directed by certain pictures in the musician's mind, we get no further than the mere outside of the music unless we are familiar with those pictures." But we have no intention of arguing the vast and vexatious and much mauled subject of programme music. It is a perilous and unrewarding theme. The attitude assumed by Schumann in this matter is sanctified by the most respectable usage, and has multitudinous defenders. Let us pray.

Nevertheless, commentators will doubtless continue to ignore Schumann's reservation, and will perversely insist on telling audiences what Spitta tells the readers of his biography of Schumann: that 'the whole symphony [illegible] vivid pictures of Rhineland [illegible] they will doubtless ever [illegible] calling the solemnly [illegible] fourth movement "the [illegible] scene." And audiences [illegible] inconceivably thank them; [illegible] even if the lovable but [illegible] Schumann is committed the [illegible] the indiscretion of "showi[illegible] heart to the world."

The present writer declined [illegible] cept the invitation to prayer [illegible]

[illegible] ong ago made up his mind th[illegible] rt Schumann poured out his [illegible] his music without mental or [illegible] reservations. But this obser[illegible] musical activities is inclined to [illegible] that despite its argumentative [illegible] acter this comment of Mr. Gilma[illegible] suggestive to the listener to t[illegible] flat symphony, and that is of c[illegible] what a programme note should [illegible]

But the impersonal method of [illegible] Hale, which would be difficult to [illegible] tate, is the ideal one. Naturally [illegible] sometimes has something to say [illegible] himself, but as a rule he contri[illegible] with remarkable skill to put befo[illegible] the reader of his work a mass of [illegible] formation and suggestion uncolored [illegible] his own feelings or convictions. Tha[illegible] it seems to this writer, is the idea[illegible] method.

New York, Monteux and Griffes

Of the concert of the Boston Orchestra in New York last evening and of Mr. Griffes's tone-poem then and there played, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," Mr. Aldrich writes in The Times of this morning:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the first concert on its second trip to New York a programme that suffered somewhat from a too great similarity of style in at least two of its numbers. It was a programme of modern music entirely; and it is likely that something more of contrast would have given greater value to what was played. It began with Chausson's symphony in B flat; Griffes's symphonic poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," and Mily Balakirev's symphonic poem, "Thamar," followed, and Mottl's orchestration of Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," a piano piece in its original form, closed it. The two symphonic poems had too many points of contact to make suitable members of the same programme. . . . The dancing and revelry in Mr. Griffes's piece are, of course, Oriental, and they have given him the starting point for music of a strongly Oriental character in melodic intervals, in instrumentation, in harmonic basis. He has previously shown a predilection for this quality in music; he "does" it well, without a slavish following of the accepted Oriental formulas, but rather with some interesting departures from them. Nevertheless, Orientalism in music involves the following of formula, which is to our ears necessarily to a greater or less degree artificial, and hence, before long, monotonous. Mr. Griffes will no doubt find an expression that does not require so deliberate an adoption of a style so obvious and so remote, and it will be to the advantage of the permanency of what he writes. The introduction and earlier pages of his piece show imagination and invention, a mysterious suggestion of the sacred river, a brilliant evocation of the dome. The music is quite free in the structure, and while in certain passages the orchestration seems somewhat tentative, there is much that is successful in richness and brilliancy; and the piece achieves its pictorial purpose. It was much applauded; and the composer rose repeatedly to bow his acknowledgements.

The rest of the programme was not new to New York, though not familiar. Chausson's symphony, which has been more than once played here, is noble and beautiful music, one of the finest products of the modern—but not the most modern—French school; music deeply felt, poetical in spirit, expressed in a rich instrumental garb that fittingly clothes its substance, and with a fine feeling for the beauty that resides in beautiful form. It was played with careful elaboration by Mr. Monteux, evidently in sympathy with it; without too much restraint in the brass section. In "Thamar" also, the conductor sought to lay on thickly the orchestral coloring.

[illegible]mist"

[illegible]inge

Schmitt dedicates his score. Choppy, snappy rhythms are featured.

In one movement voices "back stage" are heard, adding nothing to the color of the whole. They sound "de trop" and unnecessary.

The soloist was Louise Homer, who, judging by her selections, has been searching for old novelties. The quest yielded "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the air "Ombra mai fu," from Handel's "Xerxes" (the noted "Largo), and the aria "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Such numbers seem out of place on a programme when a symphony is played. Mme. Homer's voice shows wear, her offerings, all lying in the mezzo-soprano range, not favoring her tones of the lower register. At any rate, such old-fashioned, uninteresting numbers were not in keeping with the high quality of the

---

Mr. Monteux has [illegible] formance at the Symphony Concert the first times in Boston two of [illegible] Roussel's "Evocations." The composer, Parisian "modernist" of the second rank, is little known hereabouts, but Chicago, at the instance of Mr. Stock, and New York, at the instance of Mr. Damrosch, have already heard these fanciful and colorful pieces.

Mr. Kreisler played in New Haven last evening before an audience in which the faculty, the students and the whole "university circle" of Yale were copiously represented. To the usual questions about the disposition of the collegiate authorities toward the violinist as "alien enemy," President Hadley cheerfully replied that they had willingly let their hall to him. At the concert not a hand stirred except in warm applause.

Dec 5

Mr. Monteux in New York

Mr. Monteux's besetting infirmity, a fondness for "big tone," strenuous square cut and moving in opaque masses, is as clear to the reviewers of concerts in New York, though they hear the Boston Orchestra but twice a month, as it is to more frequent listeners here at home. Thus Mr. Henderson wrote in The Sun about the conductor last Thursday:

The playing of Chausson's symphony [illegible] as good as the music, for Monteux is an enthusiast in [illegible] indulges in a piano some[illegible] seems to be happiest [illegible] trombones and trum[illegible] the tympani imagining [illegible]thing more of re[illegible] helped both the [illegible]iffes's tone-poem.

[illegible] f Sunday Mr. Ald[illegible]ikovsky's Pathetic [illegible]ite from Schmitt's [illegible]omments:

[illegible] orchestra was [illegible]ty, all that it [illegible]een. Mr. Mon[illegible]ured Schmitt's [illegible] His reading [illegible]urpassed [illegible]ess and [illegible]limaxes.

H. B. G.

[illegible] precious task [illegible] merely coincidental contiguity of [illegible] tracted [illegible] day at his next visit and show us [illegible] seems Stokowski would repeat the Boston [illegible] than [illegible] wonderment as to whether Leo[illegible] But [illegible] semblance of [illegible] that the Boston Symphony Orches[illegible] the consensus of opinion was the [illegible] Hall was crowded last night [illegible] and lovingly received.

[illegible] concert [illegible] forgot his tonsure and left hall, book [illegible] that. It was Liszt in his apogee, when [illegible] familiar friendliness, closed the pro[illegible] Liszt "Les Preludes," with its [illegible] and "Scherherezade" with an [illegible] the [illegible] say the least. It was plangent and [illegible] and all that. It was plangent and [illegible] of episodes that were—well, [illegible] the other way?—save his poetic [illegible] Rimsky-Korsakow reminiscences—or [illegible] Five" or "The Kouchka," with [illegible] Balakirieff, leader of the [illegible] Russian excursion into sensuous [illegible] is a mystery. Here we had an [illegible] scenario of a Russian symphonic [illegible] to the "Follies" when they can read [illegible] other color. (Just why anyone should [illegible] the Franck poem, was a chassis of [illegible]," which followed close on the heels [illegible]

ERS & CO.
JUST TWICE THE ABOV
$50 Vic. 43/4
$50 4th 43/4
$50 3rd 43/4
$50 2nd 43/4
following prices, net to sell
Number of the Pittsburgh Sto n you just have an emergency.

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Plays Modern Music—Homer Sings Songs and Arias

CONFINING its own selections to the works of three modern composers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its second concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening, introduced as soloist Louise Homer, the popular contralto, who was heard in two numbers, the first consisting of excerpts from Beethoven, Handel and Bach, and the second the well-known aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's seldom-given opera, "Don Carlos."

On its orchestral side the concert was particularly rich in the sort of effects that are characteristic of some of the latter-day composers, without an excess of the eccentricities or atrocities, as they might be called, of those writers who are classed as "modernists" of the extreme type. The symphony was the B-flat major, Op. 20, of Ernest Chausson, a work distinctively of the French school, sombre, even melancholy, in its first two movements, but poetic and emotional, of many rarely beautiful and stirring effects. It is the kind of music that shows to excellent advantage the new permanent conductor of the Boston orchestra, Pierre Monteux, unless it be said that he is equally "at home" in such compositions as those which came later on the program, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and the characteristic "Bourree Fantasque" of Chabrier.

Primarily an operatic conductor, and of the French opera more particularly, Monteux scarcely can be said to be wholly in his element with the orchestral baton in his hand. There was not much fault to be found with him last evening, however. He seemed to discover the finest qualities of the orchestra. At any rate, the organization was at its best, so far as the past few seasons are concerned, and in tone and all other respects its work was superior to that at the first concert several weeks ago.

As for Madame Homer, seldom has this favorite contralto appeared to such excellent advantage on the concert stage in Philadelphia. In personality and manner she was as charming as ever, and the glorious voice was revealed to the fullest extent of its rare beauty. A most impressive rendering of Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" was followed by the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera of "Xerxes," by Handel, in which occurs the familiar melody of the so-called "Largo," and this in turn by "My Heart Ever Faithful," from Bach's cantata, "For God So Loved the World." If anything more were needed to prove anew Homer's truly great powers as a singer, she provided it in a highly dramatic delivery of "O Don Fatale," which, hackneyed as it is, by her superb rendering is enriched and exalted. The audience which filled the house in every part was moved to unmistakably sincere expressions of its approval of orchestra, conductor and soloist.

rom Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

BOSTONSYMPHONYAND LOUISE HOMER HERE

One of the largest audiences the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever had here vigorously applauded the polyphonic music and the lyric soloist—our one and only Louise Homer—at the Academy last evening. The overflow of the attendance into the space within the brass rail was the result of an annoying delay half way through the Chausson symphony, which began the program. Pierre Monteux patiently waited until order was restored.

This Chausson symphony is a fine work, whose large and noble pattern is not easy to grasp at first intent. It is not wanting in melodious vivacity nor in an impressive climax in the slow movement, but it was written more for posterity than for immediate popularity. The audience took to it kindly last night and brought the players to their feet at the end in recognition of a reading that was both intense and intelligent.

Louise Homer first sang a group of airs—Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's "Ombra mai fu," commonly known as "The Largo," and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Her very presence radiated gracious womanhood and a compelling personality, and in all she sang the richness of quality and the rounded perfection of her tones suggested what a loss it is to the operatic stage that she is not with the Metropolitan Opera Co. at present. None has filled a place that is her own.

Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," required to be heard with the text of Lermontoff's poem (supplied in the program book) at hand, and it was then realized how faithfully the music with its transports of passion and its quiet interludes reflected the story of the fatal tower of the half-angelic, half-diabolic Thamar. It distantly reminded one of Dvorsky's "Haunted Castle," but the present scene is much more articulate and much better arranged. Verdi's "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," was sung by Madame Homer with a limpid flow of the Italian syllables and a fine upbuilding of the climax at the close. The subsequent applause was tremendous

rom
RESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

LOUISE HOMER IN CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Great Singer, at Zenith of, Her Powers, Thrills Great Audience, Which Also Appreciates Leadership of Pierre Monteux. In Program of Much Interest.

By CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

For the second concert of the Philadelphia season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought as soloist the American contralto, Louise Homer, who has in her time reached, perhaps, the pinnacle of success in the field of opera and concert. In addition to the drawing power of the soloist, the Boston Orchestra presented a program that of itself carried a deal of interest. Also we had the second opportunity of judging Pierre Monteux as a conductor of symphonic works, and while it is even yet too soon to pass the final word upon the accomplishments of Mr. Monteux, we are of the opinion that as we get to know him better we may like his work the more; which is so much better than if he made at first meeting a strong impression that dimmed with closer acquaintance.

The program last night opened with the somewhat familiar Symphony in B-flat, by Ernest Chausson. This work is one of the better examples of French symphonic writing, carrying with it, throughout the three movements, a message of somewhat greater depth than usually attaches to the works of the French writers. Mr. Monteux gave the Symphony a most gratifying reading—he seems to be much at home in the works of his compatriots. The contrasts of moods were well delineated, the dynamics were appropriately timed and the varied tempos taken at a speed that gave the feeling of naturalness.

After the Symphony Louise Homer sang a group of three classic songs, Bethoven, Handel, Bach. Even with the increasing years, despite the silvering hair and the cares of a real family, Louise Homer maintains her place as one of the foremost singers of her time. Her voice has lost little or none of its quality, her breath control is none the less perfect and her interpretations of the various arias and songs as interesting as ever. The audience, which filled the Academy, gave the soloist a rousing reception, both before and after her singing of the songs, both of which receptions she deserved; the first for what she has done in the past, and the later applause for her fine work last night.

The program's third number was the seldom heard and little known Symphonic Poem of Mili Balakireff with the title of "Thamar." In this Symphonic work Balakiriff does not appear at his best either in melodic and harmonic creation or in instrumentation. Perhaps the greatest interest that one can find in the "Thamar" Symphonic Poem is the fact that it is palpably the "dady" to the Rimski "Scheherezade." Perhaps we should frown on Rimski for his evident and probably voluntary absorption of ideas and effects from the Balakirew Poem, but we cannot deny that Rimski certainly made a better job of the thing.

However, let us be thankful to Balakirew for germinating the ideas contained in the "Thamar" composition, if it seems fragmentary we can enjoy many temporary bits of orchestration; if at times we find the orchestration somewhat out of balance, we can hunt around and no doubt find a morsel or two of good tune. So it goes throughout the work; Balakirew didn't seem to strike the combination simultaneously, there is good melody with mediocer instrumentation and vice versa, but seldom both good melody and fine orchestration.

The playing of the work was done well by the Boston Orchestra—we assume that Mr. Monteux has many times conducted the work in his previous sphere of musical activity.

Number four on the program brought forward Louise Homer once more, this time to sing the aria "O Don Fatale," from Giuseppi Verdi's "Don Carlos." In this aria Mrs. Homer gave evidence of the unusual range of her voice; she is nominally an alto, but when she was soaring around G's and A's in the soprano her voice was as well placed and pleasant to listen to as when [illegible] her highest note was a high B flat, which was remarkably well taken, considering the fact that this is an extremely high note for an alto to sing.

The dramatic "Don Fatale" aroused the enthusiasm of the audience anew; many times was the singer compelled to acknowledge the plaudits of her hearers.

The concert closed with the Bourree Fantastique of Emanuel Charbrier, another well-known example of French composition. This was done in the traditional fashion, except at one point, where the oboe and snare drums appeared to have a difference of opinion concerning the tempo; the oboe, following the conductor, started an accelerando, but Mr. Drummer refused to be one of the party. Well, after all, these little things help to break the monotony of affairs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Chausson..Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20
I. Lent.
II. Tres lent.
III. Anime.

Songs with Orchestra—
Beethoven.
Nature's Adoration, Op. 48, No. 4
Handel.
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera "Xerxes," Act. 1, Scene 1
Bach.
Air, "My Heart Ever Faithful." from the Cantata "For God so Loved the World."
Balakireff.
"Thamar," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra (after the Poem by Michail Lermontoff).
Verdi.
Aria. "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos." Act 4, Scene 6.
Chabrier.....Bourree Fantasque
Soloist. Louise Homer.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
- 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Some Interesting Novelties on the Second Program—Mme. Louise Homer the Soloist

Three modern orchestral works, two of them never before played in Philadelphia, and Madam Louise Homer as soloist were the attractions of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, and they were potent enough completely to fill the Academy of Music, even to the extent of all the chairs that the orchestra pit would hold.

The symphony, Chausson's in B flat, opened the program. Its American history is bound closely to Philadelphia, for its first American performance was in this city by the Boston Orchestra, under Vincent d'Indy as guest conductor, almost exactly fourteen years ago. Last season it was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of another guest conductor, M. Alphonse Catherine, and last evening under the leadership of Mr. Monteux. It is a serious work, conceived and carried out along modern, though sane, lines and finely orchestrated. Owing, perhaps, to the many changes of time and tempi in the various movements, the composition savors of the rhapsodic more than of the strictly symphonic, but it is a fine work and will bear frequent hearings.

The Balakireff number was a symphonic poem, "Thamar," written after the poem of Michail Lermontoff, and is another of those fantastic legends to which the later Russian composers are so fond of giving tonal settings. This one of Balakireff has some fine places and some undeniable weaknesses. It is rhythmically, at least, a first cousin to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," which our own orchestra gave last week, but without the melodic inspiration nor marvelous orchestration of that work. It carries out the legend faithfully, but is too long to sustain interest unflaggingly throughout, especially in the lengthy return of the first motive after the climax.

The third number was a clever, written "Bourree Fantasque" by Chabrier, wonderfully orchestrated by Felix Mottl. So fine was the orchestration that, conceived as a piano composition there was no hint that it was not originally composed for orchestra. As a work it is interesting and original and made an excellent close to the varied program.

Madam Homer again proved the favorite she always is. Her superb voice was not in the best of condition, as she evidently had a cold, but it was rich and had all of its usual volume. She first sang three songs, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; "Ombra mai fu," which is the original form of Haendel's famous Largo, beloved of the populace, and the air "My Heart Ever Faithful," from one of the cantatas of Sebastian Bach. Of course, the Largo made the biggest hit, although all were loudly applauded. On her second appearance Madam Homer sang the well-known aria from "Don Carlos" with even greater success.

The orchestra played better than it has in this city for at least a year, despite a couple of slips in intonation in the beginning of the symphony and in the "Don Carlos" accompaniment. There is evidently a return of the discipline which was so conspicuously lacking toward the close of last season, with better tone quality, more unanimity of attack and more of an effort to give the conductor the effects and the results he wishes to obtain.

Mr. Monteux was apparently en rapport with the program, especially with the symphony, which he read sympathetically and with considerably more of the emotional elements than M. Catherine displayed in his interpretation, with our own orchestra last spring. The whole program was one which showed him at his best, and he bids fair to put the great organization back into the prestige of its former position.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

MONTEUX'S GENIUS SHOWN IN CONCERT

Makes Boston Orchestra Performance One of Season's Events

HOMER IS SOLOIST

By Linton P. Martin

Genius, whether of interpretation or creation, is signalized by qualities that are beyond the competition of talent, however able it may be. The orchestral conductors heard here at various times are for the most part men of conspicuous talent. But there was a vivifying quality of genius in the conducting of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy by Pierre Monteux which made the concert one of the great red-letter musical events of the season. And the combination of Monteux at the conductor's stand and Louise Homer, greatest of American contraltos, as soloist, sufficed to jam the building to its uttermost.

Perhaps the program had something to do with the thrill that palpably marked the progress of the concert. For it was a program marked by the true cosmopolitanism of the conductor, combining modernity of musical idiom with sterling worth, and with just enough background of the classics to give it balance and artistic unity. The classics, however, were confined entirely to Homer's first group of songs, sung immediately after Ernest Chausson's B-flat major symphony, which opened the concert.

Mr. Monteux's conducting of the symphony was a revelation of its transcendant musical beauty. The work is scored with extraordinary richness, its musical thought is vital and noble, and it is characterized thruout by a lofty emotional eloquence that is potently moving and thrilling.

On her first appearance Homer sang three classic songs, Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Haendel's air from "Xerxes," popularly called the "Largo," and the famous old "My Heart Ever Faithful" of Bach. The legato quality and opulent color of Homer's superb contralto were displayed magnificently in all of these, and her voice was fresher and more vibrant than last season in opera.

The orchestra followed with Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," effective but shallow music, and best suited for the ballet performances. It was played with captivating verve.

Homer made her second and final appearance in the aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Her dramatic skill and presence lends itself peculiarly to music of this sort, and she poured her splendid voice into it without restraint.

The final number on the program was Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," a work so light and breezy that its presence on a symphonic program is rather startling. But it provides precisely a sort of ending that such a program should have, and it was played with capital spirit.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 19[illegible]

he entertainment.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Louise Homer as Soloist at Concert In Academy of Music.

The second visit this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Louise Homer as soloist, drew such an audience to the Academy of Music last night that difficulty in seating some of those who had engaged seats in the orchestra pit threatened to disturb the order of the symphony which Conductor Monteux had placed first on the program. As it was, the first and second movements were played with latecomers standing in the aisles, and it finally became necessary to throw open one of the proscenium boxes to accommodate those whose chairs could not be located.

The concert was a delight throughout, the magnificent tone of the orchestra and its skillful manipulation by the new French conductor being a continuous pleasure. The symphony was the B flat major of Chausson, a work of great dignity and of considerable originality. While one cannot escape the fugitively reminiscent episodes suggestive of Franck, who was Chausson's preceptor, or the definite Wagnerian influence, it is yet a composition that holds the interest unflaggingly and that has many moments of real inspiration. It was wonderfully done by the orchestra, the brass choir particularly being pronounced in its beautiful organ-like tone. Monteux had a full appreciation of the dramatic, operatic style and produced some wonderful effects.

Louise Homer, always a favorite with audiences here, made a great impression by her singing first a group from Beethoven, Handel and Bach and later an aria from "Don Carlos." Homer's voice has gained in sonority and has broadened considerably in style. Outside of opera, she seldom sang as well here as she did last night. Her interpretations are always of the conventional type, but her dramatic temperament permits her to accomplish some very effective work. She created a great furore and was recalled many times. The remainder of the orchestral part of the program presented "Thamar," a symphonic poem by Balakireff, and Chabrier's Bourree Fantasique, both well played.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC

AMERICAN NOVELTIES BY THREE ORCHESTRAS

We See Familiar Home Names in the Best Musical Company Nowadays.

MAJOR HIGGINSON'S WILL

And Mr. Henderson Says a Few Choice Words on Reading Program Notes.

ORCHESTRAL music of the larger sort by Americans is certainly rapidly finding place on our symphony programs. It is astonishing how far the progress has gone. Since the war, music written by Americans is heard almost weekly in all the large cities which support orchestras of the first order, or are visited by them.

At the opening concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York last month, Mr. Stransky played "To the Fallen," a dirge for orchestra by a young man named Rogers. He is so new to us that he remains as yet unplaced, his Christian name unknown. Then, a few days later, also in the metropolis, the New York Symphony Orchestra gave for the first time a composition by a local composer, equally untouted, Charles T. Griffes. This was a thing for flute and orchestra, and received excellent critical notices.

Another few days again, and Mr. Monteux, at Boston, introduced two more novelties, one at least distinctively American. It is a symphonic poem called "The Angel of Death," and George W. Chadwick is the composer. Ernest Bloch we dare not quite call American. He is a Swiss, who writes music very definitely Hebraic and Eastern in character. But, anyway, he lives among us, and wins prizes offered by our musical institutions.

We are all still gasping these days over the magnitude of the sum of money left by H. C. Frick to foster the taste of our people in the art of painting. It was truly unfortunate, on the other hand, that the Muck row in Boston came along; unfortunate for the city and country at large, as well as for Major Higginson. An understanding had long been felt that the Major would leave on his death a handsome endowment for the orchestra which he had founded and nurtured during the later thirty-odd years of his life.

But the nastiness of the ructions over Dr. Muck and his charming status must have hurt the Bosfon patron deeply. His will of October, 1918, with a codicil of December, 1918, leaves only his music library to the orchestra, and the musical instruments he had procured for the players. And not even these are left outright. A trustee is to judge in from three to five years whether the orchestra is to have them permanently or not.

And one more word about symphony orchestras and their manifold appurtenances. Mr. Henderson pokes ruthless fun in the Sun last week at the people who read the program notes while the music is in process of playing.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Second Concert For the Season At The Academy Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when an especially varied and interesting programme, engaging the valuable services of Mme Louise Homer as assisting artist, was presented.

It began with Chaussen's symphony in B-flat major which is such a beautiful work that although it was done here last season it was a pleasure to hear it again. With its ingratiating theme, its skillfully artistic construction, and its eloquently emotional appeal, it is one of the most notable and important of modern productions in the class to which it belongs, and may properly be placed in the same category with the D-minor of Cesar Franck, with which in a spiritual and intellectual way it is closely affiliated.

Although it was written more than twenty-five years ago it is distinctively a modern composition in its form and manner, and all the resources of the contemporary orchestra are ably and effectively employed in its development. It was played with much technical efficiency and sympathetic intelligence under Mr. Pierre Monteux' appreciative and vigilant direction and to judge from the applause it incited, the performance was much admired and greatly enjoyed. Other orchestral numbers on the list were Balakireff's "Thamar," a symphonic poem for orchestra, based upon the poem by Lermontoff, which visitors to the Russian ballet may remember having heard, and the Bourree Fantasque of Alexis Manuel Chabrier, as orchestrated by Felix Mottle.

Mme Louise Homer, who whether on the operatic stage or in the concert room has long been recognized as one of the best of living contraltos, was heard with much pleasure in a series of selections which furnished a number of excellent opportunities for the effective display of her vocal abilities. Besides the great aria "O Don Fatale" from Verdie's opera of "Don Carlos" they comprised Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," the air "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's opera of "Xerxes" and the familiar "My Heart Ever Faithful" of Bach.

These are not easy numbers but their demands upon the voice and art of their interpreter were unfalteringly and admirably met, and to many of those who listened a fresh conception of their value and significance may well have been communicated.

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

Boston Symphony

Orchestra Plays Modern Music—Homer Sings Songs and Arias

CONFINING its own selections to the works of three modern composers, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its second concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening, introduced as soloist Louise Homer, the popular contralto, who was heard in two numbers, the first consisting of excerpts from Beethoven, Handel and Bach, and the second the well-known aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's seldom-given opera, "Don Carlos."

On its orchestral side the concert was particularly rich in the sort of effects that are characteristic of some of the latter-day composers, without an excess of the eccentricities or atrocities, as they might be called, of those writers who are classed as "modernists" of the extreme type. The symphony was the B-flat major, Op. 20, of Ernest Chausson, a work distinctively of the French school, sombre, even melancholy, in its first two movements, but poetic and emotional, of many rarely beautiful and stirring effects. It is the kind of music that shows to excellent advantage the new permanent conductor of the Boston orchestra, Pierre Monteux, unless it be said that he is equally "at home" in such compositions as those which came later on the program, Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and the characteristic "Bourree Fantasque" of Chabrier.

Primarily an operatic conductor, and of the French opera more particularly, Monteux scarcely can be said to be wholly in his element with the orchestral baton in his hand. There was not much fault to be found with him last evening, however. He seemed to discover the finest qualities of the orchestra. At any rate, the organization was at its best, so far as the past few seasons are concerned, and in tone and all other respects its work was superior to that at the first concert several weeks ago.

As for Madame Homer, seldom has this favorite contralto appeared to such excellent advantage on the concert stage in Philadelphia. In personality and manner she was as charming as ever, and the glorious voice was revealed to the fullest extent of its rare beauty. A most impressive rendering of Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration" was followed by the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera of "Xerxes," by Handel, in which occurs the familiar melody of the so-called "Largo," and this in turn by "My Heart Ever Faithful," from Bach's cantata, "For God So Loved the World." If anything more were needed to prove anew Homer's truly great powers as a singer, she provided it in a highly dramatic delivery of "O Don Fatale," which, hackneyed as it is, by her superb rendering is enriched and exalted. The audience which filled the house in every part was moved to unmistakably sincere expressions of its approval of orchestra, conductor and soloist.

rom Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY AND LOUISE HOMER HERE

One of the largest audiences the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever had here vigorously applauded the polyphonic music and the lyric soloist—our one and only Louise Homer—at the Academy last evening. The overflow of the attendance into the space within the brass rail was the result of an annoying delay half way through the Chausson symphony, which began the program. Pierre Monteux patiently waited until order was restored.

This Chausson symphony is a fine work, whose large and noble pattern i is not easy to grasp at first intent. I is not wanting in melodious vivacity nor in an impressive climax in the slow movement, but it was written more for posterity than for immediate popular ity. The audience took to it kindly last night and brought the players to their feet at the end in recognition of a reading that was both intense and intelligent.

Louise Homer first sang a group of airs—Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Handel's "Ombra mai fu," commonly known as "The Largo," and Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful." Her very presence radiated gracious womanhood and a compelling personality, and in all she sang the richness of quality and the rounded perfection of her tones suggested what a loss it is to the operatic stage that she is not with the Metropolitan Opera Co. at present. None has filled a place that is her own.

Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," required to be heard with the text of Lermontoff's poem (supplied in the program book) at hand, and it was then realized how faithfully the music with its transports of passion and its quiet interludes reflected the story of the fatal tower of the half angelic, half-diabolic Thamar. It distantly reminded one of Dvorsky's "Haunted Castle," but the presen scene is much more articulate and much better arranged. Verdi's "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," was sung b Madame Homer with a limpid flow o the Italian syllables and a fine upbuilding of the climax at the close. Th subsequent applause was tremendous

rom
RESS,
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 1919

LOUISE HOMER IN CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Great Singer, at Zenith of Her Powers, Thrills Great Audience, Which Also Appreciates Leadership of Pierre Monteux. In Program of Much Interest.

By CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

For the second concert of the Philadelphia season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought as soloist the American contralto, Louise Homer, who has in her time reached, perhaps, the pinnacle of success in the field of opera and concert. In addition to the drawing power of the soloist, the Boston Orchestra presented a program that of itself carried a deal of interest. Also we had the second opportunity of judging Pierre Monteux as a conductor of symphonic works, and while it is even yet too soon to pass the final word upon the accomplishments of Mr. Monteux, we are of the opinion that as we get to know him better we may like his work the more, which is so much better than if he made at first meeting a strong impression that dimmed with closer acquaintance.

The program last night opened with the somewhat familiar Symphony in B-flat, by Ernest Chausson. This work is one of the better examples of French symphonic writing, carrying with it, throughout the three movements, a message of somewhat greater depth than usually attaches to the works of the French writers. Mr. Monteux gave the Symphony a most gratifying reading—he seems to be much at home in the works of his compatriots. The contrasts of moods were well delineated, the dynamics were appropriately timed and the varied tempos taken at a speed that gave the feeling of naturalness.

After the Symphony Louise Homer sang a group of three classic songs, Bethoven, Handel, Bach. Even with the increasing years, despite the silvering hair and the cares of a real family, Louise Homer maintains her place as one of the foremost singers of her time. Her voice has lost little or none of its quality, her breath control is none the less perfect and her interpretations of the various arias and songs as interesting as ever. The audience, which filled the Academy, gave the soloist a rousing reception, both before and after her singing of the songs, both of which receptions she deserved; the first for what she has done in the past, and the later applause for her fine work last night.

The program's third number was the seldom heard and little known Symphonic Poem of Mili Balakireff with the title of "Thamar." In this Symphonic work Balakiriff does not appear at his best either in melodic and harmonic creation or in instrumentation. Perhaps the greatest interest that one can find in the "Thamar" Symphonic Poem is the fact that it is palpably the "dady" to the Rimski "Scheherezade." Perhaps we should frown on Rimski for his evident and probably voluntary absorption of ideas and effects from the Balakirew Poem, but we cannot deny that Rimski certainly made a better job of the thing.

However, let us be thankful to Balakirew for germinating the ideas contained in the "Thamar" composition, if it seems fragmentary we can enjoy many temporary bits of orchestration; if at times we find the orchestration somewhat out of balance, we can hunt around and no doubt find a morsel or two of good tune. So it goes throughout the work; Balakirew didn't seem to strike the combination simultaneously, there is good melody with mediocer instrumentation and vice versa, but seldom both good melody and fine orchestration.

The playing of the work was done well by the Boston Orchestra—we assume that Mr. Monteux has many times conducted the work in his previous sphere of musical activity.

Number four on the program brought forward Louise Homer once more, this time to sing the aria "O Don Fatale," from Giuseppi Verdi's "Don Carlos." In this aria Mrs. Homer gave evidence of the unusual range of her voice; she is nominally an alto, but when she was soaring around G's and A's in the soprano her voice was as well placed and pleasant to listen to as when her highest note was a high B flat, which was remarkably well taken, considering the fact that this is an extremely high note for an alto to sing.

The dramatic "Don Fatale" aroused the enthusiasm of the audience anew; many times was the singer compelled to acknowledge the plaudits of her hearers.

The concert closed with the Bourree Fantastique of Emanuel Charbrier, another well-known example of French composition. This was done in the traditional fashion, except at one point, where the oboe and snare drums appeared to have a difference of opinion concerning the tempo; the oboe, following the conductor, started an accelerando, but Mr. Drummer refused to be one of the party. Well, after all, these little things help to break the monotony of affairs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Chausson..Symphony in B-flat major, Op. 20
I. Lent.
II. Tres Lent.
III. Anime.
Songs with Orchestra—
Beethoven,
Nature's Adoration, Op. 48, No. 4
Handel,
Air, "Ombra mai fu," from the Opera "Xerxes," Act. 1, Scene 1
Bach,
Air, "My Heart Ever Faithful." from the Cantata "For God so Loved the World."
Balakireff,
"Thamar," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra (after the Poem by Michail Lermontoff).
Verdi,
Aria, "O Don Fatale," from the Opera "Don Carlos," Act 4, Scene 6.
Chabrier.....Bourree Fantasque
Soloist, Louise Homer.

Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
- 1919

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINE CONCERT

Some Interesting Novelties on the Second Program—Mme. Louise Homer the Soloist

Three modern orchestral works, two of them never before played in Philadelphia, and Madam Louise Homer as soloist were the attractions of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, and they were potent enough completely to fill the Academy of Music, even to the extent of all the chairs that the orchestra pit would hold.

The symphony, Chausson's in B flat, opened the program. Its American history is bound closely to Philadelphia, for its first American performance was in this city by the Boston Orchestra, under Vincent d'Indy as guest conductor, almost exactly fourteen years ago. Last season it was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of another guest conductor, M. Alphonse Catherine, and last evening under the leadership of Mr. Monteux. It is a serious work, conceived and carried out along modern, though sane, lines and finely orchestrated. Owing, perhaps, to the many changes of time and tempi in the various movements, the composition savors of the rhapsodic more than of the strictly symphonic, but it is a fine work and will bear frequent hearings.

The Balakireff number was a symphonic poem, "Thamar," written after the poem of Michail Lermontoff, and is another of those fantastic legends to which the later Russian composers are so fond of giving tonal settings. This one of Balakireff has some fine places and some undeniable weaknesses. It is rhythmically, at least, a first cousin to Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," which our own orchestra gave last week, but without the melodic inspiration nor marvelous orchestration of that work. It carries out the legend faithfully, but is too long to sustain interest unflaggingly throughout, especially in the lengthy return of the first motive after the climax.

The third number was a cleverly written "Bourree Fantasque" by Chabrier, wonderfully orchestrated by Felix Mottl. So fine was the orchestration that, conceived as a piano composition, there was no hint that it was not originally composed for orchestra. As a work it is interesting and original and made an excellent close to the varied program.

Madam Homer again proved the favorite she always is. Her superb voice was not in the best of condition, as she evidently had a cold, but it was rich and had all of its usual volume. She first sang three songs, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; "Ombra mai fu," which is the original form of Haendel's famous Largo, beloved of the populace, and the air "My Heart Ever Faithful," from one of the cantatas of Sebastian Bach. Of course, the Largo made the biggest hit, although all were loudly applauded. On her second appearance Madam Homer sang the well-known aria from "Don Carlos" with even greater success.

The orchestra played better than it has in this city for at least a year, despite a couple of slips in intonation in the beginning of the symphony and in the "Don Carlos" accompaniment. There is evidently a return of the discipline which was so conspicuously lacking toward the close of last season, with better tone quality, more unanimity of attack and more of an effort to give the conductor the effects and the results he wishes to obtain.

Mr. Monteux was apparently en rapport with the program, especially with the symphony, which he read sympathetically and with considerably more of the emotional elements than M. Catherine displayed in his interpretation, with our own orchestra last spring. The whole program was one which showed him at his best, and he bids fair to put the great organization back into the prestige of its former position.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.

MONTEUX'S GENIUS SHOWN IN CONCERT

Makes Boston Orchestra Performance One of Season's Events

HOMER IS SOLOIST

By Linton P. Martin

Genius, whether of interpretation or creation, is signalized by qualities that are beyond the competition of talent, however able it may be. The orchestral conductors heard here at various times are for the most part men of conspicuous talent. But there was a vivifying quality of genius in the conducting of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy by Pierre Monteux which made the concert one of the great red-letter musical events of the season. And the combination of Monteux at the conductor's stand and Louise Homer, greatest of American contraltos, as soloist, sufficed to jam the building to its uttermost.

Perhaps the program had something to do with the thrill that palpably marked the progress of the concert. For it was a program marked by the true cosmopolitanism of the conductor, combining modernity of musical idiom with sterling worth, and with just enough background of the classics to give it balance and artistic unity. The classics, however, were confined entirely to Homer's first group of songs, sung immediately after Ernest Chausson's B-flat major symphony, which opened the concert.

Mr. Monteux's conducting of the symphony was a revelation of its transcendant musical beauty. The work is scored with extraordinary richness, its musical thought is vital and noble, and it is characterized thruout by a lofty emotional eloquence that is potently moving and thrilling.

On her first appearance Homer sang three classic songs, Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," Haendel's air from "Xerxes," popularly called the "Largo," and the famous old "My Heart Ever Faithful" of Bach. The legato quality and opulent color of Homer's superb contralto were displayed magnificently in all of these, and her voice was fresher and more vibrant than last season in opera.

The orchestra followed with Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," effective but shallow music, and best suited for the ballet performances. It was played with captivating verve.

Homer made her second and final appearance in the aria, "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Her dramatic skill and presence lends itself peculiarly to music of this sort, and she poured her splendid voice into it without restraint.

The final number on the program was Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," a work so light and breezy that its presence on a symphonic program is rather startling. Small, it decides precisely a sort of ending the program should have, and it ends with capital spirit.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 2 - 19

the entertainment.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Louise Homer as Soloist at Concert In Academy of Music.

The second visit this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Louise Homer as soloist, drew such an audience to the Academy of Music last night that difficulty in seating some of those who had engaged seats in the orchestra pit threatened to disturb the order of the symphony which Conductor Monteux had placed first on the program. As it was, the first and second movements were played with latecomers standing in the aisles, and it finally became necessary to throw open one of the proscenium boxes to accommodate those whose chairs could not be located.

The concert was a delight throughout, the magnificent tone of the orchestra and its skillful manipulation by the new French conductor being a continuous pleasure. The symphony was the B flat major of Chausson, a work of great dignity and of considerable originality. While one cannot escape the fugitively reminiscent episodes suggestive of Franck, who was Chausson's preceptor, or the definite Wagnerian influence, it is yet a composition that holds the interest unflaggingly and that has many moments of real inspiration. It was wonderfully done by the orchestra, the brass choir particularly being pronounced in its beautiful organ-like tone. Monteux had a full appreciation of the dramatic, operatic style and produced some wonderful effects.

Louise Homer, always a favorite with audiences here, made a great impression by her singing first a group from Beethoven, Handel and Bach and later an aria from "Don Carlos." Homer's voice has gained in sonority and has broadened considerably in style. Outside of opera, she seldom sang as well here as she did last night. Her interpretations are always of the conventional type, but her dramatic temperament permits her to accomplish some very effective work. She created a great furore and was recalled many times. The remainder of the orchestral part of the program presented "Thamar," a symphonic poem by Balakireff, and Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque, both well played.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC

AMERICAN NOVELTIES BY THREE ORCHESTRAS

We See Familiar Home Names in the Best Musical Company Nowadays.

MAJOR HIGGINSON'S WILL

And Mr. Henderson Says a Few Choice Words on Reading Program Notes.

ORCHESTRAL music of the larger sort by Americans is certainly rapidly finding place on our symphony programs. It is astonishing how far the progress has gone. Since the war, music written by Americans is heard almost weekly in all the large cities which support orchestras of the first order, or are visited by them.

At the opening concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York last month, Mr. Stransky played "To the Fallen," a dirge for orchestra by a young man named Rogers. He is so new to us that he remains as yet unplaced, his Christian name unknown. Then, a few days later, also in the metropolis, the New York Symphony Orchestra gave for the first time a composition by a local composer, equally untouted, Charles T. Griffes. This was a thing for flute and orchestra, and received excellent critical notices.

Another few days again, and Mr. Monteux, at Boston, introduced two more novelties, one at least distinctively American. It is a symphonic poem called "The Angel of Death," and George W. Chadwick is the composer. Ernest Bloch we dare not quite call American. He is a Swiss, who writes music very definitely Hebraic and Eastern in character. But, anyway, he lives among us, and wins prizes offered by our musical institutions.

We are all still gasping these days over the magnitude of the sum of money left by H. C. Frick to foster the taste of our people in the art of painting. It was truly unfortunate, on the other hand, that the Muck row in Boston came along; unfortunate for the city and country at large, as well as for Major Higginson. An understanding had long been felt that the Major would leave on his death a handsome endowment for the orchestra which he had founded and nurtured during the later thirty-odd years of his life.

But the nastiness of the ructions over Dr. Muck and his charming status must have hurt the Boston patron deeply. His will of October, 1918, with a codicil of December, 1918, leaves only his musical library to the orchestra, and the musical instruments he had procured for the players. And not even these are left outright. A trustee is to judge in from three years whether the orchestra is to be permanently or not.

Silk Pettigats for Address ... Philad, Pa.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Second Concert For the Season At The Academy Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening when an especially varied and interesting programme, engaging the valuable services of Mme Louise Homer as assisting artist, was presented.

It began with Chaussen's symphony in B-flat major which is such a beautiful work that although it was done here last season it was a pleasure to hear it again. With its ingratiating theme, its skillfully artistic construction, and its eloquently emotional appeal, it is one of the most notable and important of modern productions in the class to which it belongs, and may properly be placed in the same category with the D-minor of Cesar Franck, with which in a spiritual and intellectual way it is closely affiliated.

Although it was written more than twenty-five years ago it is distinctively a modern composition in its form and manner, and all the resources of the contemporary orchestra are ably and effectively employed in its development. It was played with much technical efficiency and sympathetic intelligence under Mr. Pierre Monteux' appreciative and vigilant direction and to judge from the applause it incited, the performance was much admired and greatly enjoyed. Other orchestral numbers on the list were Balakireff's "Thamar," a symphonic poem for orchestra, based upon the poem by Lermontoff, which visitors to the Russian ballet may remember having heard, and the Bourree Fantasque of Alexis Manuel Chabrier, as orchestrated by Felix Mottle.

Mme Louise Homer, who whether on the operatic stage or in the concert room has long been recognized as one of the best of living contraltos, was heard with much pleasure in a series of selections which furnished a number of excellent opportunities for the effective display of her vocal abilities. Besides the great aria "O Don Fatale" from Verdie's opera of "Don Carlos" they comprised Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration," the air "Ombra mai fu" from Handel's opera of "Xerxes" and the familiar "My Heart Ever Faithful" of Bach.

These are not easy numbers but their demands upon the voice and art of their interpreter were unfalteringly and admirably met, and to many of those who listened a fresh conception of their value and significance may well have been communicated.

om DEC 4 - 1918
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

Though at the bottom of the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night, "The Tragedy of Salome," a suite composed by Florent Schmitt, an Alsatian, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, was by all odds the most interesting number, whatever may be the individual estimates of the value of the work, which has not been played here before. It is distinctly in the modern French idiom, and belongs in the same class with such tone poems as the d'Indy work produced here recently, but with the reservation that it is intended to supplement and accompany action on the stage, so that its production by orchestra alone probably fails to give a wholly adequate idea of its value. It possesses striking originality in its use of orchestral material and abounds in unique effects, the composer making use of the piccolo, a snare drum, a bass drum, triangle, cymbals, tam tam, two harps and other instruments not usually employed.

The meaning of the music is followed readily enough from the first appearance of Salome, on through her sensual dances, her demand for the head of John the Baptist, the warning and accusation so characteristically suggested by the oboes and taken up by the clarinets, to the climax and the terrible punishment following the tragedy. At first the music moves along in a rhythmic, almost melodious way, but beneath the alluring measures are heard discordant sounds which make the sensuousness and the gayety seem almost forced and unreal. The dissonances and sharp contrasts increase, with intervals of orgiac ditties, clashing of cymbals, sighs, wild laughter and other demonstrations of hilarity and abandon. But over it broods the atmosphere of tragedy, of impending doom and of frenzy. The triumphant burst suggestive of Salome taking the head and gloating over the death of the man who denounced her presently turns to a wail of accusation that strikes terror not only to Salome but to all others, and the development takes on a tumultuous character with a convulsion of nature and death the end.

The idea of the story is closely followed and developed with much continuity. Through all the changing moods and amid all the weirdness of orchestration there runs coherence, which made the interpretation of the work by the orchestra an engrossing study, even if the interest awakened was, on the whole, intellectual rather than emotional. The orchestra was at all times well handled by M. Pierre Monteux, who showed a fine artistic sense and made the rendition colorful and virile. The audience, however, did not appear to be profoundly impressed and the applause was scattering.

The other orchestral number was the famous Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, with its highly effective setting and its delightful five-fourth time treatment in the second movement. This symphony has been played here so often as to be fairly familiar to concertgoers, which, naturally enough, prompted comparisons.

There was about M. Monteux's conception of the work a suggestion of haste, of restlessness which was doubtless intended to convey the idea of reckless abandon, of attempts to lull a seered conscience by excitement, and these will be urged as giving M. Monteux's interpretation a distinct and vital touch. There are doubtless others, however, who will argue that the impressiveness at least of the heavier measures was impaired and that the tone of the orchestra appeared at times deficient in fullness and resonance, which the Boston organization has been known to develop, while at one place in the stormy portion there was a noticeable lack of smoothness. The symphony, of course, is to be numbered among those with such abounding charm and pathos that an audience will always respond, and this it did last night repeatedly, M. Monteux graciously sharing the honors with his musicians.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto who has been heard here in concert and in grand opera. She sang Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration"; the air "Ombra mai fre" from Haendel's opera "Verses," and the air "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos." Her selection of the first two numbers was especially fortunate, for their simplicity and their freedom from all music frills served admirably to bring out the purity of Mme. Homer's voice. Its readiness in the lower registers and its bell-like qualities in the upper reaches, its perfect accuracy of pitch and intonation proved a veritable treat.

The Verdi air was also sung in an admirable manner and with authority.

TRIBUNE
ress: Providence, R. I.

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16, Pierre Monteux has chosen an engrossing program. It will begin with Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, electric with emotion and tragedy. There will also be interest in the revival of the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Since this number—scored for five solo instruments—the 'celle, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, it affords a close scrutiny of the fine individual musicianship of virtuosos who lead each of these sections. The closing number will be Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Miss Sophie Braslau, the foremost contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the distinguished soloist of the evening, singing "Ah! Quel Giorno," from Rossini's "Semiramide," and three strikingly dramatic songs by Moussorgsky: "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the River Dnyep...

From DEC 4 - 1918
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY EXHIBIT VALUABLE

Concert in Lyric, With Louise Homer, Presents Large, Modern Work.

An admirable concert, which contained types of music from the simple to the highly advanced, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in the Lyric Theater last night. The audience was large. The concert was the second of the orchestra's present Baltimore season. Louise Homer was special soloist.

A remarkable specimen of ultra modern music (Florent Schmitt' suite, The Tragedy of Salome, th last number of the program) was re ceived with enthusiasm—by severa persons! The remainder "had its in nings" in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony and in Mme. Homer splendid singing with orchestra Beethoven, Handel and Verdi work The orchestra demonstrated agai its exceptionally high plane unde Mr. Monteux. The unusual readin of the symphony had numerous ad vantages. The orchestra organizatio is doing highly valuable art work i Baltimore, especially in exhibitin modern music, which has been hear so much more frequently elsewher in the world. It is appropriate tha it should continue this phase.

J. N. H.

TIMES
ss: Washington, D. C.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Louise Homer, as Soloist, Proves Queen of Song at Second Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, sent its huge audience homeward with a triumphant elation in response to the music's spell at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The program had been built up to a stirring climax in the Liszt "Les Preludes" and Mme. Louise Homer, as soloist, was a truly glorious queen of song in a program of noble and glorious music.

The program took one through the nebulous world of impressionism in music, vague and indeterminate, with Chausson and a new name Griffes. The solid ground of the songs of Beethoven, Handel and Bach, and of the immortal opera touch of Verdi, with the splendid Liszt climax, was a substantial contribution of high-motived sound.

Mme. Homer was recalled time and again after each part of her program. She is, besides artist, a radiant type of womanhood, whose very presence is a delight. The nobility of her rich contralto was at its height in Handel's air from "Xerxes," and she poured it forth without reserve.

Sings With Beauty.

Then, too, the hearing of an opera singer with full orchestra gives the background of tone that builds up the aria or song, and in Verdi's great "Don Fatale" aria from "Don Carlos" Mme. Homer sang with dramatic intensity or with tender beauty that was enriched by the great Italian master's score, and its playing, and that was given with her wealth of pure voice in her very personal quality of charm.

M. Monteux is a vital director who paints his tone pictures in many colors, and yet he effaces himself to an unusual degree. As accompanist with the voice he anticipates every shade of meaning. The Symphony of Chausson, in B flat, he varied from religious seriousness to a soaring bacchanale. The music is redolent of Wagner at times, and again is vague. The second movement, marked "tres lent," was inconsequential.

As to the Wagner touches, there was the "Waldweben," even a neighing of the horse Grane in Wagner's music drama. Orchestrally rich it was, with beauty of pastorale, and splendid use of the brass in the sturdy hymn that eclipsed all revelry and brought it to a brilliantly rendered climax.

Bears Descriptive Color.

The symphonic poem by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, on a Coleridge poem of "Kubla Khan"—strangely enough written with a "piano obligato" that added little to its symphonic value—is an imaginative composition with many orchestral beauties and rich effects, but with also banal developments of less original and less sincere design. It bore descriptive color of Oriental orgies, but without, for instance, the dominant dramatic motives in theme of the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakow.

Just that "song" of ineffable beauty that pervades the tense mood of the Liszt "Les Preludes" is the missing point. In the Liszt symphonic poem (after Lamartine) it reaches a deep and appealing and satisfying loveliness, while the full timbered orchestration of man's transfiguration into spirit and into victory after life sounded and re-sounded from the players with the triumph it defined.

J. MacB.

From Journal DEC 14 1918
Providence, R. I.

After the musical famine of recent weeks a rather substantial schedule of concerts is especially acceptable. The concert this afternoon at the Shubert Majestic, when Jascha Heifetz, the Russian violinist, makes his second appearance before a Providence audience, will be followed on Tuesday evening by the second of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra programmes in Infantry Hall. The remainder of the week will be given over to club musicales.

On Tuesday evening of next week Magdeleine Brard, the French pianist, who is here under the patronage of the French American Association of Arts, will give a recital at Memorial Hall.

To-day's appearance of Jascha Heifetz is an event of especial interest because of this young artist's truly spectacular career. His genius has won unusually consistent praise from the critics here and abroad, an interesting point of the criticisms being the emphasis laid on the fact that his talent is considered unusual, not because of his age, but at any age. His former success in New York was repeated last week, when he appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, which he played then, is on to-day's programme, and another number of especial interest will be the "Hungarian Dance" by Brahms.

* * *

From Journal DEC 7 - 1918
Providence, R. I.

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a new tone-poem by Mr. Griffes, was played for the first time at a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was repeated in New York last Thursday. It is based on Coleridge's "The Pleasure Dome" and it was received by Boston with more than usual enthusiasm. Mr. Griffes is said by the critics to have been particularly fortunate in his tone-coloring, the subtlety of the play of his imagination and the rythmic continuity which binds the lesser themes together. It is a brief number, but has a striking originality that is not too mod ern but distinctly not of the older schools.

* * *

It is evident in reports from German of Karl Muck's reception there that Hu hatred of America is being vented by th simple process of regarding the deporte musician as a redeemed martyr. Blandly ignoring the distinction between Muck as a musician and as a political agent se cretly plotting in an enemy country, the critic of the Tagliche Rundschau is moved to remark that "in return for the intel lectual instruction which for years this artist contributed to the inartistic sacks of American gold, he received bitter repayment." The writer adds that his first appearance met with a "tempestu greeting," and expresses the pious ho "May he now remain with us."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From P DEC 8 - 191
Evening Star
Washington

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of this season's matinee concerts yesterday afternoon at the National Theater before the usual capacity audience, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presenting a program of incomparable beauty from French, German, Italian and American composers. Mme. Louise Homer, lovely of voice and charming in personality, sang twice, giving, with orchestra, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," by Verdi; "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the cantata, "For God So Lover the World," by Bach, and receiving an ovation after the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera, "Xerxes," by Handel, the theme of which, familiar to music lovers as Handel's "Largo," being greatly enhanced in beauty by the wonderful legato and stately delivery of the artist, supplemented by an accompaniment of strings in four-part harmony.

The symphony, "B Flat Major, Op. 20," by Ernest Chausson, whose tragic death occurred in 1899, was most satisfying, being rather more distinctive in form than most of the compositions from the modern French school, and presented by the orchestra with superb mastery of every tonal effect, under the inspiring leadership of M. Monteux. Of even greater interest in a way was the second orchestral number, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by teh cotemporary American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes of New York, which was inspired by the poem, "Kubla Khan," by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and which proved delightful, especially in the finished pianissimo effects of the opening and closing phrases. The orchestra concluded the program with "Les Preludes," a symphonic poem by Franz Liszt, built, according to the admirable program notes by Philip Hale, on a passage from Lamartine's writings.

Pawr Evening Bulletin Dec 18 - 12

THIRD SECTION.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME

Sophie Braslau, American Contralto, is Soloist at Infantry Hall Concert.—Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony Given Powerful Reading.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played the second concert of its series here last evening. Infantry Hall was filled and the big audience showed unmistakably its pleasure in the splendid programme.

Sophie Braslau, the young Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist. It was her first appearance here and her success was immediate and complete.

The programme follows:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the Opera "Semiramide."
Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Moussorgsky.....Songs with orchestra
Serenade of Death.
The Banks of the Don.
On the River Dnyeper.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

In Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," Mr. Monteux chose a work that has been given powerful readings here by his predecessors at the conductor's desk. One of the greatest symphonies ever written, it stands as a towering monument to the genius of the great Russian master, the tragedy of whose life may be read in its seething polyphony. Through its tide of sombre harmony stalks the inexorable fate leading to the depths of despair. One may not listen to its melancholy themes, its ever-changing chorus of dark-hued orchestral voices and tremendous climaxes without being profoundly impressed. And Mr. Monteux gave the symphony one of the best readings ever heard at these concerts, rising to great heights of dramatic expression.

The second movement, with its unusual rythm, always compels attention, but it was in the following "Allegro molto vivace" that conductor and players achieved most stirring results. And in the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," which might be described as the giving way to dispair after a brave but futile struggle with fate, there was a sonority and richness in the string section and a depressing note in the voices of wood and brass that produced an effect not easily forgotten.

The Bethoven "Ballet, No. 5," from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, is founded on the fable of Prometheus In its descriptive measures opportunity is given to the first 'cello to play a grateful obligato part, and to a lesser extent similar work is done by solo flute, clarinet, basson and harp. Mr. J. Bedetti, 'cellist, made much of his solo. Other soloists were Messrs. Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy. Wagner's "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," received a beautiful interpretation.

Great interest is sure to attend the debut of a prominent young American singer with the Boston Symphony in this city and it may be said that Miss Braslau lived up to the fine things said of her successes elsewhere. Her voice is quite unusual in timbre. It is very resonant and clear, and has a strength that makes it well adapted to dramatic use. Miss Breslau sings with ease, her voice being of such natural power and carrying quality that it dominates the orchestra in anything but fortissimo passages. Her Rossini Air was sung with authority and feeling and she was even more impressive in the Moussorgsky songs with orchestra.

The "Serenade of Death" and "On the River Dnyeper" brought her dramatic talent to the fore and by skilful use of tone color, diction and nuance she created a musical atmosphere delightfully in keeping with the text of each poem. She was enthusiastically applauded and returned several times in acknowledgment.

concert.

Boston Symphony.

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, will be Sophie Braslau, the noted American contralto and first pride of the Metropolitan Opera House, who could scarcely have chosen songs to reveal more strikingly her dramatic and lustrous vocal abilities than Rossini's famous aria, "Ah Quel Giorno," from the opera "Semiramide," and Moussorgsky's three tragic songs, "The Serenade of Death," the "Banks of the Don," and "On the River Dnyeper."

Pierre Monteux, in accordance with his reputation as a programme maker, has arranged the following music of interest, variety and distinction for this concert: Tchaikowsky's masterpiece of direct appeal and reaching popularity, the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6; the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," scored for five solo instruments ('Cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp); and, to close, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," whereby Wagner is restored to these concerts.

Providence Journal Dec.

BIG AUDIENCE HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Monteux Conducts Orchestra in Second Concert Here.

SOPHIE BRASLAU IS SOLOIST

American Contralto from Metropolitan Opera Company Achieves Complete Success. — Tschaikowsky's Symphony Given Powerful Reading.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played the second concert of its series here last evening. Infantry Hall was filled and the big audience showed unmistakably its pleasure in the splendid programme.

Sophie Braslau, the young Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist. It was her first appearance here and her success was immediate and complete.

The programme follows:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the Opera "Semiramide."
Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Moussorgsky.....Songs with orchestra
Serenade of Death.
The Banks of the Don.
On the River Dnyeper.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

In Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," Mr. Monteux chose a work that has been given powerful readings here by his predecessors at the conductor's desk. One of the greatest symphonies ever written, it stands as a towering monument to the genius of the great Russian master, the tragedy of whose life may be read in its seething polyphony. Through its tide of sombre harmony stalks the inexorable fate leading to the depths of despair. One may not listen to its melancholy themes, its ever-changing chorus of dark-hued orchestral voices and tremendous climaxes without being profoundly impressed. And Mr. Monteux gave the symphony one of the best readings ever heard at these concerts, rising to great heights of dramatic expression.

The second movement, with its unusual rythm, always compels attention, but it was in the following "Allegro molto vivace" that conductor and players achieved most stirring results. And in the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," which might be described as the giving way to dispair after a brave but futile struggle with fate, there was a sonority and richness in the string section and a depressing note in the voices of wood and brass that produced an effect not easily forgotten.

The Bethoven "Ballet, No. 5," from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, is founded on the fable of Prometheus. In its descriptive measures opportunity is given to the first 'cello to play a grateful obligato part, and to a lesser extent similar work is done by solo flute, clarinet, basson and harp. Mr. J. Bedetti, 'cellist, made much of his solo. Other soloists were Messrs. Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy. Wagner's "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," received a beautiful interpretation.

Great interest is sure to attend the debut of a prominent young American singer with the Boston Symphony in this city and it may be said that Miss Braslau lived up to the fine things said of her successes elsewhere. Her voice is quite unusual in timbre. It is very resonant and clear, and has a strength that makes it well adapted to dramatic use. Miss Breslau sings with ease, her voice being of such natural power and carrying quality that it dominates the orchestra in anything but fortissimo passages. Her Rossini Air was sung with authority and feeling and she was even more impressive in the Moussorgsky songs with orchestra.

The "Serenade of Death" and "On the River Dnyeper" brought her dramatic talent to the fore and by skilful use of tone color, diction and nuance she created a musical atmosphere delightfully in keeping with the text of each poem. She was enthusiastically applauded and returned several times in acknowledgment.

TWO SHOE RETAILERS ARE

Providence Journal Dec 12

om DEC 4 - 1912
Evening Sun
altimore, Md.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

Though at the bottom of the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last night, "The Tragedy of Salome," a suite composed by Florent Schmitt, an Alsatian, after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, was by all odds the most interesting number, whatever may be the individual estimates of the value of the work, which has not been played here before. It is distinctly in the modern French idiom, and belongs in the same class with such tone poems as the d'Indy work produced here recently, but with the reservation that it is intended to supplement and accompany action on the stage, so that its production by orchestra alone probably fails to give a wholly adequate idea of its value. It possesses striking originality in its use of orchestral material and abounds in unique effects, the composer making use of the piccolo, a snare drum, a bass drum, triangle, cymbals, tam tam, two harps and other instruments not usually employed.

The meaning of the music is followed readily enough from the first appearance of Salome, on through her sensual dances, her demand for the head of John the Baptist, the warning and accusation so characteristically suggested by the oboes and taken up by the clarinets, to the climax and the terrible punishment following the tragedy. At first the music moves along in a rhythmic, almost melodious way, but beneath the alluring measures are heard discordant sounds which make the sensuousness and the gayety seem almost forced and unreal. The dissonances and sharp contrasts increase, with intervals of orgiac ditties, clashing of cymbals, sighs, wild laughter and other demonstrations of hilarity and abandon. But over it broods the atmosphere of tragedy, of impending doom and of frenzy. The triumphant burst suggestive of Salome taking the head and gloating over the death of the man who denounced her presently turns to a wail of accusation that strikes terror not only to Salome but to all others, and the development takes on a tumultuous character with a convulsion of nature and death the end.

The idea of the story is closely followed and developed with much continuity. Through all the changing moods and amid all the weirdness of orchestration there runs coherence, which made the interpretation of the work by the orchestra an engrossing study, even if the interest awakened was, on the whole, intellectual rather than emotional. The orchestra was at all times well handled by M. Pierre Monteux, who showed a fine artistic sense and made the rendition colorful and virile. The audience, however, did not appear to be profoundly impressed and the applause was scattering.

The other orchestral number was the famous Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 6, the Pathetique, with its highly effective setting and its delightful five-fourth time treatment in the second movement. This symphony has been played here so often as to be fairly familiar to concertgoers, which, naturally enough, prompted comparisons.

There was about M. Monteux's conception of the work a suggestion of haste, of restlessness which was doubtless intended to convey the idea of reckless abandon, of attempts to lull a seered conscience by excitement, and these will be urged as giving M. Monteux's interpretation a distinct and vital touch. There are doubtless others, however, who will argue that the impressiveness at least of the heavier measures was impaired and that the tone of the orchestra appeared at times deficient in fullness and resonance, which the Boston organization has been known to develop, while at one place in the stormy portion there was a noticeable lack of smoothness. The symphony, of course, is to be numbered among those with such abounding charm and pathos that an audience will always respond, and this it did last night repeatedly, M. Monteux graciously sharing the honors with his musicians.

The soloist of the evening was Mme. Louise Homer, the famous contralto who has been heard here in concert and in grand opera. She sang Beethoven's "Nature's Adoration"; the air "Ombra mai fre" from Haendel's opera "Verses," and the air "O Don Fatale" from Verdi's opera "Don Carlos." Her selection of the first two numbers was especially fortunate, for their simplicity and their freedom from all music frills served admirably to bring out the purity of Mme. Homer's voice. Its reediness in the lower registers and its bell-like qualities in the upper reaches, its perfect accuracy of pitch and intonation proved a veritable treat.

The Verdi air was also sung in an admirable manner and with authority.

h TRIBUNE

ress: Providence, R. I.

COMING BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

For the second Boston Symphony concert of the season in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 16, Pierre Monteux has chosen an engrossing program. It will begin with Tschaikowsky's masterpiece, the perennially popular "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6, electric with emotion and tragedy. There will also be interest in the revival of the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus." Since this number is scored for five solo instruments—the cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp, it affords a close scrutiny of the fine individual musicianship of virtuosos who lead each of these sections. The closing number will be Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Miss Sophie Braslau, the foremost contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the distinguished soloist of the evening, singing "Ah! Quel Giorno," from Rossini's "Semiramide," and three strikingly dramatic songs by Moussorgsky: "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don" and "On the River Dnyeper."

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 4 - 1912

BOSTON SYMPHONY EXHIBIT VALUABLE

Concert in Lyric, With Louise Homer, Presents Large, Modern Work.

An admirable concert, which contained types of music from the simple to the highly advanced, was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, in the Lyric Theater last night. The audience was large. The concert was the second of the orchestra's present Baltimore season. Louise Homer was special soloist.

A remarkable specimen of ultra-modern music (Florent Schmitt's suite, The Tragedy of Salome, the last number of the program) was received with enthusiasm—by several persons! The remainder "had its innings" in Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony and in Mme. Homer's splendid singing with orchestra of Beethoven, Handel and Verdi works. The orchestra demonstrated again its exceptionally high plane under Mr. Monteux. The unusual reading of the symphony had numerous advantages. The orchestra organization is doing highly valuable art work in Baltimore, especially in exhibiting modern music, which has been heard so much more frequently elsewhere in the world. It is appropriate that it should continue this phase.

J. N. H.

TIMES

ss: Washington, D. C.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Louise Homer, as Soloist, Proves Queen of Song at Second Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, sent its huge audience homeward with a triumphant elation in response to the music's spell at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The program had been built up to a stirring climax in the Liszt "Les Preludes" and Mme. Louise Homer, as soloist, was a truly glorious queen of song in a program of noble and glorious music.

The program took one through the nebulous world of impressionism in music, vague and indeterminate, with Chausson and a new name Griffes. The solid ground of the songs of Beethoven, Handel and Bach, and of the immortal opera touch of Verdi, with the splendid Liszt climax, was a substantial contribution of high-motived sound.

Mme. Homer was recalled time and again after each part of her program. She is, besides artist, a radiant type of womanhood, whose very presence is a delight. The nobility of her rich contralto was at its height in Handel's air from "Xerxes," and she poured it forth without reserve.

Sings With Beauty.

Then, too, the hearing of an opera singer with full orchestra gives the background of tone that builds up the aria or song, and in Verdi's great "Don Fatale" aria from "Don Carlos" Mme. Homer sang with dramatic intensity or with tender beauty that was enriched by the great Italian master's score, and its playing, and that was given with her wealth of pure voice in her very personal quality of charm.

M. Monteux is a vital director who paints his tone pictures in many colors, and yet he effaces himself to an unusual degree. As accompanist with the voice he anticipates every shade of meaning. The Symphony of Chausson, in B flat, he varied from religious seriousness to a soaring bacchanale. The music is redolent of Wagner at times, and again is vague. The second movement, marked "tres lent," was inconsequential.

As to the Wagner touches, there was the "Waldweben," even a neighing of the horse Grane in Wagner's music drama. Orchestrally rich it was, with beauty of pastorale, and splendid use of the brass in the sturdy hymn that eclipsed all revelry and brought it to a brilliantly rendered climax.

Bears Descriptive Color.

The symphonic poem by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, on a Coleridge poem of "Kubla Khan"—strangely enough written with a "piano obligato" that added little to its symphonic value—is an imaginative composition with many orchestral beauties and rich effects, but with also banal developments of less original and less sincere design. It bore descriptive color of Oriental orgies, but without, for instance, the dominant dramatic motives in theme of the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakow.

Just that "song" of ineffable beauty that pervades the tense mood of the Liszt "Les Preludes" is the missing point. In the Liszt symphonic poem (after Lamartine) it reaches a deep and appealing and satisfying loveliness, while the full timbered orchestration of man's transfiguration into spirit and into victory after life sounded and re-sounded from the players with the triumph it defined.

J. MacB.

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

After the musical famine of recent weeks a rather substantial schedule of concerts is especially acceptable. The concert this afternoon at the Shubert Majestic, when Jascha Heifetz, the Russian violinist, makes his second appearance before a Providence audience, will be followed on Tuesday evening by the second of the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra programmes in Infantry Hall. The remainder of the week will be given over to club musicales.

On Tuesday evening of next week Magdeleine Brard, the French pianist, who is here under the patronage of the French American Association of Arts, will give a recital at Memorial Hall.

To-day's appearance of Jascha Heifetz is an event of especial interest because of this young artist's truly spectacular career. His genius has won unusually consistent praise from the critics here and abroad, an interesting point of the criticisms being the emphasis laid on the fact that his talent is considered unusual, not because of his age, but at any age. His former success in New York was repeated last week, when he appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic. Mendelssohn's Concerto in E-minor, which he played then, is on to-day's programme, and another number of especial interest will be the "Hungarian Dance" by Brahms.

* * *

From Journal
Providence, R. I.

"The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," a new tone-poem by Mr. Griffes, was played for the first time at a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was repeated in New York last Thursday. It is based on Coleridge's "The Pleasure Dome" and it was received by Boston with more than usual enthusiasm. Mr. Griffes is said by the critics to have been particularly fortunate in his tone-coloring, the subtlety of the play of his imagination and the rythmic continuity which binds the lesser themes together. It is a brief number, but has a striking originality that is not too modern but distinctly not of the older schools.

* * *

It is evident in reports from Germany of Karl Muck's reception there that Hun hatred of America is being vented by the simple process of regarding the deported musician as a redeemed martyr. Blandly ignoring the distinction between Muck as a musician and as a political agent secretly plotting in an enemy country, the critic of the Tagliche Rundschau is moved to remark that "in return for the intellectual instruction which for years this artist contributed to the inartistic sacks of American gold, he received bitter repayment." The writer adds that his first appearance met with a "tempestuous greeting," and expresses the pious hope "May he now remain with us."

ISHED 1881

From P Dec
Evening Star
Washington D. C.

AMUSEMENTS

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of this season's matinee concerts yesterday afternoon at the National Theater before the usual capacity audience, Pierre Monteux, conductor, presenting a program of incomparable beauty from French, German, Italian and American composers. Mme. Louise Homer, lovely of voice and charming in personality, sang twice, giving, with orchestra, "Nature's Adoration," by Beethoven; the aria, "O Don Fatale," from "Don Carlos," by Verdi; "My Heart Ever Faithful," from the cantata, "For God So Lover the World," by Bach, and receiving an ovation after the air, "Ombra mai fu," from the opera, "Xerxes," by Handel, the theme of which, familiar to music lovers as Handel's "Largo," being greatly enhanced in beauty by the wonderful legato and stately delivery of the artist, supplemented by an accompaniment of strings in four-part harmony.

The symphony, "B Flat Major, Op. 20," by Ernest Chausson, whose tragic death occurred in 1899, was most satisfying, being rather more distinctive in form than most of the compositions from the modern French school, and presented by the orchestra with superb mastery of every tonal effect, under the inspiring leadership of M. Monteux. Of even greater interest in a way was the second orchestral number, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," by teh cotemporary American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes of New York, which was inspired by the poem, "Kubla Khan," by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, and which proved delightful, especially in the finished pianissimo effects of the opening and closing phrases. The orchestra conoluded the program with "Les Preludes," a symphonic poem by Franz Liszt, built, according to the admirable program notes by Philip Hale, on a passage from Lamartine's writings.

Prov Evening Bulletin
Dec 18 - 12

THIRD SECTION.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAMME

Sophie Braslau, American Contralto, is Soloist at Infantry Hall Concert.—Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony Given Powerful Reading.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played the second concert of its series here last evening. Infantry Hall was filled and the big audience showed unmistakably its pleasure in the splendid programme.

Sophie Braslau, the young Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist. It was her first appearance here and her success was immediate and complete.

The programme follows:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the Opera "Semiramide."
Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Promethus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Moussorgsky.....Songs with orchestra
Serenade of Death.
The Banks of the Don.
On the River Dnyeper.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

In Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," Mr. Monteux chose a work that has been given powerful readings here by his predecessors at the conductor's desk. One of the greatest symphonies ever written, it stands as a towering monument to the genius of the great Russian master, the tragedy of whose life may be read in its seething polyphony. Through its tide of sombre harmony stalks the inexorable fate leading to the depths of despair. One may not listen to its melancholy themes, its ever-changing chorus of dark-hued orchestral voices and tremendous climaxes without being profoundly impressed. And Mr. Monteux gave the symphony one of the best readings ever heard at these concerts, rising to great heights of dramatic expression.

The second movement, with its unusual rythm, always compels attention, but it was in the following "Allegro molto vivace" that conductor and players achieved most stirring results. And in the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," which might be described as the giving way to dispair after a brave but futile struggle with fate, there was a sonority and richness in the string section and a depressing note in the voices of wood and brass that produced an effect not easily forgotten.

The Bethoven "Ballet, No. 5," from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, is founded on the fable of Prometheus. In its descriptive measures opportunity is given to the first 'cello to play a grateful obligato part, and to a lesser extent similar work is done by solo flute, clarinet, basson and harp. Mr. J. Bodetti, 'cellist, made much of his solo. Other soloists were Messrs. Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy. Wagner's "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," received a beautiful interpretation.

Great interest is sure to attend the debut of a prominent young American singer with the Boston Symphony in this city and it may be said that Miss Braslau lived up to the fine things said of her successes elsewhere. Her voice is quite unusual in timbre. It is very resonant and clear, and has a strength that makes it well adapted to dramatic use. Miss Breslau sings with ease, her voice being of such natural power and carrying quality that it dominates the orchestra in anything but fortissimo passages. Her Rossini Air was sung with authority and feeling and she was even more impressive in the Moussorgsky songs with orchestra.

The "Serenade of Death" and "On the River Dnyeper" brought her dramatic talent to the fore and by skilful use of tone color, diction and nuance she created a musical atmosphere delightfully in keeping with the text of each poem. She was enthusiastically applauded and returned several times in acknowledgment.

Boston Symphony.

The soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Dec. 16th, will be Sophie Braslau, the noted American contralto and first pride of the Metropolitan Opera House, who could scarcely have chosen songs to reveal more strikingly her dramatic and lustrous vocal abilities than Rossini's famous aria, "Ah Quel Giorno," from the opera "Semiramide," and Moussorgsky's three tragic songs, "The Serenade of Death," the "Banks of the Don," and "On the River Dnyeper."

Pierre Monteux, in accordance with his reputation as a programme maker, has arranged the following music of interest, variety and distinction for this concert: Tchaikowsky's masterpiece of direct appeal and reaching popularity, the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6; the Adagio from Beethoven's only ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," scored for five solo instruments ('Cello, flute, clarinet, bassoon and harp); and, to close, Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," whereby Wagner is restored to these concerts.

Prov Journal Dec 1

BIG AUDIENCE HEARS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Monteux Conducts Orchestra in Second Concert Here.

SOPHIE BRASLAU IS SOLOIST

American Contralto from Metropolitan Opera Company Achieves Complete Success.—Tschaikowsky's Symphony Given Powerful Reading.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played the second concert of its series here last evening. Infantry Hall was filled and the big audience showed unmistakably its pleasure in the splendid programme.

Sophie Braslau, the young Metropolitan Opera contralto, was the soloist. It was her first appearance here and her success was immediate and complete.

The programme follows:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the Opera "Semiramide."
Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Promethus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Moussorgsky.....Songs with orchestra
Serenade of Death.
The Banks of the Don.
On the River Dnyeper.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

In Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 6, the "Pathetic," Mr. Monteux chose a work that has been given powerful readings here by his predecessors at the conductor's desk. One of the greatest symphonies ever written, it stands as a towering monument to the genius of the great Russian master, the tragedy of whose life may be read in its seething polyphony. Through its tide of sombre harmony stalks the inexorable fate leading to the depths of despair. One may not listen to its melancholy themes, its ever-changing chorus of dark-hued orchestral voices and tremendous climaxes without being profoundly impressed. And Mr. Monteux gave the symphony one of the best readings ever heard at these concerts, rising to great heights of dramatic expression.

The second movement, with its unusual rythm, always compels attention, but it was in the following "Allegro molto vivace" that conductor and players achieved most stirring results. And in the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," which might be described as the giving way to dispair after a brave but futile struggle with fate, there was a sonority and richness in the string section and a depressing note in the voices of wood and brass that produced an effect not easily forgotten.

The Bethoven "Ballet, No. 5," from the "Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, is founded on the fable of Prometheus. In its descriptive measures opportunity is given to the first 'cello to play a grateful obligato part, and to a lesser extent similar work is done by solo flute, clarinet, basson and harp. Mr. J. Bodetti, 'cellist, made much of his solo. Other soloists were Messrs. Laurent, Sand, Laus and Holy. Wagner's "Prelude" and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," received a beautiful interpretation.

Great interest is sure to attend the debut of a prominent young American singer with the Boston Symphony in this city and it may be said that Miss Braslau lived up to the fine things said of her successes elsewhere. Her voice is quite unusual in timbre. It is very resonant and clear, and has a strength that makes it well adapted to dramatic use. Miss Breslau sings with ease, her voice being of such natural power and carrying quality that it dominates the orchestra in anything but fortissimo passages. Her Rossini Air was sung with authority and feeling and she was even more impressive in the Moussorgsky songs with orchestra.

The "Serenade of Death" and "On the River Dnyeper" brought her dramatic talent to the fore and by skilful use of tone color, diction and nuance she created a musical atmosphere delightfully in keeping with the text of each poem. She was enthusiastically applauded and returned several times in acknowledgment.

TWO SHOE RETAILERS ARE

Pawtucket Times Dec 13

SUNDAY HERALD, BOS

GALLERE

APPEARING

LEO ORNSTEIN, PIANIST, SYMPHONY

Dec 13

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra in Music of Mimodrama, with Mr. Ornstein for Assisting Pianist—Mr. Rakhmaninov in a Singular Programme—Beginnings by the Boston Musical Association — Magdeleine Brard at Milton—Minor Recitals

AFTER the longest absence of recent years the Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts here and hereabouts on Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre on Thursday, it will be heard in Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, which Mr. Monteux seems to fancy much; in the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's music-drama, "Tristan and Isolde" and, with the composer as "assisting artist" in a concerto for piano written by Mr. George F. Boyle of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. A sturdy and conservative piece, it has been played in various cities and liked.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux will begin and end the concert with music of mimodrama. True, one such piece, Balakirev's "Thamar," was originally a symphonic poem and as such is listed on the pending programme. None the less many a hearer will recall it most readily as the ballet danced in Boston by Mr. Diaghilev's Russians in a wonderous red tower designed by Bakst. The music recounts the legend of the Caucasian queen, who tempted comely wayfarers into her castle, feasted them, revelled with them and, next morning, slew them. Many hereabouts have wished to hear Balakirev's piece under a French conductor. Now comes opportunity from the ablest of them when a ballet is in question. The other purely orchestral number is the Suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, likewise danced by the Russian Ballet (though never in this country). "The Tragedy of Salome," epitomizing once more in tones the tale of Herodias's daughter who loved the Baptist—a harsh and acrid, but a vivid and sinewy music, already heard here under Dr. Muck but now nearly forgotten. Between the two undanced mimodramas, Mr. Ornstein, called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, will revive MacDowell's long unheard Concerto for piano in D minor. And Mr. Ornstein—it is to be remembered—is expert and eloquent pianist as well as singular composer.

ORNSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

As soloist at the coming Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Leo Ornstein, the much-talked of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra. At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works: Balaukierff's Symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible latecomers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

Leo Ornstein, soloist, with Boston Symphony.

Globe Dec 7

No Symphony Concerts

There will be no Symphony concerts again this week. On Dec 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from its two weeks on tour, the soloists will be Leo Ornstein, who will play the MacDowell concerto in D minor. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Adv Dec 14

Florence Newell Barbour

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

As soloist at the Symphony conecrts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-discussed pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's second concerto, Balakierff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent

Amusements.

Post Dec 17

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME

The most popular of all symphonies and the masterpiece of Russian music, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," has not been included in the regular Boston Symphony concerts for some years, and being tacitly reserved for the Pension Fund concerts, may not be heard otherwise for as many more, after it is played in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock.

Another event of the concert will be the sole appearance hereabouts of George F. Boyle, the noted Baltimorean composer-pianist, playing in his own concerto, with which he has enjoyed a considerable success with other orchestras. The programme will close with the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Monteux conductor, will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, thi evening. George F. Boyle of Baltimor will play his piano concerto.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows Balakirev's "Thamar"; MacDowell's Piano Concerto No. 2 in D minor, pianist

Dec 16

Address: TRIBUNE

Date Providen

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

Perhaps no musical work has ever been conceived of such vivid and throbbing emotional power as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play here. A noted writer on musical subjects has scribed it thus: "In Russia it has en the custom to bomb those unhappy otentates whom the people do not love. ster Ilyitch Tschaikowsky employed ghtler methods. He concealed his ammition in his music, thrown over the nce from the land of the Czar into the oncert halls and opera houses of Eupe and America. Its melancholy eauty, its gorgeous colors, its volcanic assion, shocked the conservative and fascinated the public. No need to explain this music, unless to condemn it. It was too human, too sincere, too utterly original for that. It winged its way heart to heart."

Globe Sun 14

Leo Ornstein, Soloist at Symphony Concerts

As soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-talked-of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto.

At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works, Balakierff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible late comers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

sung in Boston.

The Symphony Orchestra will return to Boston tomorrow morning from the longest and most exacting journey undertaken in years. The trip has continued through two weeks extending as far South as Baltimore and Washington, as far West as Cleveland and Detroit. In eleven cities audiences filling the chosen hall have listened to Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with every token of interest, pleasure and good will. This evening at Schenectady the little tour virtually ends.

H. T. PARKER

Dec 16

NEWS OF MUSIC

AGAIN THE RISING PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

New Prowess in Mr. Stokowski and New Place for Him and His Band in New York—The Metropolitan Company Not to Visit Boston—Children's Concerts by the Chicago Orchestra — Mr. Marinuzzi Takes Over Campanini's Work — Items and Incidents

STEADILY continue the rise and progress of the Philadelphia Orchestra and of Mr. Stokowski as the conductor thereof. Mr. Cyrus Curtis and Mr. Edward Bok, somewhat disposed to figure as present "sustainers" of the band, had no need to insert a page-picture of it in their Saturday Evening Post and label it the foremost orchestra in the United States or words to that effect. From quarters more disinterested and better qualified to judge, it is easy to hear like opinion. Especially since the Philadelphians ventured into New York with five concerts in the course of a season has the new quality of orchestra and leader stood clear; while no very lengthy inquiries are necessary to discover that they are gradually but surely displacing there the band from Boston in the interest and the liking of both expert and fashionable frequenters of concerts. Of all the conductors whom New York, as the capital of music in America, regularly hears, there is none except Mr. Bodanzky to compare in interest and ability with Mr. Stokowski. Mr. Bodanzky, however, divides his work between opera house and concert-hall; while in the New Symphony Orchestra he is handicapped by a personnel, hard to mold and refine.

On the other hand, at every opportunity Mr. Stokowski betters the individual quality of forces that in recent years he has trained into a unified, plastic, adept and responsive ensemble. His programmes are as interesting, as modern, as Mr. Monteux's; authority, imagination, ardor and individuality make his versions of the chosen pieces invariably interesting, often significant, and stirring. Whatever Mr. Stokowski may have been in his earlier days, however "personal" (as the French say) he may still be, he is clearly on the way to become a conductor of the first rank. With reason the Philadelphians have opened their purses to give him the security and the freedom of a large and long-standing guarantee fund. With reason—to shift from major matters to matters relatively minor—he might bring himself and his orchestra on visit to Boston, that here where he is neither unknown nor unadmired, he might give audible proof of his present prowess.

Here in Boston

Contrary to conjecture and even to recent intimation on the programme of the Opera House, the Metropolitan Company will not visit Boston next spring. Its season in New York will end on or about April 2. Next, it goes to Atlanta for a week, as in many years past. Then, it disperses for summer engagements and summer holidays. The Chicago Company, returning for a fortnight beginning March 1, will provide the only opera in the full sense of the word to be heard in Boston this winter.

When the public of the Symphony Concerts returns to Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, it will see that the chubby cherubs supporting scrolls on the metal-work of the balconies have been scrubbed until they now shine in pristine brightness.

Mr. George Frederick Boyle, who is to play his own Concerto in D minor with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening next, is an Australian midway in his thirties. As pianist he went the rounds of Europe and then migrated to the United States to become in 1911 a teacher at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. The concerto, which is eight years old, has been heard at a music-festival in Worcester and at concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York and of Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago.

Mr. Stock's Children's Concerts

As already recorded in these columns, the Chicago Orchestra has set afoot this season a series of children's concerts—one a month upon a convenient afternoon from November through April. Mr. Stock himself leads as numerous an orchestra as may be necessary to the chosen music and says a preliminary word about the several pieces. Here, for example, is his programme for the children's concert of last Thursday afternoon:

March of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Andante from the "Surprise Symphony".Haydn
Dance of the Happy Spirits from the Opera, "Orpheus".....Gluck
Dance of the Marionettes.....Glazunov
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Suite, No. 1, from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

Of an earlier concert, at which Mr. Stock and the orchestra played Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," Mr. Hubbard in The Tribune wrote pleasantly and fancifully:

He was such a little fellow. Not much over six or seven. And small for his age. His head didn't come up to the top of the back of the seat, and his toes barely touched the floor. But that did not matter, for only at first did he lean back. After the music began he sat on the front edge of the chair and so his feet reached all right. His shirt was clean and white and his blue tie had been carefully tied. But his hair was mussed and there was a beautiful grimy shade to his right hand—a shade that no amount of washing could make come off. For he was a real boy, even though his face was small and slightly pinched. A kind of sad, wondering face, just a little older than it should be. And the eyes were big, wide open ones, and they looked out as though marveling what the world really meant.

on the [illegible] with strange instruments in their hands, the people all about him—these seemed to awe him a little and make him draw into himself. At last a man came on the stage and told about music, and about instruments, and about what was to be heard. The little fellow drew back into his chair as though to shrink away from it all. But his eyes widened and he watched everything closely. A man in the orchestra played a tambourine just to show what it was like, and then when all the men played the tambourine could be heard in the music. And his eyes sparkled.

Then the man spoke again and there came a big, flowing tune that set the little fellow dreaming and his face grew quite solemn and old. Once more the man spoke and told of a dance that is danced at midnight when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death comes out with a fiddle and tunes it, and all the skeletons come and dance in the moonlight. And their bones rattle and they dance faster and faster until the cock crows, and the clock strikes one, and then they all hurry away.

And the man had the clock strike twelve and had Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle, and had the bones rattle, and had the cock crow, and had the clock strike one. And then the whole orchestra began, and the whole thing was done, the dance, the rattling bones, the cock crow and all. And the little fellow forgot everything. He shoved forward onto the frontest edge of the seat; he peeked round a big man in front of him. And he heard Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle and he saw all the dance, and he heard the cock crow and the clock strike one, and then he saw all rush away. And when it was over his eyes were big and wide and he was almost standing up. And all the children around him were clapping their hands and making a noise. But he, he just sank back into his seat and folded his arms as close round him as he could and sighed a big sigh. And hugged himself. . . . He was such a little fellow, but he had seen a wonderful dance which the skeletons dance when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death tunes up his fiddle. And he will never, never forget it.

Now that the New York Symphony Orchestra at the instigation of Mr. Damrosch, as well as the Chicago Orchestra by the zeal of Mr. Stock maintain such series of Children's Concerts, with the demand for tickets in both instances considerably exceeding the supply, why should not Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestrad do likewise? Of old it used to lead in such innovations while not a whit less, and perhaps several whits more, than the orchestra of New York and Chicago, it needs to cultivate the youngest generation into eager hearers of symphony concerts. By the recent token of Mr. Maier's recital of piano-pieces for youngsters, audiences for such a series would not be lacking.

SCHMITT'S "SALOME"

Trans Dec 16

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Mimodrama That the Music Originally Clothed and Enforced—The Russians' Perversion of It—Playwright and Composer's "Argument"—Oriental, Barbaric, Sensual

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the Suite drawn by Florent Schmitt from his music to Robert d'Humière's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome." Six years ago Dr. Muck set the piece on the programme of two Symphony Concerts, probably for the first times in the United States. He did not repeat it. Mr. Rabaud, of course, ignored it; it was hard to grasp and difficult to recall; therefore it now comes virtually as a new piece to the public of Symphony Hall. Unlike many a living Parisian composer, Schmitt has been slow to make way with American hearers. Once and again the dutiful conductor set forth one or another of his orchestral pieces, which are not few. For half an hour the audience hears Schmitt then for half a year and more it forgets him. Yet he has clear, individual profile. "He traverses French music today," writes Jean-Aubry in his book about it, "like a wild boar from the Vosges"—Schmitt was born in Lorraine—with the healthy robustness of a sensitive and crabbed nature, disdaining all coteries, dogmas and readymade religions or organized enthusiasm. . . . He submits to a strong discipline, but desires to accept it from none but himself and therefore mingles, at his convenience, his recent predilections with the lessons of the past. He is a singular mixture of passion for independence and an innate respect for rules. His choice tends wholly towards freedom, one might almost say towards anarchy; and his nature inclines him towards submission to principle. Florent Schmitt's originality lies in this rugged conflict fought with ardor. . . . His 'Tragedy of Salome,' in conception and in realization is a manifestation of high complex art and of all that it contains once of allurement and of violence, of ruggedness and refinement, of solidity and of rich color."

At the Hands of the Russians

As mimodrama, "The Tragedie of Salome" has been represented in Paris at the Théâtre des Arts in 1907, when the actor whom we now know as Lou-Tellegen mimed, as Lou van Tel, the part of the Baptist; at the Chatelet in 1912 by the singular and sophisticated Miss Thouhanova and at the Champs-Elysées in 1913 by Mr. Diaghilev's ballet with Miss Karsavina as Salome. As recently as last winter it was revived at the Opéra with the celebrated Ida Rubinstein as the interesting daughter of Herodias. She did not fare well in the part. As produced by Mr. Diaghilev's company, in the days when various bold young Russians rather than the more discreet Fokine determined its ways, Schmitt's mimodrama gained many a beholder. In Symphony Hall we shall hear his music but see neither the action embroidered upon it nor the settings that framed it. Here, then, is an account of a performance in Paris in the summer of 1913:

Soudeikine's act-drop is beyond comprehension. So also is the scene upon which it rises—a platform enclosed by giant foliage of formal design. Much exuberance is suggested, but exuberance of what is not so clear. In the middle of the stage is a tall column, upon the top of which an object, presumably the Baptist's head, is dimly seen. Behind stands a curious pyramidal staircase. Eight negro slaves are discovered grouped about the column and its burden. Their woolly pates are white, white ostrich plumes are girt about their middles, and round their ankles are clasped what looks suspiciously like white spats. The limelight streaming on their naked bodies imparts a greenish tinge to the brown flesh, and gives them quite as nasty an appearance as one supposes the designers intended.

To strident music which one feels sure must be expressive of hectic passion and horror, the green and white negroes posture and run about the stage. Their antics are engaging and expressive of whatever the spectator chooses to think. They are joined presently by four executioners, who would do credit to any professional dreamer of nightmares. Like the negroes, these also have spats on their bare legs. They wear very little else but carry large swords which obviously are meant for dark and bloody deeds. They are tall and lank, grim, sinister. In a business-like manner they divest themselves of the weapons of their office, and eclipse the efforts of the negroes in the game of Here-We-Go-Round-The-Baptist's-Head.

The music now, with relentless importunity, insists upon an impending climax. Negroes and executioners fall beautifully into place, a portion of the backcloth drops swiftly, and Salome is seen standing on the top of the staircase before a dim background of blue and mysterious starlit depth. She is shrouded in the voluminous folds of an immense cloak, and at first sight might be taken, as a witty observer remarked, for Mrs. Grundy come to put a stop to the proceedings. The music now breathes more easily, and Salome slowly comes down the staircase. The robe with which she is covered has an immense train—black with glittering embroidery of gold. As she descends the steps the train drags magnificently behind her. One suffers an uncomfortable anxiety lest it should topple down before its time and sweep the hapless wearer off her feet. But Soudeikine and Romanov have seen to this, and it is not until Salome has reached the stage, and is already advancing across it, that the enormous garment, with proper effect, comes flashingly tumbling after. Salome, with her grotesque retinue circles in solemn procession round the central column and the train makes the most of its opportunities. Then the negroes leap forward, fastenings are loosened and as the robe falls into her attendant's outstretched arms, Salome steps forward for the dance.

Regard Beardsley's drawings for fashion plates, and the reader will arrive at a very fair idea of Karsavina's appearance as Salome. Her costume is exiguous—disclosing one thigh but not the other; her legs and arms are bare, with a blood-red heart and other devices stencilled on them. A high head-dress surmounts the tiny face of one of Beardsley's women, with blue smudges for eyes and wee vermilion lips. Of Karsavina's dance it is quite impossible to write with any detail. It is devised in the same pseudo-macabre spirit as the rest of the ballet, and is more remarkable as a feat of acrobatic agility and physical endurance than as an artistic performance. One is told that the dance is "at first frantic and insane; then more paroud and sorrowful, more remote and ecstatic. It is the expression and avowal of her sensual torment and of her atonement through the very misery of her unassuageable desire." Maybe it is all that; perhaps something more, perhaps a great deal less. For myself, I should have been interested to learn at what point the insanity died down and pride and sorrow took its place. Of ecstasy I could find no real suggestion, though the counterfeit was plausible; and the only remoteness was when the dance unexpectedly ended and the curtain went down.

As Originally Intended

All this was rather a Russian overlay and decoration of the play of d'Humières and the music of Schmitt than the course of the one and the suggestion of the other. When playwright and composer sought to set before the imagination of an audience what appears in their own "argument." Even so, it is lurid enough:

A terrace of Herod's Palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. The mountains of Moab shut in the horizon, rose-colored and russet-hued, dominated by the bulk of Mount Nebo, on which Moses, at the threshold of the Promised Land, saluted Canaan before dying. The sun is sinking. John slowly walks across the terrace and disappears.

Torches light the stage. Cloths and jewels which overflow from a precious coffer sparkle under the glare. Herodias, deep in thought, plunges her hands into the mass, raises on high the necklaces and the veils spangled with gold. Salome, as one fascinated, appears, bends over the chest, adorns herself, and with a childish joy outlines her first dance. . . .

Salome has disappeared. Herod, enwrapped by the darkness, is lost in thoughts of lust and fear, while the watchful Herodias spies him. Then on the cursed sea mysterious lights flicker and seem to arise from the depths. The buildings of the engulfed Five Cities are dimly revealed beneath the waves. One would say that old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion. It is like a projection on a magic looking-glass of the drama that is playing in the brains of the couple seated there and silent in the night. The music comments on the demoniacal phantasmagoria.

Snatches of ancient orgiac ditties, choked by the rain of bitument and ashes on the terraces of Sodom and Gomorrah, are vaguely breathed. Dance measures, the shivering of stifled cymbals, the clapping of hands, sighs, and laughter that spreads and dies away. Then a voice arises from the abyss.

Herod is overcome. He hearkens. Mists now come up from the sea, enlaced figures assume a shape and mount from the depths, a living cloud from which, as brought forth by the dim dream and the ancient sin, Salome suddenly springs up, irresistible. Far off the thunder rolls. Salome begins to dance. Herod starts to his feet. . . .

Total darkness covers the stage, and the rest of the drama is seen imperfectly by flashes of lightning. There is the lascivious dance, Herod's pursuit, the amorous flight, Salome seized, her veils plucked off by the Tetrarch's hand. For a moment she is nude, but John suddenly appears, steps forward, and covers her with the anchorite's

SUNDAY HERALD, BOS

Dec 16

CAL RE

APPEARING

LEO ORNSTEIN, PIANIST, SYMPHONY

Dec 13

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra in Music of Mimodrama, with Mr. Ornstein for Assisting Pianist—Mr. Rakhmaninov in a Singular Programme—Beginnings by the Boston Musical Association — Magdeleine Brard at Milton—Minor Recitals

AFTER the longest absence of recent years the Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts here and hereabouts on Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre on Thursday, it will be heard in Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony which Mr. Monteux seems to fancy much; in the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's music-drama, "Tristan and Isolde" and, with the composer as "assisting artist" in a concerto for piano written by Mr. George F. Boyle of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. A sturdy and conservative piece, it has been played in various cities and liked.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux will begin and end the concert with music of mimodrama. True, one such piece, Balakirev's "Thamar," was originally a symphonic poem and as such is listed on the pending programme. None the less many a hearer will recall it most readily as the ballet danced in Boston by Mr. Diaghilev's Russians in a wonderous red tower designed by Bakst. The music recounts the legend of the Caucasian queen, who tempted comely wayfarers into her castle, feasted them, revelled with them and, next morning, slew them. Many hereabouts have wished to hear Balakirev's piece under a French conductor. Now comes opportunity from the ablest of them when a ballet is in question. The other purely orchestral number is the Suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, likewise danced by the Russian Ballet (though never in this country). "The Tragedy of Salome," epitomizing once more in tones the tale of Herodias's daughter who loved the Baptist—a harsh and acrid, but a vivid and sinewy music, already heard here under Dr. Muck but now nearly forgotten. Between the two undanced mimodramas, Mr. Ornstein, called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, will revive MacDowell's long unheard Concerto for piano in D minor. And Mr. Ornstein—it is to be remembered—is expert and eloquent pianist as well as singular composer.

sung in Boston.

The Symphony Orchestra will return to Boston tomorrow morning from the longest and most exacting journey undertaken in years. The trip has continued through two weeks extending as far South as Baltimore and Washington, as far West as Cleveland and Detroit. In eleven cities audiences filling the chosen hall have listened to Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, with every token of interest, pleasure and good will. This evening at Schenectady the little tour virtually ends.

H. T. PARKER

Globe Sun 14

Leo Ornstein, Soloist at Symphony Concerts

As soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-talked-of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto.

At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works, Balakierff's Symphonic (Poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible late comers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

ORNSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

As soloist at the coming Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Leo Ornstein, the much-talked of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra. At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works: Balaukierff's Symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible latecomers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

Leo Ormstein, soloist, with Boston Symphony.

Globe Dec 7

No Symphony Concerts

There will be no Symphony concerts again this week. On Dec 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from its two weeks on tour, the soloists will be Leo Ornstein, who will play the MacDowell concerto in D minor. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Adv Dec 14

Florence Newell Barbour

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

As soloist at the Symphony conecrts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-discussed pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's second concerto, Balakierff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent

Amusements.

Post Dec 17

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME

The most popular of all symphonies and the masterpiece of Russian music, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," has not been included in the regular Boston Symphony concerts for some years, and being tacitly reserved for the Pension Fund concerts, may not be heard otherwise for as many more, after it is played in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock.

Another event of the concert will be the sole appearance hereabouts of George F. Boyle, the noted Baltimorean composer-pianist, playing in his own concerto, with which he has enjoyed a considerable success with other orchestras. The programme will close with the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. George F. Boyle of Baltimore will play his piano concerto.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows: Balakireff's "Thamar"; MacDowell Piano Concerto, D minor, pianist

Dec 16

TRIBUNE

Address:

Date

Provide

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

Perhaps no musical work has ever been conceived of such vivid and throbbing emotional power as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play here. A noted writer on musical subjects has escribed it thus: "In Russia it has en the custom to bomb those unhappy otentates whom the people do not love. eter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky employed ibtler methods. He concealed his amunition in his music, thrown over the nces from the land of the Czar into the oncert halls and opera houses of Eupe and America. Its melancholy eauty, its gorgeous colors, its volcanic assion, shocked the conservative and fascinated the public. No need to explain this music, unless to condemn it. It was too human, too sincere, too utterly original for that. It winged its way m heart to heart."

NEWS OF MUSIC

AGAIN THE RISING PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

New Prowess in Mr. Stokowski and New Place for Him and His Band in New York—The Metropolitan Company Not to Visit Boston—Children's Concerts by the Chicago Orchestra — Mr. Marinuzzi Takes Over Campanini's Work — Items and Incidents

STEADILY continue the rise and progress of the Philadelphia Orchestra and of Mr. Stokowski as the conductor thereof. Mr. Cyrus Curtis and Mr. Edward Bok, somewhat disposed to figure as present "sustainers" of the band, had no need to insert a page-picture of it in their Saturday Evening Post and label it the foremost orchestra in the United States or words to that effect. From quarters more disinterested and better qualified to judge, it is easy to hear like opinion. Especially since the Philadelphians ventured into New York with five concerts in the course of a season has the new quality of orchestra and leader stood clear; while no very lengthy inquiries are necessary to discover that they are gradually but surely displacing there the band from Boston in the interest and the liking of both expert and fashionable frequenters of concerts. Of all the conductors whom New York, as the capital of music in America, regularly hears, there is none except Mr. Bodanzky to compare in interest and ability with Mr. Stokowski. Mr. Bodanzky, however, divides his work between opera house and concert-hall; while in the New Symphony Orchestra he is handicapped by a personnel, hard to mold and refine.

On the other hand, at every opportunity Mr. Stokowski betters the individual quality of forces that in recent years he has trained into a unified, plastic, adept and responsive ensemble. His programmes are as interesting, as modern, as Mr. Monteux's; authority, imagination, ardor and individuality make his versions of the chosen pieces invariably interesting, often significant, and stirring. Whatever Mr. Stokowski may have been in his earlier days, however "personal" (as the French say) he may still be, he is clearly on the way to become a conductor of the first rank. With reason the Philadelphians have opened their purses to give him the security and the freedom of a large and long-standing guarantee fund. With reason—to shift from major matters to matters relatively minor—he might bring himself and his orchestra on visit to Boston, that here where he is neither unknown nor unadmired, he might give audible proof of his present prowess.

Here in Boston

Contrary to conjecture and even to recent intimation on the programme of the Opera House, the Metropolitan Company will not visit Boston next spring. Its season in New York will end on or about April 2. Next, it goes to Atlanta for a week, as in many years past. Then, it disperses for summer engagements and summer holidays. The Chicago Company, returning for a fortnight beginning March 1, will provide the only opera in the full sense of the word to be heard in Boston this winter.

When the public of the Symphony Concerts returns to Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, it will see that the chubby cherubs supporting scrolls on the metal-work of the balconies have been scrubbed until they now shine in pristine brightness.

Mr. George Frederick Boyle, who is to play his own Concerto in D minor with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening next, is an Australian midway in his thirties. As pianist he went the rounds of Europe and then migrated to the United States to become in 1911 a teacher at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. The concerto, which is eight years old, has been heard at a music-festival in Worcester and at concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York and of Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago.

Mr. Stock's Children's Concerts

As already recorded in these columns, the Chicago Orchestra has set afoot this season a series of children's concerts—one a month upon a convenient afternoon from November through April. Mr. Stock himself leads as numerous an orchestra as may be necessary to the chosen music and says a preliminary word about the several pieces. Here, for example, is his programme for the children's concert of last Thursday afternoon:

March of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Andante from the "Surprise Symphony".Haydn
Dance of the Happy Spirits from the Opera, "Orpheus".....Gluck
Dance of the Marionettes.....Glazunov
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Suite, No. 1, from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

Of an earlier concert, at which Mr. Stock and the orchestra played Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," Mr. Hubbard in The Tribune wrote pleasantly and fancifully:

He was such a little fellow. Not much over six or seven. And small for his age. His head didn't come up to the top of the back of the seat, and his toes barely touched the floor. But that did not matter, for only at first did he lean back. After the music began he sat on the front edge of the chair and so his feet reached all right. His shirt was clean and white and his blue tie had been carefully tied. But his hair was mussed and there was a beautiful grimy shade to his right hand—a shade that no amount of washing could make come off. For he was a real boy, even though his face was small and slightly pinched. A kind of sad, wondering face, just a little older than it should be. And the eyes were big, wide open ones, and they looked out as though marveling what the world really meant.

The big hall [illegible] men on the stage with strange instruments in their hands, the people all about him—these seemed to awe him a little and make him draw into himself. At last a man came on the stage and told about music, and about instruments, and about what was to be heard. The little fellow drew back into his chair as though to shrink away from it all. But his eyes widened and he watched everything closely. A man in the orchestra played a tambourine just to show what it was like, and then when all the men played the tambourine could be heard in the music. And his eyes sparkled.

Then the man spoke again and there came a big, flowing tune that set the little fellow dreaming and his face grew quite solemn and old. Once more the man spoke and told of a dance that is danced at midnight when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death comes out with a fiddle and tunes it, and all the skeletons come and dance in the moonlight. And their bones rattle and they dance faster and faster until the cock crows, and the clock strikes one, and then they all hurry away.

And the man had the clock strike twelve and had Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle, and had the bones rattle, and had the cock crow, and had the clock strike one. And then the whole orchestra began, and the whole thing was done, the dance, the rattling bones, the cock crow and all. And the little fellow forgot everything. He shoved forward onto the frontest edge of the seat; he peeked round a big man in front of him. And he heard Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle and he saw all the dance, and he heard the cock crow and the clock strike one, and then he saw all rush away. And when it was over his eyes were big and wide and he was almost standing up. And all the children around him were clapping their hands and making a noise. But he, he just sank back into his seat and folded his arms as close round him as he could and sighed a big sigh. And hugged himself. . . . He was such a little fellow, but he had seen a wonderful dance which the skeletons dance when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death tunes up his fiddle. And he will never, never forget it.

Now that the New York Symphony Orchestra at the instigation of Mr. Damrosch, as well as the Chicago Orchestra by the zeal of Mr. Stock maintain such series of Children's Concerts, with the demand for tickets in both instances considerably exceeding the supply, why should not Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestrad do likewise? Of old it used to lead in such innovations while not a whit less, and perhaps several whits more, than the orchestra of New York and Chicago, it needs to cultivate the youngest generation into eager hearers of symphony concerts. By the recent token of Mr. Maier's recital of piano-pieces for youngsters, audiences for such a series would not be lacking.

SCHMITT'S "SALOME"

Dec 16

Times

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Mimodrama That the Music Originally Clothed and Enforced—The Russians' Perversion of It—Playwright and Composer's "Argument"—Oriental, Barbaric, Sensual

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the Suite drawn by Florent Schmitt from his music to Robert d'Humière's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome." Six years ago Dr. Muck set the piece on the programme of two Symphony Concerts, probably for the first times in the United States. He did not repeat it. Mr. Rabaud, of course, ignored it; it was hard to grasp and difficult to recall; therefore it now comes virtually as a new piece to the public of Symphony Hall. Unlike many a living Parisian composer, Schmitt has been slow to make way with America hearers. Once and again the dutiful conductor set forth one or another of h orchestral pieces, which are not few. F half an hour the audience hears Schmit then for half a year and more it forge him. Yet he has clear, individual profi "He traverses French music today," writ Jean-Aubry in his book about it, "like wild boar from the Vosges"—Schmitt w born in Lorraine—with the healthy robus ness of a sensitive and crabbed nature, di daining all coteries, dogmas and read made religions or organized enthusiasm . . . He submits to a strong discipline, b desires to accept it from none but himsel and therefore mingles, at his convenienc his recent predilections with the lessons the past. He is a singular mixture of passion for independence and an innat respect for rules. His choice tends wholl towards freedom, one might almost sa towards anarchy; and his nature incline him towards submission to principle Florent Schmitt's originality lies in thi rugged conflict fought with ardor. . . His 'Tragedy of Salome,' in conception an in realization is a manifestation of hi complex art and of all that it contains once of allurement and of violence, o ruggedness and refinement, of solidity an of rich color."

At the Hands of the Russians

As mimodrama, "The Tragedie of Salome" has been represented in Paris at th Théâtre des Arts in 1907, when the acto whom we now know as Lou-Tellegen mimed, as Lou van Tel, the part of th Baptist; at the Chatelet in 1912 by th singular and sophisticated Miss Thouha nova and at the Champs-Elysées in 1913 b Mr. Diaghilev's ballet with Miss Karsavin as Salome. As recently as last winter was revived at the Opéra with the cel brated Ida Rubinstein as the interestin daughter of Herodias. She did not fare we in the part. As produced by Mr. Diaghilev company, in the days when various bo young Russians rather than the more dis creet Fokine determined its ways, Schmitt's mimodrama gained many a beholder. In Symphony Hall we shall hear his music but see neither the action embroidered upon it nor the settings that framed it. Here, then, is an account of a performance in Paris in the summer of 1913:

Soudeikine's act-drop is beyond comprehension. So also is the scene upon which it rises—a platform enclosed by giant foliage of formal design. Much exuberance is suggested, but exuberance of what is not so clear. In the middle of the stage is a tall column, upon the top of which an object, presumably the Baptist's head, is dimly seen. Behind stands a curious pyramidal staircase. Eight negro slaves are discovered grouped about the column and its burden. Their woolly pates are white, white ostrich plumes are girt about their middles, and round their ankles are clasped what looks suspiciously like white spats. The limelight streaming on their naked bodies imparts a greenish tinge to the brown flesh, and gives them quite as nasty an appearance as one supposes the designers intended.

To strident music which one feels sure must be expressive of hectic passion and horror, the green and white negroes posture and run about the stage. Their antics are engaging and expressive of whatever the spectator chooses to think. They are joined presently by four executioners, who would do credit to any professional dreamer of nightmares. Like the negroes, these also have spats on their bare legs. They wear very little else, but carry large swords which obviously are meant for dark and bloody deeds. They are tall and lank, grim, sinister. In a business-like manner they divest themselves of the weapons of their office, and eclipse the efforts of the negroes in the game of Here-We-Go-Round-The-Baptist's-Head.

The music now, with relentless importunity, insists upon an impending climax. Negroes and executioners fall beautifully into place, a portion of the backcloth drops swiftly, and Salome is seen standing on the top of the staircase before a dim background of blue and mysterious starlit depth. She is shrouded in the voluminous folds of an immense cloak, and at first sight might be taken, as a witty observer remarked, for Mrs. Grundy come to put a stop to the proceedings. The music now breathes more easily, and Salome slowly comes down the staircase. The robe with which she is covered has an immense train—black with glittering embroidery of gold. As she descends the steps the train drags magnificently behind her. One suffers an uncomfortable anxiety lest it should topple down before its time and sweep its hapless wearer off her feet. But Soudeikine and Romanov have seen to this, and it is not until Salome has reached the stage, and is already advancing across it, that the enormous garment, with proper effect, comes flashingly tumbling after. Salome, with her grotesque retinue circles in solemn procession round the central column, and the train makes the most of its opportunities. Then the negroes lean forward, fastenings are loosened and as the robe falls into her attendants' outstretched arms, Salome steps forward for the dance.

Regard Beardsley's drawings as fashion plates, and the reader will arrive at a very fair idea of Karsavina's appearance as Salome. Her costume is exiguous—disclosing one thigh but not the other; her legs and arms are bare, with a blood-red heart and other devices stencilled on them. A high head-dress surmounts the tiny face of one of Beardsley's women, with blue smudges for eyes and wee vermilion lips. Of Karsavina's dance it is quite impossible to write with any detail. It is devised in the same pseudo-macabre spirit as the rest of the ballet, and is more remarkable as a feat of acrobatic agility and physical endurance than as an artistic performance. One is told that the dance is "at first frantic and insane; then more paroud and sorrowful, more remote and ecstatic. It is the expression and avowal of her sensual torment and of her atonement through the very misery of her unassuageable desire." Maybe it is all that; perhaps something more, perhaps a great deal less. For myself, I should have been interested to learn at what point the insanity died down and pride and sorrow took its place. Of ecstasy I could find no real suggestion, though the counterfeit was plausible; and the only remoteness was when the dance unexpectedly ended and the curtain went down.

As Originally Intended

All this was rather a Russian overlay and decoration of the play of d'Humières and the music of Schmitt than the course of the one and the suggestion of the other. What playwright and composer sought to set before the imagination of an audience best appears in their own "argument." Even so, it is lurid enough:

A terrace of Herod's Palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. The mountains of Moab shut in the horizon, rose-colored and russet-hued, dominated by the bulk of Mount Nebo, on which Moses, at the threshold of the Promised Land, saluted Canaan before dying. The sun is sinking. John slowly walks across the terrace and disappears. . . .

Torches light the stage. Cloths and jewels which overflow from a precious coffer sparkle under the glare. Herodias, deep in thought, plunges her hands into the mass, raises on high the necklaces and the veils spangled with gold. Salome, as one fascinated, appears, bends over the chest, adorns herself, and with a childish joy outlines her first dance. . . .

Salome has disappeared. Herod, enwrapped by the darkness, is lost in thoughts of lust and fear, while the watchful Herodias spies him. Then on the cursed sea mysterious lights flicker and seem to arise from the depths. The buildings of the engulfed Five Cities are dimly revealed beneath the waves. One would say that old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion. It is like a projection on a magic looking-glass of the drama that is playing in the brains of the couple seated there and silent in the night. The music comments on the demoniacal phantasmagoria.

Snatches of ancient orgiac ditties, choked by the rain of bitument and ashes on the terraces of Sodom and Gomorrah, are vaguely breathed. Dance measures, the shivering of stifled cymbals, the clapping of hands, sighs, and laughter that spreads and dies away. Then a voice arises from the abyss.

Herod is overcome. He hearkens. Mists now come up from the sea, enlaced figures assume a shape and mount from the depths, a living cloud from which, as brought forth by the dim dream and the ancient sin, Salome suddenly springs up, irresistible. Far off the thunder rolls. Salome begins to dance. Herod starts to his feet. . . .

Total darkness covers the stage and the rest of the drama is seen imperfectly by flashes of lightning. There is the lascivious dance, Herod's pursuit, the amorous flight, Salome seized, her veils plucked off by the Tetrarch's hand. For a moment she is nude, but John suddenly appears, steps forward, and covers her with the anchorite's

SUNDAY HERALD, BOS

GALLERY

APPEARING

LEO ORNSTEIN, PIANIST, SYMPHONY

Dec 13

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra in Music of Mimodrama, with Mr. Ornstein for Assisting Pianist—Mr. Rakhmaninov in a Singular Programme—Beginnings by the Boston Musical Association — Magdeleine Brard at Milton—Minor Recitals

AFTER the longest absence of recent years the Symphony Orchestra will resume its concerts here and hereabouts on Thursday evening, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. At Cambridge, in Sanders Theatre on Thursday, it will be heard in Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, which Mr. Monteux seems to fancy much; in the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's music-drama, "Tristan and Isolde" and, with the composer as "assisting artist" in a concerto for piano written by Mr. George F. Boyle of the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. A sturdy and conservative piece, it has been played in various cities and liked.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux will begin and end the concert with music of mimodrama. True, one such piece, Balakirev's "Thamar," was originally a symphonic poem and as such is listed on the pending programme. None the less many a hearer will recall it most readily as the ballet danced in Boston by Mr. Diaghilev's Russians in a wonderous red tower designed by Bakst. The music recounts the legend of the Caucasian queen, who tempted comely wayfarers into her castle, feasted them, revelled with them and, next morning, slew them. Many hereabouts have wished to hear Balakirev's piece under a French conductor. Now comes opportunity from the ablest of them when a ballet is in question. The other purely orchestral number is the Suite drawn by Schmitt from his mimodrama, likewise danced by the Russian Ballet (though never in this country). "The Tragedy of Salome," epitomizing once more in tones the tale of Herodias's daughter who loved the Baptist—a harsh and acrid, but a vivid and sinewy music, already heard here under Dr. Muck but now nearly forgotten. Between the two undanced mimodramas Mr. Ornstein, called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, will revive MacDowell's long unheard Concerto for piano in D minor. And Mr. Ornstein—it is to be remembered—is expert and eloquent pianist as well as singular composer.

...sung in Boston.

The Symphony Orchestra will return to Boston tomorrow morning from the longest and most exacting journey undertaken in years. The trip has continued through two weeks extending as far South as Baltimore and Washington, as far West as Cleveland and Detroit. In eleven cities audiences filling the chosen hall have listened to Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with every token of interest, pleasure and good will. This evening at Schenectady the little tour virtually ends.

H. T. PARKER

Globe Sun 14

Leo Ornstein, Soloist at Symphony Concerts

As soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-talked-of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto.

At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works, Balakierff's Symphonic Poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible late comers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

ORNSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

As soloist at the coming Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Leo Ornstein, the much-talked of Russian-American pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra. At the same concerts Pierre Monteux will revive two noteworthy works: Balaukierff's Symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," to be sung with a chorus behind the stage. Possible latecomers are forewarned that "Thamar," the opening number, will last 22 minutes without pause.

Leo Ormstein, soloist, with Boston Symphony.

Globe Dec 7

No Symphony Concerts

There will be no Symphony concerts again this week. On Dec 19 and 20, when the orchestra returns from its two weeks on tour, the soloist will be Leo Ornstein, who will play the MacDowell concerto in D minor. The other numbers on the program are Balakireff's "Thamar," and Florent Schmitt's suite from his mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome."

Adv Dec 14

Florence Newell Barbour

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

As soloist at the Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday, Leo Ornstein, the much-discussed pianist and composer, will play MacDowell's second concerto, Balakierff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," and Florent

Amusements.

Post Dec 17

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME

The most popular of all symphonies and the masterpiece of Russian music, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," has not been included in the regular Boston Symphony concerts for some years, and being tacitly reserved for the Pension Fund concerts, may not be heard otherwise for as many more, after it is played in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock.

Another event of the concert will be the sole appearance hereabouts of George F. Boyle, the noted Baltimorean composer-pianist, playing in his own concerto, with which he has enjoyed a considerable success with other orchestras. The programme will close with the Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr Monteux conductor, will give a concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, this evening. George F. Boyle of Baltimore will play his piano concerto.

The program of the Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is as follows: Balakirev's "Thamar"; MacDowell's Piano Concerto No. 2 (Leo Ornstein, pianist), Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome."

Dec 16

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony.

Perhaps no musical work has ever been conceived of such vivid and throbbing emotional power as Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play here. A noted writer on musical subjects has

...scribed it thus: "In Russia it has ...en the custom to bomb those unhappy ...otentates whom the people do not love. ...ter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky employed ...ghtler methods. He concealed his ammunition in his music, thrown over the ...nce from the land of the Czar into the ...oncert halls and opera houses of Europe and America. Its melancholy ...eauty, its gorgeous colors, its volcanic ...assion, shocked the conservative and ...ascinated the public. No need to explain this music, unless to condemn it. It was too human, too sincere, too utterly original for that. It winged its way ...heart to heart."

Dec 16

NEWS OF MUSIC

AGAIN THE RISING PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

New Prowess in Mr. Stokowski and New Place for Him and His Band in New York—The Metropolitan Company Not to Visit Boston—Children's Concerts by the Chicago Orchestra — Mr. Marinuzzi Takes Over Campanini's Work — Items and Incidents

STEADILY continue the rise and progress of the Philadelphia Orchestra and of Mr. Stokowski as the conductor thereof. Mr. Cyrus Curtis and Mr. Edward Bok, somewhat disposed to figure as present "sustainers" of the band, had no need to insert a page-picture of it in their Saturday Evening Post and label it the foremost orchestra in the United States or words to that effect. From quarters more disinterested and better qualified to judge, it is easy to hear like opinion. Especially since the Philadelphians ventured into New York with five concerts in the course of a season has the new quality of orchestra and leader stood clear; while no very lengthy inquiries are necessary to discover that they are gradually but surely displacing there the band from Boston in the interest and the liking of both expert and fashionable frequenters of concerts. Of all the conductors whom New York, as the capital of music in America, regularly hears, there is none except Mr. Bodanzky to compare in interest and ability with Mr. Stokowski. Mr. Bodanzky, however, divides his work between opera house and concert-hall; while in the New Symphony Orchestra he is handicapped by a personnel, hard to mold and refine.

On the other hand, at every opportunity Mr. Stokowski betters the individual quality of forces that in recent years he has trained into a unified, plastic, adept and responsive ensemble. His programmes are as interesting, as modern, as Mr. Monteux's; authority, imagination, ardor and individuality make his versions of the chosen pieces invariably interesting, often significant, and stirring. Whatever Mr. Stokowski may have been in his earlier days, however "personal" (as the French say) he may still be, he is clearly on the way to become a conductor of the first rank. With reason the Philadelphians have opened their purses to give him the security and the freedom of a large and long-standing guarantee fund. With reason—to shift from major matters to matters relatively minor—he might bring himself and his orchestra on visit to Boston, that here where he is neither unknown nor unadmired, he might give audible proof of his present prowess.

Here in Boston

Contrary to conjecture and even to recent intimation on the programme of the Opera House, the Metropolitan Company will not visit Boston next spring. Its season in New York will end on or about April 2. Next, it goes to Atlanta for a week, as in many years past. Then, it disperses for summer engagements and summer holidays. The Chicago Company, returning for a fortnight beginning March 1, will provide the only opera in the full sense of the word to be heard in Boston this winter.

When the public of the Symphony Concerts returns to Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, it will see that the chubby cherubs supporting scrolls on the metal-work of the balconies have been scrubbed until they now shine in pristine brightness.

Mr. George Frederick Boyle, who is to play his own Concerto in D minor with the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge on Thursday evening next, is an Australian midway in his thirties. As pianist he went the rounds of Europe and then migrated to the United States to become in 1911 a teacher at the Peabody Institute in Baltimore. The concerto, which is eight years old, has been heard at a music-festival in Worcester and at concerts of the Philharmonic Society in New York and of Mr. Stock's orchestra in Chicago.

Mr. Stock's Children's Concerts

As already recorded in these columns, the Chicago Orchestra has set afoot this season a series of children's concerts—one a month upon a convenient afternoon from November through April. Mr. Stock himself leads as numerous an orchestra as may be necessary to the chosen music and says a preliminary word about the several pieces. Here, for example, is his programme for the children's concert of last Thursday afternoon:

March of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Andante from the "Surprise Symphony".Haydn
Dance of the Happy Spirits from the Opera, "Orpheus".....Gluck
Dance of the Marionettes.....Glazunov
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Suite. No. 1, from the Incidental Music to Ibsen's Play, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

Of an earlier concert, at which Mr. Stock and the orchestra played Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," Mr. Hubbard in The Tribune wrote pleasantly and fancifully:

He was such a little fellow. Not much over six or seven. And small for his age. His head didn't come up to the top of the back of the seat, and his toes barely touched the floor. But that did not matter, for only at first did he lean back. After the music began he sat on the front edge of the chair and so his feet reached all right. His shirt was clean and white and his blue tie had been carefully tied. But his hair was mussed and there was a beautiful grimy shade to his right hand—a shade that no amount of washing could make come off. For he was a real boy, even though his face was small and slightly pinched. A kind of sad, wondering face, just a little older than it should be. And the eyes were big, wide open ones, and they looked out as though marveling what the world really meant.

on the s... with strang... ments in their hands, the people all about him—these seemed to awe him a little and make him draw into himself. At last a man came on the stage and told about music, and about instruments, and about what was to be heard. The little fellow drew back into his chair as though to shrink away from it all. But his eyes widened and he watched everything closely. A man in the orchestra played a tambourine just to show what it was like, and then when all the men played the tambourine could be heard in the music. And his eyes sparkled.

Then the man spoke again and there came a big, flowing tune that set the little fellow dreaming and his face grew quite solemn and old. Once more the man spoke and told of a dance that is danced at midnight when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death comes out with a fiddle and tunes it, and all the skeletons come and dance in the moonlight. And their bones rattle and they dance faster and faster until the cock crows, and the clock strikes one, and then they all hurry away.

And the man had the clock strike twelve and had Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle, and had the bones rattle, and had the cock crow, and had the clock strike one. And then the whole orchestra began, and the whole thing was done, the dance, the rattling bones, the cock crow and all. And the little fellow forgot everything. He shoved forward onto the frontest edge of the seat; he peeked round a big man in front of him. And he heard Old Mr. Death tune his fiddle and he saw all the dance, and he heard the cock crow and the clock strike one, and then he saw all rush away. And when it was over his eyes were big and wide and he was almost standing up. And all the children around him were clapping their hands and making a noise. But he, he just sank back into his seat and folded his arms as close round him as he could and sighed a big sigh. And hugged himself. . . . He was such a little fellow, but he had seen a wonderful dance which the skeletons dance when the clock strikes twelve and Old Mr. Death tunes up his fiddle. And he will never, never forget it.

Now that the New York Symphony Orchestra at the instigation of Mr. Damrosch, as well as the Chicago Orchestra by the zeal of Mr. Stock maintain such series of Children's Concerts, with the demand for tickets in both instances considerably exceeding the supply, why should not Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestrad do likewise? Of old it used to lead in such innovations while not a whit less, and perhaps several whits more, than the orchestra of New York and Chicago, it needs to cultivate the youngest generation into eager hearers of symphony concerts. By the recent token of Mr. Maier's recital of piano-pieces for youngsters, audiences for such a series would not be lacking.

SCHMITT'S "SALOME"

Trans Dec 18

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Mimodrama That the Music Originally Clothed and Enforced—The Russians' Perversion of It—Playwright and Composer's "Argument"—Oriental, Barbaric, Sensual

AT the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play the Suite drawn by Florent Schmitt from his music to Robert d'Humière's mimodrama, "The Tragedy of Salome." Six years ago Dr. Muck set the piece on the programme of two Symphony Concerts, probably for the first times in the United States. He did not repeat it. Mr. Rabaud, of course, ignored it; it was hard to grasp and difficult to recall; there fore it now comes virtually as a new piece to the public of Symphony Hall. Unlike many a living Parisian composer, Schmitt has been slow to make way with America hearers. Once and again the dutiful conductor set forth one or another of his orchestral pieces, which are not few. For half an hour the audience hears Schmitt then for half a year and more it forge him. Yet he has clear, individual profil "He traverses French music today," writ Jean-Aubry in his book about it, "like wild boar from the Vosges"—Schmitt w born in Lorraine—with the healthy robus ness of a sensitive and crabbed nature, di daining all coteries, dogmas and read made religions or organized enthusiasm . . . He submits to a strong discipline, b desires to accept it from none but himsel and therefore mingles, at his convenienc his recent predilections with the lessons the past. He is a singular mixture of passion for independence and an innat respect for rules. His choice tends wholl towards freedom, one might almost sa towards anarchy; and his nature incline him towards submission to principle Florent Schmitt's originality lies in thi rugged conflict fought with ardor. . . . His 'Tragedy of Salome,' in conception an in realization is a manifestation of hi complex art and of all that it contains once of allurement and of violence, o ruggedness and refinement, of solidity an of rich color."

At the Hands of the Russians

As mimodrama, "The Tragedie of Salome" has been represented in Paris at th Theatre des Arts in 1907, when the acto whom we now know as Lou-Tellegen mimed, as Lou van Tel, the part of th Baptist: at the Chatelet in 1912 by th singular and sophisticated Miss Thouha nova and at the Champs-Elysées in 1913 b Mr. Diaghilev's ballet with Miss Karsavin as Salome. As recently as last winter was revived at the Opéra with the cel brated Ida Rubinstein as the interestin daughter of Herodias. She did not fare we in the part. As produced by Mr. Diaghilev company, in the days when various bo young Russians rather than the more discreet Fokine determined its ways, Schmitt's pantomimodrama called many a beholder. Symphony Hall we shall hear his mu but see neither the action embroidere upon it nor the settings that framed Here, then, is an account of a performan in Paris in the summer of 1913:

Soudeikine's act-drop is beyond com prehension. So also is the scene upo which it rises—a platform enclosed b giant foliage of formal design. Muc exuberance is suggested, but exube ance of what is not so clear. In th middle of the stage is a tall colum upon the top of which an object, pr sumably the Baptist's head, is dim seen. Behind stands a curious pyr midal staircase. Eight negro slaves a discovered grouped about the colu and its burden. Their woolly pates white, white ostrich plumes are a about their middles, and round th ankles are clasped what looks s deliciously like white spats. The li light streaming on their naked bo imparts a greenish tinge to the br flesh, and gives them quite as nasty appearance as one supposes the signers intended.

To strident music which one feels must be expressive of hectic pas and horror, the green and white groes posture and run about the st Their antics are engaging and pressive of whatever the specta chooses to think. They are joi presently by four executioners, would do credit to any professio dreamer of nightmares. Like the groes, these also have spats on t bare legs. They wear very little but carry large swords which ob ously are meant for dark and blo deeds. They are tall and lank, gr sinister. In a business-like manner t divest themselves of the weapons their office, and eclipse the efforts the negroes in the game of Here Go-Round-The-Baptist's-Head.

The music now, with relentless portunity, insists upon an impend climax. Negroes and executioners beautifully into place, a portion of backcloth drops swiftly, and Salom seen standing on the top of the st case before a dim background of and mysterious starlit depth. She shrouded in the voluminous folds o immense cloak, and at first sight m be taken, as a witty observer marked, for Mrs. Grundy come to a stop to the proceedings. The m now breathes more easily, and Sal slowly comes down the staircase. robe with which she is covered has immense train—black with glitte embroidery of gold. As she desce the steps the train drags magnifice behind her. One suffers an unc fortable anxiety lest it should to down before its time and sweep hapless wearer off her feet. But S deikine and Romanov have seen this, and it is not until Salome reached the stage, and is already vancing across it, that the enorm garment, with proper effect, co flashingly tumbling after. Salome, her grotesque retinue circles in sol procession round the central colu and the train makes the most of opportunities. Then the negroes forward, fastenings are loosened as the robe falls into her attenda outstretched arms, Salome steps ward for the dance.

Regard Beardsley's drawings fashion plates, and the reader will rive at a very fair idea of Karsavi appearance as Salome. Her costu is exiguous—disclosing one thigh not the other; her legs and arms bare, with a blood-red heart and ot devices stencilled on them. A h head-dress surmounts the tiny face one of Beardsley's women, with b smudges for eyes and wee vermil lips. Of Karsavina's dance it is qu impossible to write with any deta It is devised in the same pseudo-ma bre spirit as the rest of the ballet, a is more remarkable as a feat of acr batic agility and physical endura than as an artistic performance. O is told that the dance is "at first fran and insane; then more paroud a sorrowful, more remote and ecstati It is the expression and avowal of h sensual torment and of her atonemen through the very misery of her unas suageable desire." Maybe it is that; perhaps something more, perha a great deal less. For myself, I shuol have been interested to learn at wha point the insanity died down and pri and sorrow took its place. Of ecsta I could find no real suggestion, thoug the counterfeit was plausible; and th only remoteness was when the danc unexpectedly ended and the curtai went down.

As Originally Intended

All this was rather a Russian overlay decoration of the play of d'Humières the music of Schmitt than the course of one and the suggestion of the other. W playwright and composer sought to set fore the imagination of an audience b appears in their own "argument." Ev so, it is lurid enough:

A terrace of Herod's Palace, overlooking the Dead Sea. The mountains of Moab shut in the horizon, rose-colored and russet-hued, dominated by the bulk of Mount Nebo, on which Moses, at the threshold of the Promised Land, saluted Canaan before dying. The sun is sinking. John slowly walks across the terrace and disappears.

Torches light the stage. Cloths and jewels which overflow from a precious coffer sparkle under the glare. Herodias, deep in thought, plunges her hands into the mass, raises on high the necklaces and the veils spangled with gold. Salome, as one fascinated, appears, bends over the chest, adorns herself, and with a childish joy outlines her first dance.

Salome has disappeared. Herod, enwrapped by the darkness, is lost in thoughts of lust and fear, while the watchful Herodias spies him. Then on the cursed sea mysterious lights flicker and seem to arise from the depths. The buildings of the engulfed Five Cities are dimly revealed beneath the waves. One would say that old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion. It is like a projection on a magic looking-glass of the drama that is playing in the brains of the couple seated there and silent in the night. The music comments on the demoniacal phantasmagoria.

Snatches of ancient orgiac ditties, choked by the rain of bitument and ashes on the terraces of Sodom and Gomorrah, are vaguely breathed. Dance measures, the shivering of stifled cymbals, the clapping of hands, sighs, and laughter that spreads and dies away. Then a voice arises from the abyss.

Herod is overcome. He hearkens. Mists now come up from the sea, enlaced figures assume a shape and mount from the depths, a living cloud from which, as brought forth by the dim dream and the ancient sin, Salome suddenly springs up, irresistible. Far off the thunder rolls. Salome begins to dance. Herod starts to his feet.

Total darkness covers the stage, and the rest of the drama is seen imperfectly by flashes of lightning. There is the lascivious danee, Herod's pursuit, the amorous flight, Salome seized, her veils plucked off by the Tetrarch's hand. For a moment she is nude, but John suddenly appears, steps forward, and covers her with the anchorite's cloak. The furious gesture of [illegible] is quickly interpreted by Herodias. Her signal delivers John over to the executioner, who leads him away, and soon reapears, holding John's head on a brazen charger.

The triumphant Salome takes the trophy and outlines a step, laden with her funereal burden. Then, as one feeling sudden uneasiness, as if the voice of the beheaded had whispered in her ear, she runs swiftly to the edge of the terrace, and hurls the charger over the battlement into the sea. And the sea turns to the color of blood, and Salome falls in a swoon, while mad terror sweeps away Herod, Herodias, and the executioners in frantic flight.

Salome comes to herself. The head of John appears, stares at her, then disappears. Salome quakes and turns away, in anguish. The head again gazes at her from another part of the stage. Salome wishes to steal away. And the heads, arising, are now everywhere. Salome, terrified, turns about to escape the bloody vision.

As she dances, the storm breaks. A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically, and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls, and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal frenzy.

Schmitt's Music

Schmitt's individuality in "Salome" consists in his ability to blend excellent thematic material (and little enough of it usually) with cogent and penetrating harmonization. The melody, often no more than a phase or two repeated over and over, is always eloquent and distinguished. The harmony taken by itself, is a symphony in its own right, continually varied, continually free and incisive, yet so held together by the logic of its individual voices that it seems inevitable. It seems not written to support the melody any more than the melody is written to decorate the harmony. Yet the two become one as though they were evolved in one and the same creative process, as doubtless they were.

In this purely musical procedure there is abundent use of all sorts of means to sensuous effect, pure chords emphasized solely for their effect on the nerves, varied tempo (there is one passage marked 3½-4), mysterious pauses and poetic dissonances. Yet no single effect seems to exist by itself each seems to be an evitable part of the symphonic texture. The technical means employed by the composer are of many sorts. There is one chromatic downward passage composed entirely of the chord of repeated major thirds, a device capable of more barbarous effect than any other of the modern French school. When this downward passage later becomes complicated with an upward chromatic line in the bass the effect to the ear is no better than tonal jargon.

In seeking "Oriental color" Schmitt uses the familiar device of the skip of the augmented major second. But he uses it less as a matter of routine than do most composers. Sometimes he prefers subtle harmonic timbres in a manner somewhat recalling the earlier pieces of Debussy. Here he is equally happy and somehow equally individual. Soft, pure chords, with their delicate crossing harmonies, rest the ear while constantly stimulating the attention.

The wild dance which ends the suite is a remarkable piece of writing. It is not in the least like Strauss's dance in "Salomé," which is a marvel of polyphonic deftness. Schmitt's Salomé is an animal, and has no existence outside her senses. She dances to an insistent 3-8 rhythm, while the orchestra continually sings a scrap of barbaric melody over no less barbaric harmonies. The emotional pressure never subsides. It mounts in its frenzy, now pounding out its fury in huge repeated chords, now striking terror with a savage theme in the bass, always accenting its fierce physical motion above all its music, as though in the mere savagery of motion the Oriental animal wished to give up her soul.

Trans. Dec 20

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Brahms, Liszt, Haendel and Bonnet Upon Mr. Monteux's Next Programme—"The Messiah" as Usual

AFTER longer interval than for many years past Brahms's first, best-remembered and best-liked symphony, in C minor, will be heard anew from the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. With such thick-bodied, stout-fibred, freely marching music, Mr. Monteux should do well. Nor should those who shake doubting heads at the mating of a French conductor with Brahms forget that Mr. Rabaud was far from failure when, last winter, he hazarded the German's second symphony. The other purely orchestral number of the new programme is the graphic and sardonic "Mephisto Waltz" from the music written by Liszt to episodes in Lenau's version of the Faust legend—a sharply colored and rhythmed piece in which again Mr. Monteux and the present orchestra should excel. Between symphony and waltz stands Händel's Concerto for organ, in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4), in which Mr. Bonnet, master of his instrument and master also of this ancient music for it, will play the solo part.

"About This Time"

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on tour, will return to Boston for concerts on Dec. 19 and 20. The orchestra will then play Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Thamar," Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and MacDowell's Second concerto for pianoforte, Leo Ornstein, pianist.

Music and Musicians --- Plays and

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

A FEAT FROM MR. MONTEUX IN CAMBRIDGE

Two Fragments of "Tristan" in Thrilling Performance by Conductor and Orchestra Both — A Gentle Pianist and His Gentle Concerto—Miss Crosby Sings Interesting Songs—A New Symphony from Mr. Converse—Mme. Frijsh in January

ADMITTEDLY the monthly concerts in Cambridge of the Symphony Orchestra are a part of its routine-work; while outside the numbers chosen by the "assisting artists," the programmes usually traverse pieces already heard or soon to be heard in Boston. Occasionally, however—the "soloists" again aside—something befalls in Sanders Theatre which has not come to pass in Symphony Hall and which may never occur there. Quite unexpectedly, such happening signalized the Symphony Concert of last evening—the third in the current series—on the further side of the Charles. The final item upon Mr. Monteux's list was the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan" to which was joined, as often, the arrangement for orchestra of Isolde's last speech—in the sunset, above her dead lover, in the final clearing of her racked heart and confused world. The conductor had included both pieces in the recent concert in Boston for the Pension Fund of the band and had succeeded but measurably with them. Through the journey of the last fortnight southward and westward he set them on various programmes. The outcome of these repetitions and, doubtless, of a swift flair of the moment in both leader and orchestra, was a more impassioned and impressive performance of both Prelude and Closing Scene than Bostonians ears have heard since the relatively distant days of Mahler and Toscanini in the opera house. For Dr. Muck, it will be readily recalled, was less eloquent with music from "Tristan" than with any other Wagnerian fragment.

The orchestra had hardly sounded the first measures of the Prelude—Isolde's soliloquy of love and fate in the first act—before it was clear that the conductor and his forces were on their mettle. The declamation of the violoncellos might have been the expressive tones of Miss Ternina or Mme. Fremstad. The succeeding nervous suspensé before the Prelude turns into music of the desire that is stronger than death or destiny, tingled upon ear and emotion as Mr. Monteux and the wind-choir gave it voice. The transition itself missed no whit of tragic accent. Through the music of desire mounted and mounted the unsated passion, ever renewed, the twined voices of the lovers. Only a little, in rare instants of excess of zeal, did Mr. Monteux blur a strand, while not once did he rein his brass-choir too freely. Since Mr. Toscanini's day the music has not moved in such beauty, thrill, illusion, holding the senses rapt. It fell away and Mr. Monteux passed to Isolde's apostrophe. He missed not one of the tragic voices that it weaves out of the opera into a final web of tonal passion and splendor. At every turn the orchestra, individually and choir by choir, caught his eloquence. The music rose, expanded as in Mahler's radiant intensities; the climax, so hollow at the concert for the Pension Fund, was full-throated to the last inner voice; the end paled into peace. After all, Mr. Monteux can do his feats; has his moments when he is above himself. For near twenty of them he and the orchestra had held their hearers, emotionally, in the hollow of their hands. Not German music, in spite of the American Legion, but genius-music, universal, possibly everlasting.

The concert began with Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony likewise garnered from the programme for the Pension Fund and the recent journeyings. Mr. Monteux has no mind to the music as Slav melodrama, according to the voice of most Russian conductors. No more can he give it the tragic accent which somehow Mr. Nikisch used to impart. Soundly and roundly, obviously and straightforwardly, the Parisian plays it and leaves the rest to the inventor of the squeezed melody of the first movement, the clipped and reluctant waltz of the second, the exuberant quick-step of the third, the desolation of the fourth. And listening ears and answering minds thought—what they thought; judged each according to themselves. It is the very newest fashion to call this tonal self-torture, this tonal self-revelation, this intrinsically personal music of mingled passion and hysteria, "Bolshevistic," though Chaikovsky set it to music-paper twenty-five years ago when the Tsars and "Holy Russia" seemed nearly as unshakable as the wintry stars. So may frightened minds go addled. It is a less recent fashion to call the symphony stale, overrated, outmoded. Praised and played to excess it was in the stirred and unquestioning nineties, when it was the newest, the best-liked of contemporary symphonies. Outmoded it may be, but less than many another piece of Chaikovsky in these days of subtler, sharper ways with tones. Possibly an older verdict is the sanest: The symphony is music of Chaikovsky's opened heart; and its passion of self-revelation is its salvation. The Russian lays bare in tones the very entrails of his spirit. We Anglo-Saxons, as curious a race in our way as the Russians in theirs, find the process exciting in the concert-room.

Between Chaikovsky and Wagner—uneasy, perilous place—stood Mr. George Frederick Boyle of Baltimore, pianist and composer, in a Concerto in D minor heard for the first time in this vicinage. It is a concise, compact, neatly made, wholly unpretentious music. It "exposes" certain motives, as the analysts like to say; it "deals with them"—to quote again the patois of programme-books—in mildly interesting fashion. Mr. Boyle is minded to a gentle harmonic coloring, flowing measures, simple euphonies. Smoothly he coordinates piano and orchestra; wisely he eschews both the rhapsodic and the displayful veins. As composer, as pianist, his hand is light, his touch crisp. Not too deep or exacting are his moods; everywhere he writes a transparent, unemphatic, courteous, almost smiling, music. Like the pianist in and out of Cambridge, it comes, it goes in a polite thirty minutes. H. T. P.

Dec 19

He Stoops to Conquer

Leo Ornstein, Pianist (Photograph by Apeda)

As He Will Be Seen — and Also Heard — Today and Tomorrow in His First and Deserved Appearances With the Symphony Orchestra

Herald

BONNET SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is even considered the finest living master of his instrument, will play with the great orchestra Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, a devout and serenely beautiful work.

A favorite symphony of many seasons—the First of Brahms in C-Minor—will open the program, and it will close with Liszt's "Mephisto," an episode from Lenau's "Faust," wherein the devil fiddles in a country tavern, demoralizing Faust and his partner.

Transcript Dec

BONNET WITH SYMPHONY

Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is also called the best in the world, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert of next Friday and Saturday, playing Handel's fourth organ concerto with the great orchestra.

[illegible] COMING

Globe Dec

Bonnet to Be Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Joseph Bonnet, the noted French organist, is to be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. He will play Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. Brahms' First Symphony, in C minor and Lizet's "Mephisto," based on an episode from Lenau's "Faust," are the remaining numbers on the program.

Transcript Dec

JOSEPH BONNET SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Joseph Bonnet, noted organist of France, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert next Friday and Saturday, playing Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto.

Brahms's First Symphony in C minor and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" complete the program.

Adv. Dec

BONNET AT SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Symphony concerts this week Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, will play with the orchestra Handel's fourth organ concerto. Bramhs' C minor symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" will also be performed.

JOSEPH BONNET, ORGANIST, SYMP

Post Dec 20

BONNET AT SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is even considered the finest living master of his instrument, will play with the great orchest- Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, a ned vout and serenely beautiful work. o do

A favorite symphony of many seasons—the First of Brahms in C mi guiding open the programme, and it rnstein's with Liszt's "Mephisto," a and tone from Lenau's "Faust," wh an devil fiddles in a country t PARKER moralizing Faust and his par cloak. The furious gesture of Herod is quickly interpreted by Herodias. Her signal delivers John over to the executioner, who leads him away, and soon reappears, holding John's head on a brazen charger.

Music and Musicians --- Plays and

The triumphant Salome takes the trophy and outlines a step, laden with her funereal burden. Then, as one feeling sudden uneasiness, as if the voice of the beheaded had whispered in her ear, she runs swiftly to the edge of the terrace, and hurls the charger over the battlement into the sea. And the sea turns to the color of blood, and Salome falls in a swoon, while mad terror sweeps away Herod, Herodias, and the executioners in frantic flight.

Salome comes to herself. The head of John appears, stares at her, then disappears. Salome quakes and turns away, in anguish. The head again gazes at her from another part of the stage. Salome wishes to steal away. And the heads, arising, are now everywhere. Salome, terrified, turns about to escape the bloody vision.

As she dances, the storm breaks. A furious wind envelops her. Sulphurous clouds roll about the precipice; the tempest rocks the sea. Pillars of sand rush in the desert places. The tall cypresses writhe tragically, and break in pieces with a crash. The bolt falls, and shatters the stones of the citadel. Mount Nebo vomits flame. The chain of Moab is on fire. All things burst on the dancer, who is swept about by an infernal frenzy.

Schmitt's Music

Schmitt's individuality in "Salomé" consists in his ability to blend exotic thematic material (and little enough of it usually) with cogent and penetrating harmonization. The melody, often no more than a phase or two repeated over and over, is always eloquent and distinguished. The harmony taken by itself, is a symphony in its own right, exceedingly varied, continually free and inclusive. Yet so held together by the logic of the individual voices that it seems inevitable. It seems not written to support the melody any more than the melody is written to decorate the harmony. Yet the two are one as though they were evolved at one and the same creative process, as doubtless they were.

In this purely musical paraphrase there is abundant use of all sorts of means to sensuous effect, pure chords emphasized solely for their effect on the nerves, varied tempo (there is one passage marked Più 4), mysterious pauses and poetic dissonances. Yet no single effect seems to exist by itself; each seems to be an excitable part of the symphonic texture. The technical means employed by the composer are of many sorts. There is one chromatic downward passage composed entirely of the chord of repeated major thirds, a device capable of more barbarous effect than any other of the modern French school. When this downward passage later becomes complicated with an upward chromatic line in the bass the effect to the ear is no better than tonal jargon.

In seeking "Oriental color" Schmitt uses the familiar device of the skip of the augmented major second. But he uses it less as a matter of routine than do most composers. Sometimes he prefers subtle harmonic timbres in a manner somewhat recalling the earlier pieces of Debussy. Here he is equally happy and somehow equally individual. Soft, pure chords, with their delicate crossing harmonies, rest the ear while constantly stimulating the attention.

The wild dance which ends the suite is a remarkable piece of writing. It is not in the least like Strauss's dance in "Salomé," which is a marvel of polyphonic deftness. Schmitt's Salomé is an animal, and has no existence outside her senses. She dances to an insistent 3-8 rhythm, while the orchestra continually sings a scrap of barbaric melody over no less barbaric harmonies. The emotional pressure never subsides. It mounts in its frenzy, now pounding out its fury in large repeated chords, now striking terror with a savage theme in the bass, always accenting its fierce physical motion above all its music, as though in the more savagery of motion the Oriental animal wished to give up her soul.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Brahms, Liszt, Haendel and Bonnet Upon Mr. Monteux's Next Programme—"The Messiah" as Usual

AFTER longer interval than for many years past Brahms's first, best-remembered and best-liked symphony, in C minor, will be heard anew from the Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. With such thick-bodied, stout-fibred, freely marching music, Mr. Monteux should do well. Nor should those who shake doubting heads at the mating of a French conductor with Brahms forget that Mr. Rabaud was far from failure when, last winter, he hazarded the German's second symphony. The other purely orchestral number of the new programme is the graphic and sardonic "Mephisto Waltz" from the music written by Liszt to episodes in Lenau's version of the Faust legend—a sharply colored and rhythmed piece in which again Mr. Monteux and the present orchestra should excel. Between symphony and waltz stands Händel's Concerto for organ, in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4), in which Mr. Bonnet, master of his instrument and master also of this ancient music for it, will play the solo part.

"About This Time"

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now on tour, will return to Boston for concerts on Dec. 19 and 20. The orchestra will then play Balakireff's symphonic poem, "Tamar," Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" and MacDowell's Second concerto for pianoforte, Leo Ornstein, pianist.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

A FEAT FROM MR. MONTEUX IN CAMBRIDGE

Two Fragments of "Tristan" in Thrilling Performance by Conductor and Orchestra Both — A Gentle Pianist and His Gentle Concerto—Miss Crosby Sings Interesting Songs—A New Symphony from Mr. Converse—Mme. Frijsh in January

ADMITTEDLY the monthly concerts in Cambridge of the Symphony Orchestra are a part of its routine-work; while outside the numbers chosen by the "assisting artists," the programmes usually traverse pieces already heard or soon to be heard in Boston. Occasionally, however—the "soloists" again aside—something befalls in Sanders Theatre which has not come to pass in Symphony Hall and which may never occur there. Quite unexpectedly, such happening signalized the Symphony Concert of last evening—the third in the current series—on the further side of the Charles. The final item upon Mr. Monteux's list was the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Tristan" to which was joined, as often, the arrangement for orchestra of Isolde's last speech—in the sunset, above her dead lover, in the final clearing of her racked heart and confused world. The conductor had included both pieces in the recent concert in Boston for the Pension Fund of the band and had succeeded but measurably with them. Through the journey of the last fortnight southward and westward he set them on various programmes. The outcome of these repetitions and, doubtless, of a swift flair of the moment in both leader and orchestra, was a more impassioned and impressive performance of both Prelude and Closing Scene than Bostonian ears have heard since the relatively distant days of Mahler and Toscanini in the opera house. For Dr. Muck, it will be readily recalled, was less eloquent with music from "Tristan" than with any other Wagnerian fragment.

The orchestra had hardly sounded the first measures of the Prelude—Isolde's soliloquy of love and fate in the first act—before it was clear that the conductor and his forces were on their mettle. The declamation of the violoncellos might have been the expressive tones of Miss Ternina or Mme. Fremstad. The succeeding nervous suspense before the Prelude turns into music of the desire that is stronger than death or destiny, tingled upon ear and emotion as Mr. Monteux and the wind-choir gave it voice. The transition itself missed no whit of tragic accent. Through the music of desire mounted and mounted the unsated passion, ever renewed, the twined voices of the lovers. Only a little, in rare instants of excess of zeal, did Mr. Monteux blur a strand, while not once did he rein his brass-choir too freely. Since Mr. Toscanini's day the music has not moved in such beauty, thrill, illusion, holding the senses rapt. It fell away and Mr. Monteux passed to Isolde's apostrophe. He missed not one of the tragic voices that it weaves out of the opera into a final web of tonal passion and splendor. At every turn the orchestra, individually and choir by choir, caught his eloquence. The music rose, expanded as in Mahler's radiant intensities; the climax, so hollow at the concert for the Pension Fund, was full-throated to the last inner voice; the end paled into peace. After all, Mr. Monteux can do his feats; has his moments when he is above himself. For near twenty of them he and the orchestra had held their hearers, emotionally, in the hollow of their hands. Not German music, in spite of the American Legion, but genius-music, universal, possibly everlasting.

The concert began with Chaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony likewise garnered from the programme for the Pension Fund and the recent journeyings. Mr. Monteux has no mind to the music as Slav melodrama, according to the voice of most Russian conductors. No more can he give it the tragic accent which somehow Mr. Nikisch used to impart. Soundly and roundly, obviously and straightforwardly, the Parisian plays it and leaves the rest to the inventor of the squeezed melody of the first movement, the clipped and reluctant waltz of the second, the exuberant quick-step of the third, the desolation of the fourth. And listening ears and answering minds thought—what they thought; judged each according to themselves. It is the very newest fashion to call this tonal self-torture, this tonal self-revelation, this intrinsically personal music of mingled passion and hysteria, "Bolshevistic," though Chaikovsky set it to music-paper twenty-five years ago when the Tsars and "Holy Russia" seemed nearly as unshakable as the wintry stars. So may frightened minds go addled. It is a less recent fashion to call the symphony stale, overrated, outmoded. Praised and played to excess it was in the stirred and unquestioning nineties, when it was the newest, the best-liked of contemporary symphonies. Outmoded it may be, but less than many another piece of Chaikovsky in these days of subtler, sharper ways with tones. Possibly an older verdict is the sanest: The symphony is music of Chaikovsky's opened heart; and its passion of self-revelation is its salvation. The Russian lays bare in tones the very entrails of his spirit. We Anglo-Saxons, as curious a race in our way as the Russians in theirs, find the process exciting in the concert-room.

Between Chaikovsky and Wagner—uneasy, perilous place—stood Mr. George Frederick Boyle of Baltimore, pianist and composer, in a Concerto in D minor heard for the first time in this vicinage. It is a concise, compact, neatly made, wholly unpretentious music. It "exposes" certain motives, as the analysts like to say; it "deals with them"—to quote again the patois of programme-books—in mildly interesting fashion. Mr. Boyle is minded to a gentle harmonic coloring, flowing measures, simple euphonies. Smoothly he coordinates piano and orchestra; wisely he eschews both the rhapsodic and the displayful veins. As composer, as pianist, his hand is light, his touch crisp. Not too deep or exacting are his moods; everywhere he writes a transparent, unemphatic, courteous, almost smiling, music. Like the pianist in and out of Cambridge, it comes, it goes in a polite thirty minutes. H. T. P.

He Stoops to Conquer

(Photograph by Apeda)

Leo Ornstein, Pianist

As He Will Be Seen — and Also Heard — Today and Tomorrow in His First and Deserved Appearances With the Symphony Orchestra

BONNET WITH SYMPHONY

Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is also called the best in the world, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert of next Friday and Saturday, playing Handel's fourth organ concerto with the great orchestra.

Bonnet to Be Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Joseph Bonnet, the noted French organist, is to be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. He will play Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto. Brahms' First Symphony, in C minor and Lizet's "Mephisto," based on an episode from Lenau's "Faust," are the remaining numbers on the program.

BONNET SOLOIST FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday, Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is even considered the finest living master of his instrument, will play with the great orchestra Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, a devout and serenely beautiful work.

A favorite symphony of many seasons—the First of Brahms in C minor—will open the program, and it will close with Liszt's "Mephisto," an episode from Lenau's "Faust," wherein the devil fiddles in a country tavern, demoralizing Faust and his partner.

JOSEPH BONNET, ORGANIST, SYMP

JOSEPH BONNET SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Joseph Bonnet, noted organist of France, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert next Friday and Saturday, playing Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto.

Brahms's First Symphony in C minor and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" complete the program.

BONNET AT SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Symphony concerts this week Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, will play with the orchestra Handel's fourth organ concerto. Bramhs' C minor symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" will also be performed.

BONNET AT SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday Joseph Bonnet, the first organist of France, who is even considered the finest living master of his instrument, will play with the great orchestra Handel's Fourth Organ Concerto, a devout and serenely beautiful work. He do

A favorite symphony of many seasons—the First of Brahms in C minor guiding open the programme, and it will close with Liszt's "Mephisto," a[illegible] tone, from Lenau's "Faust," wherein the devil fiddles in a country t[illegible] PARKER demoralizing Faust and his par[illegible]

EIGHTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Balakireff, MacDowell and Schmitt Form Program

PLAYERS GIVE BRILLIANT MATINEE

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 8th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Balakireff, Symphonic Poem "Thamar"; MacDowell, Concerto No. 2, D minor, for piano (Leo Ornstein, pianist); Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome," suite for orchestra.

Two noble dames, Salome and Thamar, in one afternoon! If Messalina and Catherine of Russia had also been portrayed in music, our joy would have been full. No doubt, the poets, novelists, painters, musicians have done Salome a grievous wrong. She was probably a slip of a girl, and her dance not so sensuous as those observed by unprejudiced spectators at balls patronized by "our best people." It is true she came to a sad ending, for she was married twice, had three sons by her second husband, and no doubht died highly respected.

Balakireff's music seems more picturesque and finely contrived when it is used for the superably barbaric Russian ballet than when it is heard in a concert hall. The spectator, engrossed by the sensual and tragic doings on the theatre stage, does not then notice the vain repetitions, weak measures of transitions, the fatiguing tossing of a theme or a fragment of a theme from one solo instrument to another—an annoying trick of Tschaikowsky's, by the way. These are clearly revealed when the same spectator sits in an orthodox concert hall. Yet when all is said in objection, this "Thamar" as a symphonic poem, written for the concert stage and without any thought of a ballet, is a fascinating work. Perhaps the orgy is the weakest part of it; it surely is inferior to the sections depicting the rushing waters of the Terek and the arrival of the ill-fated guest; far inferior to the magnificent close. Yes, this little man Balakireff, whose appearance seemed mean to Turgenieff, who was as bigoted, religiously and as superstitious as Louis XI, had imagination. There was a rich vein of poetry in his soul. Perhaps Queen Tamara haunted him, as visions of fair women disturbed the pious slumbers of St. Anthony in the desert.

The question came up twice yesterday: Does music used for a ballet lose irreparably when it is transferred to the concert hall? Schmitt's "Salome" was written for a mute drama, for pantomime and dancing; Balakireff's "Thamar" was composed as a concert piece; yet we remember the latter as ballet music, and Schmitt's music, ingenious and fantastical as it is, does not come up to d'Humiere's prose poem which it portrays in tones.

The Prelude, the "Dance of Pearls" and "The Enchantments of the Sea," are singularly impressive; after them the thunder and lightning business, Mount Nebo vomiting flames and the "infernal frenzy" of Salome left us cold; without a touch of goose flesh, without the disarrangement of a hair. We were conscious of a mighty pother on the stage. Perhaps 50 years from now, or even 25, this music will shake the souls of hearers, when the tragedy is enacted as a film-drama high up above the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux and the players, after a most successful trip of a fortnight, gave a remarkable performance of the two compositions, a performance remarkable as a technical display, supremely euphonious, wonderfully elastic. The city may well be proud of this orchestra as it exists today; the city may well be proud of Mr. Monteux. And yet the audience yesterday was sluggish, almost churlish in appreciation of an uncommonly brilliant concert.

This audience, however, recalled Mr. Ornstein several times. He well deserved the tribute, for he played the concerto in a masterly manner. Especially delightful was his reading of the tricksy Scherzo, designed originally as material for a symphonic poem, "Beatrice and Benedick." The concerto is a dazzling virtuoso piece. Mr. Josefly once told us he considered MacDowell's first concerto more individual. Many would have been glad to write the second.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor; Handel, Concerto for organ and orchestra, F major, No. 4, op. 4 (Joseph Bonnet, organist); Liszt, "The Dance in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz).

EXCITING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

"Thamar" and "Tragedy of Salome"—Ornstein, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Balakireff's "Thamar," tone poem for orchestra, is inspired by the Russian legend of the Queen, as sinister as she is seductive, who, in her castle which towers over a wild gorge in the Caucasus, lures unwary wanderers to a night of revelry and death. In the morning the waters of the River Terek, "mad with fright," carry away a lifeless body. The Queen, "cruel, cunning, yet divine," prepares to receive her next victim. This tone poem, and other fascinating music, was played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The performance was masterly. The music is irresistible in its barbaric splendor.

EARLY "NEO-RUSSIAN"

This tone poem, "Thamar," while one of the early products of the then "Neo-Russian" school of the '50s and '60s, while surpassed in workmanship, in perfection of form, by later compositions such as the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is the Alpha and Omega of a certain wonderful orientalism which the later-day Russians developed with such picturesqueness and suggestive power.

There are the superb opening page which portrays the flowing river—page in which the note of what is strange fateful, preordained, is struck. There are the maddening dances, through the mazes of which, as one might say, the theme of Thamar herself is heard. There are striking musical metamorphoses of these motives—metamorphoses which anticipate what later Russians than Balakireff were to do with this system of the transformation of motives and melodies, which the Russians had learned Berloiz and Liszt. At the last there is heard again, in a passage which will never grow old, the farewell of Thamar to her victim, and the music of many waters.

Actually Heard First Time

Why all this about a work which has been played before, though at too rare intervals, at these Symphony concerts? Because the music was actually heard for the first time yesterday. Dr. Muck never understood it. Mr. Monteux's reading was a revelation of the colors in the score, a display of supreme musicianship in the choice of tempi, and an accomplishment of temperament and imagination which overcame the reserve of the coolest and most critical listeners.

At last there was the voice of fate in the introduction, as well as the most beautiful and ingenious depiction of the flowing river; at last the dances were impolite and abandoned, furiously sensual in the oriental manner, until at a climax, the orchestra was as a pack of howling beasts; at last the majesty and the fatalism of the conclusion was felt. This is not to say that "Thamar" is a composition wholly without faults. Its faults are principally those of form. There are too many good ideas, without sufficient economy of presentation. There is excess of excitement and sensation. This is typical, perhaps, of the imagination of the Slav whose hide you scratch only to find that directly underneath he is an Oriental. With all this, "Thamar" is intoxicating music full of fire, color, imagination, genius.

Leo Ornstein's Playing

Then Leo Ornstein, who used to play "Wild Men's Dances," which he had himself composed, and look like a wild man as he played them, gave a very admirable performance of MacDowell's D minor piano concerto. It was as sane a performance—though also highly imaginative—as one would wish to hear. It had proportion, balance, repose, as counter elements to the virtuosity and individuality which this young man of 24 had long before he had reached his 24th year. Mr. Ornstein was modest in demeanor, assured in musical intention, and so much the greater a musician than he had ever appeared before.

It was a great pleasure to listen to him, and to MacDowell's poetic and legendary music. It was a pleasure to applaud an unusual talent which appears to be achieving more and more normal development and thus coming into its own. Mr. Ornstein, by his self-restraint in performance, his careful balance with the orchestra, his elimination of the pettily personal equation, gained a notably and richly deserved triumph.

Schmidt's "Tragedy of Salome"

Finally came the music to "The Tragedy of Salome," for orchestra, after a poem by Robert d'Humiers, by Florent Schmidt, who, sadly enough, was killed while fighting for France in 1915. This music was originally written for "a mute drama in two acts and seven scenes" by Robert d'Humiers, and thus performed at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. Later it was arranged as an orchestral suite in two movements, and also as a ballet. The audience was in doubt yesterday as to when it should leave the hall, since the programme did not state that the orchestra was going to play the suite in two movements, and there are seven divisions of the scenes described by d'Humiers. Again Mr. Monteux accomplished wonders with the music. And what strange music it is!

Honor to the great who died for France. Nevertheless, we are now talking of music. Candor compels the acknowledgment that this music is to us as brilliantly written as it is both cerebral and morbid in its character. We do not often employ the latter adjective. Strauss' much discussed music to "Salome" does not seem morbid, but on the contrary, very effective and expressive music to a drama which one may or may not like or approve. But there is a flavor of that which is a little mad and proverse in this score of Schmidt. It could not be otherwise when a composer who set out to write music for the poem of d'Humiers, which is as a feverish, splendid, troubled dream, in which nature itself takes on strange shapes and terrible images, "old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion," and there are lightnings and cataclysms as the evil virgin dances as if "swept about by an infernal frenzy."

It is a splendid score, and one can easily see how exciting it would be with the stage spectacle. It is dramatic music, while the workmanship is that of musical decadence. One is fascinated by this hard-headed, morbid music which one does not like, and this music, which one does not like, one is unable to forget.

Y, DECEMBER 20.

ORNSTEIN SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

Pianist's Performance Is Extraordinarily Competent

Leo Ornstein, the much discussed Russian-American pianist, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony Concert. In spite of his reputed bent for ultra-modern music, he elected to play an early work of MacDowell, the Second Piano Concerto, which dates from 1885.

His performance showed extraordinary technical competence, but he was too cool and collected to convey much of the limited but genuine wistfulness and glamour in the music to his hearers. The careful artistry of MacDowell is well illustrated by his choice of thoroughly congruous themes for the several movements of this concerto. He emphasizes its essential unity by recurrence in the last movement to the material used in the first.

One wonders how many listeners could divine, even after repeated hearings, anything of the stories supposed to be told by the music of such works as Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome," played yesterday, if they heard them without having read a program. When danced by the Russian Ballet, both pieces are doubtless vivid and engrossing. In the concert hall they sound muddled and groping, because the themes are fragmentary and development is sacrificed to expressiveness.

The texts by Lermontoff and D'Humieres, on which they are based, appeal primarily to the visual imagination of the reader. Neither author motivates or characterizes his personages. He only tries to make you see, hear and even smell strange remote and romantic scenes.

Although it is an experimental fact that music, like poetry, makes many people see pictures, especially people without intellectual interest in music, who go to concerts primarily to bathe in sounds, psychologists also have observed that no two people ever see exactly the same pictures when listening to a given piece of music.

The appeal of the great classics, furthermore, is to the intellect and to the formal imagination of the listener. Bach and Beethoven lose, rather than gain, when danced by a ballet. Wagner's "Tristan" and Debussy's "Pelleas," the most perfect operas yet written, have music which is better able to stand alone in the concert hall than lesser works like the two heard yesterday, simply because it is at bottom far more formal. The fact that tone poems gain power in the danced versions, while absolute music suffers, seems to show that program music rests on an unintelligent confusion of the arts of poetry, drama, music and dance.

The orchestra and its leader gave competent and at times brilliant interpretations of the chosen numbers. The female chorus which assisted in one of the episodes in Schmitt's "Salome" performed a difficult task well.

This program will be repeated tonight. At the next concerts Joseph Bonnet will play Handel's Fourth Concerto for Organ. The other numbers are to be Brahms' First Symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" Waltz.

ITOR, BOSTON, U.S.A.,

Monitor

Dec 20

MUSIC

Musical Affairs in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salomé"—works theatrical in character, if not written primarily for the theater—formed the greater part of the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 19. Between them Leo Ornstein played MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto. Between "Thamar," first performed in 1883-84, and "The Tragedy of Salomé," first performed in 1911, there is not so great a difference in style and method of composition as might be supposed from the difference of 27 years in the dates of their first performances. Of course Schmitt, writing since great improvements in the technic and mechanism of orchestral instruments have been made, is able to evoke many strange and novel orchestral tints impossible to the earlier Balakireff, restricted to the more limited orchestral resources of his day. Yet we find in both works the same theatrical emotionalism, the same exaggerations, the same gorgeous, intense coloring; and who will say that after all Balakireff with his simpler harmonic and melodic scheme does not succeed in making a more direct and vivid appeal to the imagination than Schmitt with all his complexity? The close proximity of these two works on the same program could not fail to make each lose a part of its complete effectiveness.

MacDowell's familiar concerto did not prove a sufficient relief. Mr. Ornstein played his part of the concerto without distinction. The scherzo was taken at so rapid a pace that its outlines were blurred and its rhythm indistinct. The more romantic portions of the first and last movements were played coldly—the brilliant passages with precision and accuracy. The orchestra played with more than its accustomed virtuosity in the "Tragedy of Salomé," and Mr. Monteux, in evident sympathy with the music, conducted with warmth and vigor.

The first concert of the Boston

American

AY, DECEMBER 20, 191

ORNSTEIN IS SKILLFUL AT SYMPHONY

Leo Ornstein, pianist, and composer of ultra-modern and futurist music, was the soloist at the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. He played MacDowell's Second Concerto in D minor, opus 23. khe other works on the program were Balakireff's symphonic suite, "Thamar," after a poem by Michail Lermontoff, and Florent Schmitt's orchestral suite, "The Tragedy of Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, who was killed four years ago, fighting for France.

A program of extraordinary interest, although none of the works was new here. Balakireff accompanied the dance pantomime when Diaghileff's Russian Ballet gave it at the Boston Opera House a few years ago, with Flore Ravelles and Adolf Bolm in the leading roles. It is overflowing with color, emotional excitement, and the orchestration is brilliant. The music in itself is full of suggestion of life and action, a complete and satisfying entertainment even without the pantomime. Performed with rare brilliancy, it recalled vividly the beauties of the ballet, and displayed new beauties of its own. This number alone would have made the program a delight.

Mr. Ornstein was in the vein, and gave a characteristic performance of the concerto, which is a show piece. Persons who did not take the young man very seriously when he played some remarkable impressionistic "cubist" pieces of his own here not many years ago, were impressed by the excellence of his performance of MacDowell's work. He was recalled repeatedly at the close of the concerto.

The story of Salome as told by d'Humieres differs somewhat from that by Wilde in his one-act tragedy but is equally poignant. Schmitt's music abounds in lovely melody and dramatic quality, "program music" of a high order, interpreting the tragic story, but without slavish adherence to detail. It was performed con amore, and auditors interrupted the usual last mad rush for trolley cars to linger and applaud.

9

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Did you ever take a Huntington-av car past Symphony Hall Friday noon in Winter and watch your fellow-passengers crane their necks to look at the chilly but cheerful crowd camping on the steps waiting for the 25-cent rush seats at the afternoon Symphony concerts?

"I wouldn't wait in line an hour with the mercury 15 above—not even to get a free box seat for next year's 'World's Series!'" a male passenger declares emphatically.

"Nor I even to be first at the biggest bargain sale ever," answered his feminine companion.

Yet if Kreisler or Melba is announced as soloist, the Symphony line begins to gather by 10 a m for a concert at 2:30. People bundle up in their warmest clothes and bring newspapers to stand on and patiently endure three hours of Winter cold on the bare stone steps of the hall until the doors open at 1:30, and another weary hour inside to hear a concert an hour and a half long.

I said they were patient. Of course it's true they grumble against the management. They want to know why you can't get a ticket of admission in advance, instead of being able to get in for a quarter only on the "pay as you enter" system.

They object because the collector at the door refuses to stop and change $10 bills while the whole line is held up. If you haven't your quarter in your hand as you go in the door you may get yanked out of the line and lose the place you nearly froze to win.

Perhaps the fatal number 505 is reached before the collector has time to attend to your case, or before you can find out which pocket you lost the precious coin out of. Then the doors are shut—and you are "out of luck." There are only 505 seats in the second balcony and no standing room is ever sold at Symphony concerts.

Old Stagers Know

It's no use to do a Marathon around to the box office, upsetting panting old ladies and scampering school girls en route as you inevitably will the first time you get shut out after a long and refrigerating wait.

They'll only say wearily for the ten-thousanth time "all seats for Friday sold for the season, except the second balcony." Your only remedy is to hasten to a ticket agency—they may have a seat left, which they will part with for a consideration.

Moral—get to the steps early and bring a quarter in change with you if you want to get in sure.

Another frequent complaint among people in the line is that the doors might just as well open at 8 a m instead of 1:30 p m, and let people wait in the warm hall instead of on the icy steps.

A third objection against the management is that there is no way of telling when you arrive too late to get in whether you will be No. 504 or No. 506—the last but one in or the first shut out, and sometimes several hundred people are shut out, after waiting a considerable time, when the doors finally open, and are closed before you get to them.

Of course old stagers can tell you about where the danger line comes. But noses are not counted till the doors open, and if there is a chance of getting in, most people will wait on the chance.

"What prevents people from sneaking into line ahead of their proper place or hiring small boys to hold places for them?" the sceptical may wonder.

Nothing except a very efficient supervision provided by the Symphony Hall management, and the average man's sense of fairness. You lose your place and have to go to the foot of the line if you leave it even for a moment, and though people sometimes try to sneak in where they don't belong they are almost invariably detected by the eagle eye of the guard and ignominiously expelled. The stony glares and audible comments of the neighbors perhaps sharpen the vision of the men in charge when an intruder breaks in.

Sort of People in Line

Of these chronic grievances of the Symphony line two are futile. Whenever the doors opened, or seats were placed on sale, the law of supply and demand would produce some sort of waiting line as long as many more than the possible 605 persons often want to buy admission to Symphony concerts for a quarter.

But it does seem as though the line could be officially counted as it arrives instead of as it enters (or gets shut out).

What sort of people are in the line, anyhow? you wonder. Well, a rather representative cross section of middle class Boston. Millionaires are not there—though college girls, and even college men, clergy, teachers and other respectable and well-dressed people are in a majority.

Contrary to popular notions only a small minority of the line is made up of professional musicians and foreigners. Some of both are present—but most of the crowd is about what one sees in the Cambridge Subway between Central and Harvard sqs, or in the Brookline cars, upper middle class Americans.

The only remarkable thing about them is their willingness to endure physical discomfort for the sake of a chance to hear classical music, especially if played or sung by a great virtuoso or prima donna.

Three out of four in line are women, of course. Most men can't get Fridays off from the office to go to concerts, even if they wanted to.

One wonders, looking at the Symphony line, whether low-priced concerts by the Symphony Orchestra given in the evening, with strictly "classical" programs, wouldn't crowd Mechanics Hall? It seems too bad that great music should be a luxury, available only to those with the price of a season Symphony ticket to spare.

The applause that greets the classical music often played at the "Pops" shows that there is a large public waiting for inexpensive concerts of the best orchestral music here in Boston.

Globe Dec

heart."

EIGHTH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Balakireff, MacDowell and Schmitt Form Program

PLAYERS GIVE BRILLIANT MATINEE

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 8th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows: Balakireff, Symphonic Poem "Thamar"; MacDowell, Concerto No. 2, D minor, for piano (Leo Ornstein, pianist); Schmitt, "The Tragedy of Salome," suite for orchestra.

Two noble dames, Salome and Thamar, in one afternoon! If Messalina and Catherine of Russia had also been portrayed in music, our joy would have been full. No doubt, the poets, novelists, painters, musicians have done Salome a grievous wrong. She was probably a slip of a girl, and her dance not so sensuous as those observed by unprejudiced spectators at balls patronized by "our best people." It is true she came to a sad ending, for she was married twice, had three sons by her second husband, and no doubht died highly respected.

Balakireff's music seems more picturesque and finely contrived when it is used for the superably barbaric Russian ballet than when it is heard in a concert hall. The spectator, engrossed by the sensual and tragic doings on the theatre stage, does not then notice the vain repetitions, weak measures of transitions, the fatiguing tossing of a theme or a fragment of a theme from one solo instrument to another—an annoying trick of Tschaikowsky's, by the way. These are cleary revealed when the same spectator sits in an orthodox concert hall. Yet when all is said in objection, this "Thamar" as a symphonic poem, written for the concert stage and without any thought of a ballet, is a fascinating work. Perhaps the orgy is the weakest part of it; it surely is inferior to the sections depicting the rushing waters of the Terek and the arrival of the ill-fated guest; far inferior to the magnificent close. Yes, this little man, Balakireff, whose appearance seemed mean to Turgenieff, who was as bigoted, religiously and as superstitious as Louis XI, had imagination. There was a rich vein of poetry in his soul. Perhaps, Queen Tamara haunted him, as visions of fair women disturbed the pious slumbers of St. Anthony in the desert.

The question came up twice yesterday: Does music used for a ballet lose irreparably when it is transferred to the concert hall? Schmitt's "Salome" was written for a mute drama, for pantomime and dancing; Balakireff's "Thamar" was composed as a concert piece; yet we remember the latter as ballet music, and Schmitt's music, ingenious and fantastical as it is, does not come up to d'Humiere's prose poem which it portrays in tones.

The Prelude, the "Dance of Pearls" and "The Enchantments of the Sea," are singularly impressive; after them the thunder and lightning business, Mount Nebo vomiting flames and the "infernal frenzy" of Salome left us cold; without a touch of goose flesh, without the disarrangement of a hair. We were conscious of a mighty pother on the stage. Perhaps 50 years from now, or even 25, this music will shake the souls of hearers, when the tragedy is enacted as a film-drama high up above the orchestra.

Mr. Monteux and the players, after a most successful trip of a fortnight, gave a remarkable performance of the two compositions, a performance remarkable as a technical display, supremely euphonious, wonderfully elastic. The city may well be proud of this orchestra as it exists today; the city may well be proud of Mr. Monteux. And yet the audience yesterday was sluggish, almost churlish in appreciation of an uncommonly brilliant concert.

This audience, however, recalled Mr. Ornstein several times. He well deserved the tribute, for he played the concerto in a masterly manner. Especially delightful was his reading of the tricksy Scherzo, designed originally as material for a symphonic poem, "Beatrice and Benedick." The concerto is a dazzling virtuoso piece. Mr. Josefly once told us he considered MacDowell's first concerto more individual. Many would have been glad to write the second.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 3, C minor; Handel, Concerto for organ and orchestra, F major, No. 4, op. 4 (Joseph Bonnet, organist); Liszt, "The Dance in the Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz).

EXCITING PIECES BY SYMPHONY

"Thamar" and "Tragedy of Salome"—Ornstein, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Balakireff's "Thamar," tone poem for orchestra, is inspired by the Russian legend of the Queen, as sinister as she is seductive, who, in her castle which towers over a wild gorge in the Caucasus, lures unwary wanderers to a night of revelry and death. In the morning the waters of the River Terek, "mad with fright," carry away a lifeless body. The Queen, "cruel, cunning, yet divine," prepares to receive her next victim. This tone poem, and other fascinating music, was played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The performance was masterly. The music is irresistible in its barbaric splendor.

EARLY "NEO-RUSSIAN"

This tone poem, "Thamar," while one of the early products of the then "Neo-Russian" school of the '50s and '60s, while surpassed in workmanship, in perfection of form, by later compositions such as the "Scheherazade" of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is the Alpha and Omega of a certain wonderful orientalism which the later-day Russians developed with such picturesqueness and suggestive power.

There are the superb opening page which portrays the flowing river—page in which the note of what is strange fateful, preordained, is struck. There are the maddening dances, through the mazes of which, as one might say, the theme of Thamar herself is heard. There are striking musical metamorphoses of these motives—metamorphoses which anticipate what later Russians than Balakireff were to do with this system of the transformation of motives and melodies, which the Russians had learned Berloiz and Liszt. At the last there is heard again, in a passage which will never grow old, the farewell of Thamar to her victim, and the music of many waters.

Actually Heard First Time

Why all this about a work which has been played before, though at too rare intervals, at these Symphony concerts? Because the music was actually heard for the first time yesterday. Dr. Muck never understood it. Mr. Monteux's reading was a revelation of the colors in the score, a display of supreme musicianship in the choice of tempi, and an accomplishment of temperament and imagination which overcame the reserve of the coolest and most critical listeners.

At last there was the voice of fate in the introduction, as well as the most beautiful and ingenious depiction of the flowing river; at last the dances were impolite and abandoned, furiously sensual in the oriental manner, until at a climax, the orchestra was as a pack of howling beasts; at last the majesty and the fatalism of the conclusion was felt. This is not to say that "Thamar" is a composition wholly without faults. Its faults are principally those of form. There are too many good ideas, without sufficient economy of presentation. There is excess of excitement and sensation. This is typical, perhaps, of the imagination of the Slav whose hide you scratch only to find that directly underneath he is an Oriental. With all this, "Thamar" is intoxicating music full of fire, color, imagination, genius.

Leo Ornstein's Playing

Then Leo Ornstein, who used to play "Wild Men's Dances," which he had himself composed, and look like a wild man as he played them, gave a very admirable performance of MacDowell's D minor piano concerto. It was as sane a performance—though also highly imaginative—as one would wish to hear. It had proportion, balance, repose, as counter elements to the virtuosity and individuality which this young man of 24 had long before he had reached his 24th year. Mr. Ornstein was modest in demeanor, assured in musical intention, and so much the greater a musician than he had ever appeared before.

It was a great pleasure to listen to him, and to MacDowell's poetic and legendary music. It was a pleasure to applaud an unusual talent which appears to be achieving more and more normal development and thus coming into its own. Mr. Ornstein, by his self-restraint in performance, his careful balance with the orchestra, his elimination of the pettily personal equation, gained a notably and richly deserved triumph.

Schmidt's "Tragedy of Salome"

Finally came the music to "The Tragedy of Salome," for orchestra, after a poem by Robert d'Humiers, by Florent Schmidt, who, sadly enough, was killed while fighting for France in 1915. This music was originally written for "a mute drama in two acts and seven scenes" by Robert d'Humiers, and thus performed at the Theatre des Arts, Paris, Nov. 9, 1907. Later it was arranged as an orchestral suite in two movements, and also as a ballet. The audience was in doubt yesterday as to when it should leave the hall, since the programme did not state that the orchestra was going to play the suite in two movements, and there are seven divisions of the scenes described by d'Humiers. Again Mr. Monteux accomplished wonders with the music. And what strange music it is!

Honor to the great who died for France. Nevertheless, we are now talking of music. Candor compels the acknowledgment that this music is to us as brilliantly written as it is both cerebral and morbid in its character. We do not often employ the latter adjective. Strauss' much discussed music to "Salome" does not seem morbid, but on the contrary, very effective and expressive music to a drama which one may or may not like or approve. But there is a flavor of that which is a little mad and preverse in this score of Schmidt. It could not be otherwise when a composer who set out to write music for the poem of d'Humiers, which is as a feverish, splendid, troubled dream, in which nature itself takes on strange shapes and terrible images, "old crimes recognize Salome and call to her in brotherly fashion," and there are lightnings and cataclysms as the evil virgin dances as if "swept about by an infernal frenzy."

It is a splendid score, and one can easily see how exciting it would be with the stage spectacle. It is dramatic music, while the workmanship is that of musical decadence. One is fascinated by this hard-headed, morbid music which one does not like, and this music, which one does not like, one is unable to forget.

ITOR, BOSTON, U.S.A.,

Monitor

MUSIC

Musical Affairs in Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts — Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salomé"—works theatrical in character, if not written primarily for the theater—formed the greater part of the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 19. Between them Leo Ornstein played MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto. Between "Thamar," first performed in 1883-84, and "The Tragedy of Salomé," first performed in 1911, there is not so great a difference in style and method of composition as might be supposed from the difference of 27 years in the dates of their first performances. Of course Schmitt, writing since great improvements in the technic and mechanism of orchestral instruments have been made, is able to evoke many strange and novel orchestral tints impossible to the earlier Balakireff, restricted to the more limited orchestral resources of his day. Yet we find in both works the same theatrical emotionalism, the same exaggerations, the same gorgeous, intense coloring; and who will say that after all Balakireff with his simpler harmonic and melodic scheme does not succeed in making a more direct and vivid appeal to the imagination than Schmitt with all his complexity? The close proximity of these two works on the same program could not fail to make each lose a part of its complete effectiveness.

MacDowell's familiar concerto did not prove a sufficient relief. Mr. Ornstein played his part of the concerto without distinction. The scherzo was taken at so rapid a pace that its outlines were blurred and its rhythm indistinct. The more romantic portions of the first and last movements were played coldly—the brilliant passages with precision and accuracy. The orchestra played with more than its accustomed virtuosity in the "Tragedy of Salomé," and Mr. Monteux, in evident sympathy with the music, conducted with warmth and vigor.

The first concert of the Boston

American

AY, DECEMBER 20, 191

ORNSTEIN IS SKILLFUL AT SYMPHONY

Leo Ornstein, pianist, and composer of ultra-modern and futurist music, was the soloist at the eighth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. He played MacDowell's Second Concerto in D minor, opus 23. khe other works on the program were Balakireff's symphonic suite, "Thamar," after a poem by Michail Lermontoff, and Florent Schmitt's orchestral suite "The Tragedy of Salome," after a poem by Robert d'Humieres, who was killed four years ago, fighting for France.

A program of extraordinary interest, although none of the works was new here. Balakireff accompanied the dance pantomime when Diaghileff's Russian Ballet gave it at the Boston Opera House a few years ago, with Flore Ravelles and Adolf Bolm in the leading roles. It is overflowing with color, emotional excitement, and the orchestration is brilliant. The music in itself is full of suggestion of life and action, a complete and satisfying entertainment even without the pantomime. Performed with rare brilliancy, it recalled vividly the beauties of the ballet, and displayed new beauties of its own. This number alone would have made the program a delight.

Mr. Ornstein was in the vein, and gave a characteristic performance of the concerto, which is a show piece. Persons who did not take the young man very seriously when he played some remarkable impressionistic "cubist" pieces of his own here not many years ago, were impressed by the excellence of his performance of MacDowell's work. He was recalled repeatedly at the close of the concerto.

The story of Salome as told by d'Humieres differs somewhat from that by Wilde in his one-act tragedy but is equally poignant. Schmitt's music abounds in lovely melody and dramatic quality, "program music" of a high order, interpreting the tragic story, but without slavish adherence to detail. It was performed con amore, and auditors interrupted the usual last mad rush for trolley cars to linger and applaud.

Y, DECEMBER 20.

RNSTEIN SOLOIST WITH THE SYMPHONY

Pianist's Performance Is Extraordinarily Competent

Leo Ornstein, the much discussed Russian-American pianist, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony Concert. In spite of his reputed bent for ultra-modern music, he elected to play an early work of MacDowell, the Second Piano Concerto, which dates from 1885.

His performance showed extraordinary technical competence, but he was too cool and collected to convey much of the limited but genuine wistfulness and glamour in the music to his hearers. The careful artistry of MacDowell is well illustrated by his choice of thoroughly congruous themes for the several movements of this concerto. He emphasizes its essential unity by recurrence in the last movement to the material used in the first.

One wonders how many listeners could divine, even after repeated hearings, anything of the stories supposed to be told by the music of such works as Balakireff's "Thamar" and Florent Schmitt's "The Tragedy of Salome," played yesterday, if they heard them without having read a program. When danced by the Russian Ballet, both pieces are doubtless vivid and engrossing. In the concert hall they sound muddled and groping, because the themes are fragmentary and development is sacrificed to expressiveness.

The texts by Lermontoff and D'Humieres, on which they are based, appeal primarily to the visual imagination of the reader. Neither author motivates or characterizes his personages. He only tries to make you see, hear and even smell strange remote and romantic scenes.

Although it is an experimental fact that music, like poetry, makes many people see pictures, especially people without intellectual interest in music, who go to concerts primarily to bathe in sounds, psychologists also have observed that no two people ever see exactly the same pictures when listening to a given piece of music.

The appeal of the great classics, furthermore, is to the intellect and to the formal imagination of the listener. Bach and Beethoven lose, rather than gain, when danced by a ballet. Wagner's "Tristan" and Debussy's "Pelleas," the most perfect operas yet written, have music which is better able to stand alone in the concert hall than lesser works like the two heard yesterday, simply because it is at bottom far more formal. The fact that tone poems gain power in the danced versions, while absolute music suffers, seems to show that program music rests on an unintelligent confusion of the arts of poetry, drama, music and dance.

The orchestra and its leader gave competent and at times brilliant interpretations of the chosen numbers. The female chorus which assisted in one of the episodes in Schmitt's "Salome" performed a difficult task well.

This program will be repeated tonight. At the next concerts Joseph Bonnet will play Handel's Fourth Concerto for Organ. The other numbers are to be Brahms' First Symphony and Liszt's "Mephisto" Waltz.

9

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Did you ever take a Huntington-av car past Symphony Hall Friday noon in Winter and watch your fellow-passengers crane their necks to look at the chilly but cheerful crowd camping on the steps waiting for the 25-cent rush seats at the afternoon Symphony concerts?

"I wouldn't wait in line an hour with the mercury 15 above—not even to get a free box seat for next year's 'World's Series!'" a male passenger declares emphatically.

"Nor I even to be first at the biggest bargain sale ever," answered his feminine companion.

Yet if Kreisler or Melba is announced as soloist, the Symphony line begins to gather by 10 a m for a concert at 2:30. People bundle up in their warmest clothes and bring newspapers to stand on and patiently endure three hours of Winter cold on the bare stone steps of the hall until the doors open at 1:30, and another weary hour inside to hear a concert an hour and a half long.

I said they were patient. Of course it's true they grumble against the management. They want to know why you can't get a ticket of admission in advance, instead of being able to get in for a quarter only on the "pay as you enter" system.

They object because the collector at the door refuses to stop and change $10 bills while the whole line is held up. If you haven't your quarter in your hand as you go in the door you may get yanked out of the line and lose the place you nearly froze to win.

Perhaps the fatal number 505 is reached before the collector has time to attend to your case, or before you can find out which pocket you lost the precious coin out of. Then the doors are shut—and you are "out of luck." There are only 505 seats in the second balcony and no standing room is ever sold at Symphony concerts.

Old Stagers Know

It's no use to do a Marathon around to the box office, upsetting panting old ladies and scampering school girls en route as you inevitably will the first time you get shut out after a long and refrigerating wait.

They'll only say wearily for the ten-thousanth time "all seats for Friday sold for the season, except the second balcony." Your only remedy is to hasten to a ticket agency—they may have a seat left, which they will part with for a consideration.

Moral—get to the steps early and bring a quarter in change with you if you want to get in sure.

Another frequent complaint among people in the line is that the doors might just as well open at 8 a m instead of 1:30 p m, and let people wait in the warm hall instead of on the icy steps.

A third objection against the management is that there is no way of telling when you arrive too late to get in whether you will be No. 504 or No. 506—the last but one in or the first shut out, and sometimes several hundred people are shut out, after waiting a considerable time, when the doors finally open, and are closed before you get to them.

Of course old stagers can tell you about where the danger line comes. But noses are not counted till the doors open, and if there is a chance of getting in, most people will wait on the chance.

"What prevents people from sneaking into line ahead of their proper place or hiring small boys to hold places for them?" the sceptical may wonder.

Nothing except a very efficient supervision provided by the Symphony Hall management, and the average man's sense of fairness. You lose your place and have to go to the foot of the line if you leave it even for a moment, and though people sometimes try to sneak in where they don't belong they are almost invariably detected by the eagle eye of the guard and ignominiously expelled. The stony glares and audible comments of the neighbors perhaps sharpen the vision of the men in charge when an intruder breaks in.

Sort of People in Line

Of these chronic grievances of the Symphony line two are futile. Whenever the doors opened, or seats were placed on sale, the law of supply and demand would produce some sort of waiting line as long as many more than the possible 505 persons often want to buy admission to Symphony concerts for a quarter.

But it does seem as though the line could be officially counted as it arrives instead of as it enters (or gets shut out).

What sort of people are in the line, anyhow? you wonder. Well, a rather representative cross section of middle class Boston. Millionaires are not there—though college girls, and even college men, clergy, teachers and other respectable and well-dressed people are in a majority.

Contrary to popular notions only a small minority of the line is made up of professional musicians and foreigners. Some of both are present—but most of the crowd is about what one sees in the Cambridge Subway between Central and Harvard sqs, or in the Brookline cars, upper middle class Americans.

The only remarkable thing about them is their willingness to endure physical discomfort for the sake of a chance to hear classical music, especially if played or sung by a great virtuoso or prima donna.

Three out of four in line are women, of course. Most men can't get Fridays off from the office to go to concerts, even if they wanted to.

One wonders, looking at the Symphony line, whether low-priced concerts by the Symphony Orchestra given in the evening, with strictly "classical" programs, wouldn't crowd Mechanics Hall? It seems too bad that great music should be a luxury, available only to those with the price of a season Symphony ticket to spare.

The applause that greets the classical music often played at the "Pops" shows that there is a large public waiting for inexpensive concerts of the best orchestral music here in Boston.

Dec. 20

According to Schmitt and the Russian Ballet

Their Salome of the Wondrous Train as She Was Figured in Paris to the Music Heard Yesterday at the Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

A GLANCE UPON MR. MONTEUX'S PROGRAMMES

Interesting Always, They Also Disclose Two Singularities — Balakirev's Tone-Poem, "Thamar," as Never Before to Bostonian Ears — The Contradictory Matter and Manner of Schmitt's "Salome"—Mr. Ornstein as Master of Touch and Tone with the Piano

SINCE Mr. Fiedler's dimming day no conductor at the Symphony Concerts has assembled such interesting programmes as thus far, has Mr. Monteux. He shuns the hackneyed pieces that it is conventional to label "thrice-familiar" and polite to salute as "ever-beautiful." He re-discovers and restores to the active repertory numbers long and inconsiderately overlooked. He wanders interestingly into by-paths of the classics, humanly perceiving that a diet of masterpieces may sometimes cloy. He is open-minded toward new music and usually happy in his choices from it. He holds the balance relatively even between ancient, modern and ultra-modern items, tipping it no more than the curious and interested, the young and the ardent, desire toward the composers of a recent or a present day. Catholic by inclination and practice, he chooses impartially among the French, the Germans, the Russian, the Szechs and the Americans, in good time, doubtless, minded to add the young Italians to them. Not one of his first ten programmes—for the course of the tenth is already known—has run in a rut; not one has been overladen; not one has failed to interest and stimulate most of his hearers.

So far, however, Mr. Monteux's programme-making has disclosed two singularities. For some reason, not easy to detect or surmise, he seems to shun overtures. Through ten pairs of concerts, he has played but one—Beethoven's to the pageant-play of "King Stephen"—unless there be also included the overture that was one of the chosen numbers from Beethoven's ballet of "Prometheus." Like most conductors schooled in the theatre and with a keen sense of effect upon their hearers, Mr. Monteux likes to end a concert with a highly colored, sharply rhythmed music. Many an overture might serve this purpose; yet but once, in "King Stephen," has he chosen such a piece. Few have noticed this singularity; still fewer, probably, have regretted it. Through the long days of Dr. Muck even into the brief days of Mr. Rabaud, classic and semi-classic overtures were repeated to excess at the Symphony Concerts, often for no other reason than convenience to the conductor in his programme-making. Mr. Monteux is too scrupulous, too ambitious, so to take the easiest way; while he is wise to put by these over-played overtures in relief alike to orchestra and to audience. The one played them often in routine; the other heard them mechanically.

The second singularity of the conductor's programmes is his inclination toward music of the dance. In eight pairs of concerts, he has played six such pieces; at a ninth he will add to them Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"; at a tenth, Debussy's little ballet of "Jeux." Leader for some years of the orchestra of Mr. Diaghilev's ballet, leader, thereafter, of the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House, Mr. Monteux succeeds well with such music, often visualizes it to himself and upon his hearers, displays no more than a natural fondness for it. Already, however, a few are beginning to demur to what they are pleased to call an excess of "dance-pieces" upon the conductor's lists; while, yesterday, in particular, they found serviceable text in a programme that, outside the pianist's concerto, traversed only Balakirev's tone-poem of "Thamar" and Schmitt's Suite from his mimodrama, "Salome's Tragedy," both intrinsically music to dance-rhythms. These mild grumblers forget, however, that nearly all this music of the dance is well-reputed and has proved interesting in performance; while one example of it—the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet of "The Fire-Bird" passes for a masterpiece of our time.

Doubtless, Balakirev worked at "Thamar" through the seventies without a surmise that thirty-odd years afterward other Russians would be dancing and miming to his symphonic poem in the hot reds of Bakst's setting of a topless tower. As little may the composer have anticipated that French, English, American audiences would some day be listening to his music and, least of all, that many a hearer's background for it would be the visualized action of Mr. Diaghilev's and Mr. Fokine's stage. Even so by far the larger part of "Thamar," as symphonic poem, is music in dance-rhythms — the music of feast and fete to which the Caucasian queen—cruel, lustful, perverted—bids her way-faring and fated lovers of a night. These dances, sharp with oriental rhythms, pungent with oriental harmonies, tingling with oriental iterations, keenly imagined, vividly accomplished, gave shape and color to the music of revelling, penetrate the hearer with illusion, are graphic background alike to the erotic or the fateful measures that once and again still and over-pass them. The tone-poem is not least music of sharply invoking and highly delineative imagination, when it stirs into being as out of mysterious mists, reiterates the fume and rumble of the wild river, upreara Thamar's sombre abode, confused though that be, inevitably, inextricably, with Bakst's red tower unforgettable. Balakirev diminishes not a whit as composer of imagination in the final periods of the doom of the slain lovers, of the reawakening of Thamar's trapping desires, of the ceaseless obbligato of the rushing stream.

Yet intrinsically both the prelude and postlude are mimodrama expressed in tones, while all between is mimodrama expressed in the dance. As such a music, Mr. Monteux played the piece, as though background, action, drama and all within of passion and of fate were unrolling themselves upon an imaginary but visioned stage, as though he would lift the curtain likewise to his hearers. Seldom in two months of Symphony Concerts has he seemed so sensitive to musical line, alert and supple to rhythm, apt in harmonic and instrumental color, just and fine of ear, at once both clear and forceful. What he was fain to do with the inferior orchestra of the Russian Ballet, he could now accomplish with the superior orchestra ready to his hand, ear and imagination. Never before has Balakirev's music sounded with such illusion upon Bostonian ears. The Higginsonion arbiter of the quality of the concerts might well be content with such a performance.

Evidently Schmitt's music of "Salome's Tragedy" baffled the audience. Not in years has a piece at the Symphony Concerts, at beginning, middle or end of a programme, been so meagrely applauded. Until, indeed Mr. Monteux left his place, many a listener hardly knew whether the mimodrama was, or was not, concluded. A few hands clapped perfunctorily, then persistently, until they had recalled the conductor—slender reward for the devoted and fruitful pains he had spent upon the performance, almost supercilious negation of his obvious admiration for the music. Yet, like so many of Schmitt's pieces, as Boston has heard them, this Suite of the theatre somehow failed to come completely off. On frequent occasions in the past, shortcomings of performance have obviously brought such fate upon him. It is still possible to recall good old Dr. Mees and the groping, thin-voiced self-conscious choir of The Cecilia messing timidly about in the barbaric intensities of Schmitt's music, to the forty-sixth Psalm, of Israel's fierce and pagan triumph. Fresher still in memory is le bonhomme Rabaud plodding dutifully, laboriously, through the "Open-Air" pieces of last spring. Nor are sundry performances in this town of the ironic "Viennese Rhapsody" or of the moody and salient "Songs for Four Voices" to be remembered for revelation and edification. No; only with this Suite from 'Salome's Tragedy" has Schmitt come to true, revealing and enhancing voice in our concert-rooms. Six years ago Dr. Muck was eloquent with it yesterday, Mr. Monteux kept pace with him. Yet again only confused impression and clouded illusion remained.

Possibly there is clew to this double outcome in the two-fold Schmitt that seems to play through much of his music as hereabouts we have come to know it. There is a Schmitt who develops motives with fertility into significance, who directs rhythm, modulation, pace, emphasis to illusory ends who arrests the ear and stirs the imagination with his play of harmonies—a Schmitt who uses all these means to compass atmosphere and suggestion, frequently to gain power, occasionally to summon beauty. This Schmitt wrote more than half of the music to 'Salome's Tragedy"—music that evokes the ominous scene by the Dead Sea the baleful lights and winds, the menacing blackness of the stifling night. Music, again, that flutters and flickers with the jewels that drop from the hand of Herodias or that gleams with the white young flesh of Salome glimpsed athwart the dark. Music, once more, that pierces with the insidious longings the perverse fascinations of the princess; music that the lusts of Herod may as quickly sear. By so much this "Tragedy of Salome" is the most artful, the most moving music yet borne hither from the composer's hand.

In contrast another Schmitt, almost seems to have written the final diversions of the mimodrama, when once the balefully echoing, chanting voices of old sins have died across the Dead Sea, when storms of the skies and of the passions break upon the terrace, when Salome dances the dance of the lightnings and of fear. Then does the music become rude-voiced, coarse-fibred, crass, strident, a sound and fury signifying little but the impotence of the composer to find and measure his means, to achieve his ends. Din is seldom illusion, no matter how twenty conventional resources of music may swell it; and din and little else are many a page toward the end of "Salome's Tragedy." Where mimodrama and music should rise highest in horrific suggestion, they fall lowest. The impotence of this end blots out the puissance of the beginning. But was not Salome ever a riddle when once the nineteenth century from Heine to Wilde had called into exotic, erotic, perverted and fantasmal being the child-like daughter of Herodias whom the Evangelists almost ignored, but whose rempacant—pure or impure work of literary and pictorial imagination—the fond fanatics solemnly and sillily believe to be Biblical!

Between the animated exercises of these two interesting ladies and the composers who so signally served them, Mr. Ornstein, new but deserving comer to the Symphony Concerts, played the piano part in the second of MacDowell's youthful and displayful Concertos. He played it first of all, as rare master of touch and tone. Hardly Mr. Hoffman himself can summon a brighter, a more pellucid beauty into the voice of the piano than Mr. Ornstein shed upon the lighter measures. As near to Mr. Hoffman is he in the shadowed beauty that he outpoured, but also chastened, upon the darker, slower-paced, more songful periods. Appropriate loveliness of tone, at once so limpid, edgeless, freely moving, delicately or deeply textured, might, with the piano, hardly further go. Akin were Mr. Ornstein's light fleetness, like to a motion of the air; his darts of rhythm in the intermediate rondo flashing like quick, keen rays through the music; the rounded voice of his song, when MacDowell condescended to it in a music designed for brilliance and effect; the cumulating pace, propulsive and plastic that he lent to the final movement.

If intent listening and eager applause were tokens of understanding and appreciation, the audience knew that it was hearing a pianist who is signal and sensitive master of tone, who can transfigure into bright beauty, into lightly running power the resources of the piano, who can compass these things not only with ease and elegance but with a nervous and imparting grace of the imagination. In spite of symmetry of outline, diversity of contents and supple progress from voice to voice and mood to mood, this Concerto in D minor now sounds only as a slender-bodied, charmingly fancied, brightly adorned music. There is no more for pianist to do than play it with Mr. Ornstein's just understanding, intuitive sympathy and guiding taste and then summon Mr. Ornstein's beauties and felicities of touch and tone, rhythm and modulation— if he can.

H. T. PARKER

Items and Announcements

Not too pressingly, yet pressingly enough, the public of the Symphony Concerts may be reminded that next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will begin with Balakirev's tone-poem, "Thamar"; that the piece runs without pause through twenty-two minutes—time more pleasantly spent in the hall than in the corridors.

It is the best of news that Mr. Casals, eminent violoncellist and remarkable musician, too seldom heard hereabouts, will revisit Boston on Thursday evening, Jan. 22, to give a concert of his own in Symphony Hall for the increase of a fund to be spent at Radcliffe College. High as are the deserts of that fund, pleasure from Mr. Casals will run yet higher. As the audience at Mr. Bauer's and Mr. Thibaud's concert of Sonatas by Beethoven lately proved, there is still a finely musical public in Boston. Mr. Casals's recital affords it another worthy occasion.

Mr. Heinrich Warnke, long the first violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra in the Higginsonian days, no less liked as man than he was applauded as musician, is now playing in the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House, which is the gainer by his presence. He was dismissed from the Boston orchestra in the rampant autumn of 1918 because he happened to be a German subject, yet his course and conversation during the war were blameless—unlike those of certain present members of the band who, by the saving grace of naturalization, kept their places. There were dismissals in that hysterical time that the trustees ought to remember with blushes.

Trans. Dec 17(?)

Transcript Dec 20

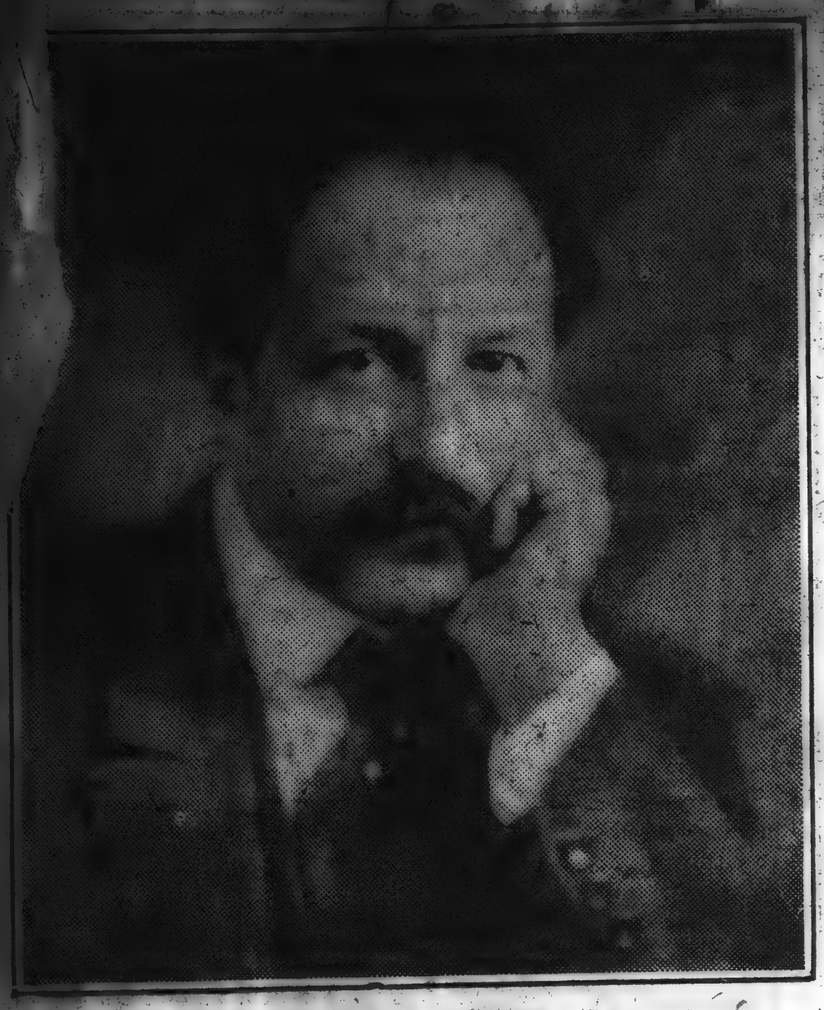
MONTEUX GIVES FINE READING OF "THAMAR"

A notable program and a notable soloist featured the concert of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon, its first after a long midwinter trip. Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," MacDowell's second concerto, with Leo Ornstein as soloist, and Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome" suite were the offerings. Brilliant as was Mr. Monteux's reading of the Balakireff and Schmitt selections, it was evident the numbers are for the theatre rather than the concert hall. One misses the acting.

Mr. Ornstein's playing of the concerto left nothing to be desired. It was the conservative pianist rather than the sensational, and all the more satisfying for that reason.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE HARTFORD DAILY COURANT:



PIERRE MONTEUX

New Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert in Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 12th, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who has already this season made a marked impression of his eminant powers by the marvelously perfect performances which he has elicited from the renowned body of musicians, which has never before assembled such an illustrious personnel at one time. Long famous as conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, our public first came to know and admire his great abilities. He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, but was unable to obtain his release from existing duties except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of this orchestra in several cities with conspicuous success. The season over, he was quickly secured as its regular conductor.

In the matter of attendance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played to packed audiences in the number of cities where it has appeared this season, confirming the general verdict that the orchestra is enjoying the highest artistic successes of its history.

"Mr. Monteux is at endless pains with the voices of the orchestra," wrote H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript, "until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in years. The wood wind choir is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? With return to old standards comes back old prestige."

Providence News Dec 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD TO INFANTRY HALL

The second concert in the winter series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall last night with Sophie Braslau as the soloist. The programme:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6. "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
Allegro con grazia.
Allegro molto vivace.
Finale; Adagio lamentoso.
Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the opera "Semiramide."
Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.
Moussorgsky—Songs with orchestra.
Serenade of Death.
The Banks of the Don.
On the River Dnyeper.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Miss Braslau, contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, made her first appearance in Providence last evening, and it may be said of the large audience that it was properly appreciative. Miss Braslau has a pleasing voice of remarkable timbre and color, and her singing of Rossini's "Ah! Quel giorno," her first number, was better than her pieces with the orchestra later on the programme.

In direct contrast with the mood of the first song, Miss Braslau sang three Moussorgsky songs, with the orchestra. The dominance of her voice over the orchestra except in the loudest passages was reminiscent, although in a different way, of Caruso's dominance of the chorus in "Il Pagliacci." It has been the privilege of the writer to hear Miss Braslau in better selected programmes than hers of last evening and it is certain that she will be welcome in this city again.

M. Monteaux is to be congratulated on his selections for last night's concert. His opening number, the "Pathetic" in B-minor from Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, was one of the most impressive orchestral works ever heard in this city, and Mr. Monteaux gave it a reading that mounted to the sublime at times. It is a work of divine melancholia that left the deepest of impressions on the audience.

The Beethoven Ballet is sufficiently well known to all lovers of music to need no comment. Its descriptive measures were beautifully done by that seldom used solo instrument, the cello. The Wagner "Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristran and Isolde" are always delightful, and M. Monteaux's interpretation left nothing to be desired.

MANY PRESENT AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Renders Pleasing Program Here Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last evening in its second concert of this season's series. Mme. Sophie Breslau, the highly-gifted young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the soloist. An audience was present that practically filled the hall. It was the second appearance in Providence also of Monsieur Pierre Monteux the orchestra's new conductor and the excellent impression he made last month was but deepened, his reading of the Tschaikowsky Symphony being comparable to that of any previous conductor here.

The program follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6 "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74; Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the opera "Semiramide" Rossini; Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, Beethoven; songs with orchestra, "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don," "On the River Dnyeper," Moussorgsky; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

There is reason to believe that Peter Ivan Tschaikowsky deemed the famous symphony in B-minor his master work. It was completed but a little time before his death and received its first performance in Petrograd in 1893. He is said to have applied the designation "Pathetic" at the suggestion of his wife. However that may be, the symphony contains enough of that element to amply justify the characterization.

It runs, in fact, the entire gamut of emotion, from the heights of joy to the depths of gloom and the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," is fairly soul searching in its pathos and sadness.

Many interpretations have been put upon this work by critics but the concensus of opinion is that the master endeavored to portray in terms of music life itself as it appeared to him, the point of view being, of course, that of the intense artist as well as the typical Russian.

M. Monteux's fine reading held throughout due regard for the extreme emotionalism of the symphony. The tenderness and grace of the second movement were interpreted with beautiful effect while the grandeur of the third was revealed in the full measure of its impressiveness.

Beethoven's ballet music from "The Creatures of Prometheus" is an unusual addition to a symphony program. The composer gave little of that kind of music to prosterity, but that little bears the mark of the incomparable master.

This particular ballet has an ineffable sweetness, a sort of airy charm that makes it a welcome part of any program. Mr. Bedetti, in the important 'cello part, played with fine feeling, as did also Mr. Laurent, flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp. The [illegible] orchestral number was the familiar "Prelude and Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." It is too well known to need comment or description, save to add that its perennial charm was revealed to the utmost under Mr. Monteux. Perhaps, in this connection, the cleverness of the conductor in program making may be noted. In this concert there were selections from the Russian, German and Italian, with no prejudice as to the origin of the music and it was indeed good to hear the majestic beauty of Wagner once more.

Mme. Sophie Breslau, the contralto, gave two songs, or rather one song, and a group, in a most delightful manner. Madame Breslau has a very deep, full and dramatic contralto, and a voice withal of a most unusual type. It lends itself especially well to songs of the "Semihamide" variety as well as to intense racial ballads like the sombre "Cossack Song of Hate" and "The River Dnyeper."

And in another of the Moussorgsky group—"The Serenade of Death"—the rendition in a low restrained tone was most effective. The singer was given a very enthusiastic reception, particularly after the dramatic "Semiramide" number.

Clipped from the PITTSBURG DISPATCH Date DEC 9 - 1919

Musical Excursion Furnished by Boston Orchestra Is Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth Ellis concert before a full house in Carnegie Music Hall last night, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The publication of the program for this concert produced among the musicians of the city a thrill of intense satisfaction. Out of material practically unfamiliar to us a master hand had selected only four compositions, all major works to be sure, but of such astounding variety, and of a superlativeness guaranteed by such names as Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, that the interest of all wide-awakes was kindled. We were to embark on an excursion that, at any rate, would lead us far from "the alley of chestnuts."

M Monteux as a conductor is far from sensational, in fact he gives the impression of a Gaul refined but somewhat repressed. However, his beat is decisive and his orchestra speaks for him, which after all is "the" way, for his effects in toto are undeniably superb.

The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," aroused much speculation as to what a Chausson, to us chiefly made manifest heretofore as a writer of exquisite lyrics, chamber pieces, and symphonic poems, would have to say in a larger form. Now we know, thanks to M Monteux, and we have heard Chausson give utterance in a broader way to his wealth of thronging musical ideas. While not entirely devoid of gaiety the whole symphony is of sombre tone, the first movement massive and austere, relieved and awakened at the magic touch of the harp to an "allegro vivo" of haunting charm. The harp seemed to inspire Chausson (Saul-like) to a train of more cheerful thought. The second movement recalled thematically, time and time again, the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky. Interestingly worked out in his own way, the same ideas had presented themselves to Chausson, with a result in atmosphere quite similar. The third movement contains brilliant scoring for the strings, and an episode of striking beauty for the brass, in which a trumpet solo, done with remarkable purity of tone, arrested the attention. Many lovely melodies are developed in this symphony.

Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" is a startlingly realistic tonal narrative based on a Burger ballad. Bells are used with much effectiveness, and a climax of terrific intensity is attained. The Balakireff symphonic poem "Thamar" is typically Eastern, full of unique figures, complex rhythms and ingenious variations. A melody familiarized to us through the "Scheherazade" suite is cleverly treated, and the work is brought to an impressive close, sustained and dignified. A very fine performance of Liszt's ever new "Les Preludes" brought to an end one of the finest symphonic programs Pittsburg has ever heard. C E M

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Hartford Times Sat Dec 20

Famous Orchestra Will Play at Parson's Theater on Monday, January 12.

When the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra gives a concert in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 12th, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteux, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Parsons's, January 12.

MONTEUX,

the new conductor, who has already this season made a marked impression of his eminent powers by the marvelously perfect performances which he has elicited from the renowned body of musicians, which has never before assembled such an illustrious personnel at one time. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York, our public first [illegible] to know and admire his great [illegible]ties. He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra [illegible] season, but was unable to obtain [illegible] from existing duties except [illegible] period, when he conducted [illegible] concerts of this orchestra [illegible]s with conspicuous success. The season over, he was quickly

In the matter of attendance, the Boston Symphony orchestra has played to packed audiences in the number of cities where it has appeared this season confirming the general verdict that the orchestra is enjoying the highest artistic successes of its history.

"Mr. Monteux is at endless pains with the voices of the orchestra," wrote H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript, "until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in years. The wood wind choir is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? With return to old standards comes back old prestige."

Hartford Post Sat Dec 20

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Leader

SYMPHONY AT PARSONS JAN. 12

Pierre Monteux, Noted Conductor, Heads Boston

At a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Parsons Theatre on Monday evening, January 12, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor, who has already this season excited a widespread recognition of his eminent powers by the marvelously perfect performances he has elicited from the famous body of musicians.

Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolis Opera House, the public came to know and admire his great abilities.

He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, but was unable to obtain his release except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of this orchestra in several cities. The season over, he was quickly secured as its regular conductor.

Since the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been notably changed this year only in the 'cello and viola sections, and since these, while formerly of extremely high excellence, have actually been improved upon, perhaps the orchestra, one hundred strong, has never before assembled such an illustrious body of musicians at one time.

H. T. Parker has written in the Boston Transcript: "The individual musicians matchlessly disclose new virtue or affirm old. The wood wind choir of the Orchestra is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The Orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony Concerts have returned to the old standards and brought with them the old prestige." In confirmation of this verdict, the orchestra has played virtually all of its [illegible] concerts this season to packed audiences.

It Pays to Advertise

Prov Evening Tribune Dec 18th 1919

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City
Date DEC 20 19

The Conning Tower

Speaking of war taxes on celestial instruments, Mr. A. Holy, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays the [illegible]

From ENQUIRER, DEC 21
Cincinnati, Ohio

* * *

Remember the name Charles T. Griffes, if you chance to see it printed on a concert program. Here is an American composer who has the melodic gift. His tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a gem, rich in imagination and instrumentation.

Cleveland, Ohio

Remember the name Charles T. Griffes, if you chance to see it printed on a concert program. Here is an American composer who has the melodic gift. His tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a

From [illegible] DEC 30 19
Leader
News
Cleveland, Ohio

Boston Symphony at Armory Dec. 9

The Boston Symphony concert the last of the Ellis series under the management of Mrs. Franklyn B. Sanders, will take place at Grays armory Tuesday evening, December 9. The orchestra under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, has created little less than a sensation in its own city. "Never," say the devotees of music, "has the orchestra played so beautifully."

Mr. Monteux, long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as conductor in Paris, where he instituted the renowned "Concerts Monteux," first came to the United States as the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House he became known and appreciated by our public which has already accorded him a high position in its esteem.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE HARTFORD DAILY COURANT:

PIERRE MONTEUX

New Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a concert in Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 12th, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteux, the new conductor, who has already this season made a marked impression of his eminent powers by the marvelously perfect performances which he has elicited from the renowned body of musicians, which has never before assembled such an illustrious personnel at one time. Long famous as conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, our public first came to know and admire his great abilities. He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, but was unable to obtain his release from existing duties except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of this orchestra in several cities with conspicuous success. The season over, he was quickly secured as its regular conductor.

In the matter of attendance, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played to packed audiences in the number of cities where it has appeared this season, confirming the general verdict that the orchestra is enjoying the highest artistic successes of its history.

"Mr. Monteux is at endless pains with the voices of the orchestra," wrote H T. Parker in the Boston Transcript, "until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in years. The wood wind choir is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? With return to old standards comes back old prestige."

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Hartford Times Sat Dec 20

Famous Orchestra Will Play at Parson's Theater on Monday, January 12.

When the world famous Boston Symphony orchestra gives a concert in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 12th, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteux,

MONTEUX,

conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Parsons's, January 12.

the new conductor, who has already this season made a marked impression of his eminent powers by the marvelously perfect performances which he has elicited from the renowned body of musicians, which has never before assembled such an illustrious personnel at one time. Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York, our public first came to know and admire his great abilities. He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra last season, but was unable to obtain his release from existing duties except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of this orchestra in several cities with conspicuous success. The season over, he was quickly secured as its regular conductor.

In the matter of attendance, the Boston Symphony orchestra has played to packed audiences in the number of cities where it has appeared this season confirming the general verdict that the orchestra is enjoying the highest artistic successes of its history.

"Mr. Monteux is at endless pains with the voices of the orchestra," wrote H. T. Parker in the Boston Transcript, "until they give him back the quality of tone, the animating accent that he asks. Individually not a few of those voices are the best that the orchestra has known in years. The wood wind choir is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? With return to old standards comes back old prestige."

Hartford Post Sat Dec 20

Pierre Monteux, Boston Symphony Leader

SYMPHONY AT PARSONS JAN. 12

Pierre Monteux, Noted Conductor, Heads Boston

Providence News Dec 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT DRAWS BIG CROWD TO INFANTRY HALL

The second concert in the winter series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Infantry Hall last night with Sophie Braslau as the soloist.

The programme:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6. "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74.
- Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
- Allegro con grazia.
- Allegro molto vivace.
- Finale; Adagio lamentoso.

Rossini—Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the opera "Semiramide."

Beethoven—Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43.

Moussorgsky—Songs with orchestra.
- Serenade of Death.
- The Banks of the Don.
- On the River Dnyeper.

Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Miss Braslau, contralto with the Metropolitan Opera Company, made her first appearance in Providence last evening, and it may be said of the large audience that it was properly appreciative. Miss Braslau has a pleasing voice of remarkable timbre and color, and her singing of Rossini's "Ah! Quel giorno," her first number, was better than her pieces with the orchestra later on the programme.

In direct contrast with the mood of the first song, Miss Braslau sang three Moussorgsky songs, with the orchestra. The dominance of her voice over the orchestra except in the loudest passages was reminiscent, although in a different way, of Caruso's dominance of the chorus in "Il Pagliacci." It has been the privilege of the writer to hear Miss Braslau in better selected programmes than hers of last evening, and it is certain that she will be welcome in this city again.

M. Monteaux is to be congratulated on his selections for last night's concert. His opening number, the "Pathetic" in B-minor from Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, was one of the most impressive orchestral works ever heard in this city, and Mr. Monteaux gave it a reading that mounted to the sublime at times. It is a work of divine melancholia that left the deepest of impressions on the audience.

The Beethoven Ballet is sufficiently well known to all lovers of music to need no comment. Its descriptive measures were beautifully done, that seldom used solo instrument the cello. The Wagner "Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristran and Isolde" are always delightful, and M. Monteaux's interpretation left nothing to be desired.

At a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Parsons Theatre on Monday evening, January 12, Hartford will have the opportunity of hearing Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor, who has already this season excited a widespread recognition of his eminent powers by the marvelously perfect performances he has elicited from the famous body of musicians.

Long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as a symphonic conductor in Paris, where he instituted his renowned "Concerts Monteux," this celebrity first came to the United States at the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity, and as French conductor at the Metropolis Opera House, the public came to know and admire his great abilities.

He was offered the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last season, but was unable to obtain his release except for a brief period, when he conducted the opening concerts of this orchestra in several cities. The season over, he was quickly secured as its regular conductor.

Since the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been notably changed this year only in the 'cello and viola sections, and since these, while formerly of extremely high excellence, have actually been improved upon, perhaps the orchestra, one hundred strong, has never before assembled such an illustrious body of musicians at one time.

H. T. Parker has written in the Boston Transcript: "The individual musicians matchlessly disclose new virtue or affirm old. The wood wind choir of the Orchestra is a little company of masters. The string choir advances in brightness, richness, plasticity of tone. Sundry changes have bettered the brass. The Orchestra is again an instrument to stir a conductor's ambition, an audience's pride. And the outcome? The Symphony Concerts have returned to the old standards and brought with them the old prestige." In confirmation of this verdict, the orchestra has played virtually all of its thirty-five concerts this season to packed audiences.

MANY PRESENT AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Renders Pleasing Program Here Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared at Infantry Hall last evening in its second concert of this season's series. Mme. Sophie Breslau, the highly-gifted young contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company was the soloist. An audience was present that practically filled the hall. It was the second appearance in Providence also of Monsieur Pierre Monteux, the orchestra's new conductor and the excellent impression he made last month was but deepened, his reading of the Tschaikowsky Symphony being comparable to that of any previous conductor here.

The program follows: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6 "Pathetic," in B-minor, Op. 74; Air, "Ah! Quel giorno," from the opera "Semiramide" Rossini; Ballet No. 5, Adagio, from "The Creatures of Prometheus," Ballet, Op. 43, Beethoven; songs with orchestra, "Serenade of Death," "The Banks of the Don," "On the River Dnyeper," Moussorgsky; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner.

There is reason to believe that Peter Ivan Tschaikowsky deemed the famous symphony in B-minor his master work. It was completed but a little time before his death and received its first performance in Petrograd in 1893. He is said to have applied the designation "Pathetic" at the suggestion of his wife. However that may be, the symphony contains enough of that element to amply justify the characterization.

It runs, in fact, the entire gamut of emotion, from the heights of joy to the depths of gloom and the finale, "Adagio lamentoso," is fairly soul searching in its pathos and sadness.

Many interpretations have been put upon this work by critics but the concensus of opinion is that the master endeavored to portray in terms of music life itself as it appeared to him, the point of view being, of course, that of the intense artist as well as the typical Russian.

M. Monteux's fine reading held throughout due regard for the extreme emotionalism of the symphony. The tenderness and grace of the second movement were interpreted with beautiful effect while the grandeur of the third was revealed in the full measure of its impressiveness.

Beethoven's ballet music from "The Creatures of Prometheus" is an unusual addition to a symphony program. The composer gave little of that kind of music to prosterity, but that little bears the mark of the incomparable master.

This particular ballet has an ineffable sweetness, a sort of airy charm that makes it a welcome part of any program. Mr. Bedetti, in the important 'cello part, played with fine feeling, as did also Mr. [illegible] flute; Mr. Sand, clarinet; Mr. Laus, bassoon, and Mr. Holy, harp. The [illegible] musical number was the familiar "Prelude and Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." It is too well known to need comment or description, save to add that its perennial charm was revealed to the utmost under Mr. Monteux. Perhaps, in this connection, the cleverness of the conductor in program making may be noted. In this concert there were selections from the Russian, German and Italian, with no prejudice as to the origin of the music and it was indeed good to hear the majestic beauty of Wagner once more.

Mme. Sophie Breslau, the contralto, gave two songs, or rather one song, and a group, in a most delightful manner. Madame Breslau has a very deep, full and dramatic contralto, and a voice withal of a most unusual type. It lends itself especially well to songs of the "Semihamide" variety as well as to in[illegible] "Cossack Song of Hate" and "The River Dnyeper."

And in another of the Moussorgsky group—"The Serenade of Death"—the rendition in a low restrained tone was most effective. The singer was given a very enthusiastic reception, particularly after the dramatic "Semiramide" number.

It Pays to Advertise

Prov Evening Tribune Dec 18th 1919

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City

Date DEC 20 19

The Conning Tower

Speaking of war taxes on celestial instruments, Mr. A. Holy, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plays the

From ENQUIRER, DEC 21 19

Cincinnati, Ohio

* * *

Remember the name Charles T. Griffes, if you chance to see it printed on a concert program. Here is an American composer who has the melodic gift. His tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a gem, rich in imagination and instrumentation.

Cleveland, Ohio

Remember the name Charles T. Griffes, if you chance to see it printed on a concert program. Here is an American composer who has the melodic gift. His tone poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," introduced here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a gem, rich in imagination and instrumentation.

Clipped from the PITTSBURG DISPATCH

Date DEC 8 - 1919

Musical Excursion Furnished by Boston Orchestra Is Superb

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth Ellis concert before a full house in Carnegie Music Hall last night, Pierre Monteux conducting.

The publication of the program for this concert produced among the musicians of the city a thrill of intense satisfaction. Out of material practically unfamiliar to us a master hand had selected only four compositions, all major works to be sure, but of such astounding variety, and of a superlativeness guaranteed by such names as Chausson, Franck, Balakireff and Liszt, that the interest of all wide-awakes was kindled. We were to embark on an excursion that, at any rate, would lead us far from "the alley of chestnuts."

M Monteux as a conductor is far from sensational, in fact he gives the impression of a Gaul refined but somewhat repressed. However, his beat is decisive and his orchestra speaks for him, which after all is "the" way, for his effects in toto are undeniably superb.

The Chausson "Symphony in B flat Major, Opus 20," aroused much speculation as to what a Chausson, to us chiefly made manifest heretofore as a writer of exquisite lyrics, chamber pieces, and symphonic poems, would have to say in a larger form. Now we know, thanks to M Monteux, and we have heard Chausson give utterance in a broader way to his wealth of thronging musical ideas. While not entirely devoid of gaiety the whole symphony is of sombre tone, the first movement massive and austere, relieved and awakened at the magic touch of the harp to an "allegro vivo" of haunting charm. The harp seemed to inspire Chausson (Saul-like) to a train of more cheerful thought. The second movement recalled thematically, time and time again, the Sixth Symphony of Tschaikowsky. Interestingly worked out in his own way, the same ideas had presented themselves to Chausson, with a result in atmosphere quite similar. The third movement contains brilliant scoring for the strings, and an episode of striking beauty for the brass, in which a trumpet solo, done with remarkable purity of tone, arrested the attention. Many lovely melodies are developed in this symphony.

Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" is a startlingly realistic tonal narrative based on a Burger ballad. Bells are used with much effectiveness, and a climax of terrific intensity is attained. The Balakireff symphonic poem "Thamar" is typically Eastern, full of unique figures, complex rhythms and ingenious variations. A melody familiarized to us through the "Scheherazade" suite is cleverly treated, and the work is brought to an impressive close, sustained and dignified. A very fine performance of Liszt's ever new "Les Preludes" brought to an end one of the finest symphonic programs Pittsburg has ever heard.

C E M

From News Cleveland, Ohio

Boston Symphony at Armory Dec. 9

The Boston Symphony concert, the last of the Ellis series under the management of Mrs. Franklyn B. Sanders, will take place at Grays armory Tuesday evening, December 9. The orchestra under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, has created little less than a sensation in its own city. "Never," say the devotees of music, "has the orchestra played so beautifully."

Mr. Monteux, long famous as a conductor of opera and ballet throughout Europe, and further as conductor in Paris, where he instituted the renowned "Concerts Monteux," first came to the United States as the head of the Russian Ballet in 1916, in which capacity and as French conductor at the Metropolitan Opera House he became known and appreciated by our public, which has already accorded him a high position in its esteem.

* * *

Mon. Dec. 22

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MR. ORNSTEIN JUSTIFIES HIMSELF AND A POLICY

His Promise as Pianist Fulfilled and Youth in Deserved Place at the Symphony Concerts—The Annual Christmas Rite of "The Messiah" Duly Accomplished—Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin" in Prospect—Mme. Frijsh and Notable Songs from Musorgsky—Mr. Thibaud and a Rarely Played Piece

ON more scores than one, it was pleasure to see Mr. Ornstein sitting gravely at the piano on the stage of Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, and to hear the public of the Symphony Concerts applauding warmly his playing of MacDowell's Concerto in D-minor—a piece nowadays more displaying the pianist than the composer. By all means a searching and exemplary standard should determine the coming of an "assisting artist" to the Symphony Orchestra at home. The invitation should be kept, as it has long been, a signal honor, smirched only when some protégé was forced unworthily into the concerts and immediately and coldly discovered as such by a practised audience. In double fashion, however, should that standard be applied. It should measure the best of the youthful talents in our concert-rooms and the best of the matured abilities. When both have been sifted, then both should be summoned to Symphony Hall. In the final years of the Higginsonian régime, far too many of the "soloists" were "old stagers" from whom the listeners knew precisely what to expect in personality and performance. Fortunate in those days was the youngster for whom the door was set ajar. Able and interesting as he usually proved himself, it was hard not to believe that he was somebody's protégé. Wisely the new management has sought deserving youth for "soloists," as in other respects it has transfused new blood and young blood into the Symphony Concerts. Last season, for example, it called Mr. Heifetz and Mr. Levitzi; while this season it has already brought Mr. Spalding and Mr. Ornstein. To all four the audiences have returned long and loud applause. Clearly no wish have they, for the most part, that the Symphony Concerts become a "closed shop"—either on the stage or in the auditorium—for the elderly.

The pleasure of Mr. Ornstein's presence and playing ran the higher because a few years ago, "the safe and sane," who are quite as numerous as they should be in the public of Symphony Hall, counted him no more than a passing "freak." In those days, Mr. Ornstein undertook recitals of his own in Boston and divided the programmes between pieces by the ultra-moderns and pieces by himself. His Schönberg and Scott, his Ravel and Korngold were interesting to hear. So, also, however strange, were his owr numbers. Mr. Ornstein was then barely out of his teens in them he had written much music in which he had expressed mood, picture, emotion, impression, the piano, himself, vehemently, outlandishly, extravagantly, but always sincerely, and, as some of us chose to believe, often with imagination, range and individuality, and never with the prudence and the predilections of mediocrity. Moreover, the quality of Mr. Ornstein's ultra-moderns and his own quality as composer were one thing, while the merit and the promise of his playing were quite another. Few who heard him in Boston in the winter of 1915-16, if they had open ears to hear and open minds to judge could have doubted that he was a pianist even then in rare command of touch and tone, versed in his instrument, sensitive and imaginative with it, as responsive and resourceful with the music in hand. In four short years, he has ripened and deepened his finer instincts, traits, abilities. It was a distinguished pianist in many an attribute that the audience of Friday and Saturday heard and applauded. Mr. Ornstein might well have waved away the nervousness that plainly beset him. For in the ears of all who heard, his promise stood unmistakably fulfilled.

Programmes in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Jan. 2 and Saturday, Jan. 3, when happily there is no "assisting artist," Mr. Monteux has put on the programme two novel pieces—the one, Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," heard once in Boston, but hitherto unplayed by the Symphony Orchestra; and the other, Debussy's ballet, "Jeux," unknown alike to American theatres and American concert-halls. "Stenka Razin"—the name of a fine old Cossack brigand—stands among Glazunov's earlier and pictorial pieces when he took more thought of Russian folk-song and folk-tale than of classic German example and modern German reputation. The music recounts the death of the pirate, even though he resigns his fair Persian mistress to the Volga, typified through the tone-poem by the celebrated song ("Ay-Ouchem") of the laboring boatmen. Few who have heard that folk-tune of toil and moil ever forget it. "Jeux" is the mimed episode that Nijinsky, Debussy and Bakst devised in 1911 or 1912 for Mr. Diaghilev's Russian ballet. The action passes in a garden whither a youth and two maidens have chased a lost tennis ball. They speedily forgot the object of their search in amorous play in and out of the shrubbery, in which the boy makes merry with the jealousies of the girls. A second ball falls into the garden, reminds the youthful amorists that they may be watched—and off they fly. Heard by itself apart from the somewhat stilted miming that [illegible] the music charms.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux to Resurrect Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—A Concert by Mr. Havens—The Soviets and Isadora—"The Foremost Orchestra in Europe"

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 2 and 3, Mr. Monteux announces a veritable feat of resurrection. There and then he purposes to play Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—music that the composer was unwilling to publish because he liked it a little; music that has not been heard in Boston for thirty-three years; music finally that nowadays is scarcely heard anywhere—no, not even in darkest England. Yet there is a Mendelssohn—say of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and of sundry overtures—who is perennially fresh and interesting.

Recent visitors to Germany and Austria agree that the quality of the orchestra at the opera house in Dresden and of the Philharmonic Society in Vienna declined much during the later years of the war. Both lost many expert musicians; while the ranks of young and promising players were grievously depleted by death in the field. With the decline of these two bands, the Swiss reviewers write, the Gebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, has become the foremost orchestra in Europe. Perhaps this is the moment to recall that when the trustees of the Boston Orchestra asked Mr. Rabaud last winter whom they should seek in Europe as conductor, he replied: "Either Toscanini or Mengelberg."

Evening Star - Ocken
Dec. 15th 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ARMORY

Superiority of Organization is Again Demonstrated Under the Baton of Pierre Monteux.

One of the events which mark the annual ebb tide in things musical was presented by Ben Franklin at the Armory Saturday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared. A large audience was in attendance and in many ways it was a remarkable one. It was an audience composed almost exclusively of musical zealots, if that usually offensive word may be used to describe the superlative form of attention—adoration even—with which the efforts of the great body of musicians was drunk in.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again demonstrated its vast superiority over other any other existing organization of its kind. Under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra has lost nothing and gained much. With a minimum of visible effort, this conductor procures a maximum in musicianly results.

Detailed description of the program and the profound sensations which stirred the audience with its presentation is beyond the power of printer's ink to transmit. The program opened with the complete interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony in D Major, No. 2. It cannot be described. Others have tried and failed. The orchestra spread it before an enthralled audience with matchless brilliancy and, as was the case with the rest of the program also, it was demonstrated that the organization stands alone as the most perfectly co-ordinated musical machine made up of human units that has ever been banded together for his purpose.

The playing of Balakireff's "Thamar," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were only repeated demonstrations of the marvelous ability of the individual members of the orchestra working as a united whole to present the masterpieces in a manner as nearly approaching perfection as human beings can ever hope to attain.

The orchestra refused all demands for encores and, as usual, the audience was compelled to wend its way homeward with its musical desires unsatiated.

The program afforded little opportunity for individual features. It was only by close discernment that very incidental prominence could be accorded any particular member. And even then it is impossible for any save those intimately familiar with the personnel to designate by name.

First and foremost, perhaps, some mention should be made of the work of a master violincellist who appeared on the platform only during the rendition of the Symphony. He played as man might who was in a trance and whose fingers are being directed by an unseen power. To him, the printed score on the rack in front of him was a non-essential incubus—a thing thoroughly inconsequential. During the forty minutes, or thereabouts, which were required to present the four movements of the work, his eyes struck upon the score only casually, the while his left hand ran the gamut of the finger-board with the abandon and accuracy only possible after a life time of intimacy with the music being played.

The work of the trumpets in the final movement of the symphony attracted marked attention also, the tonal effects demanded of them requiring what appeared to be almost super-human mastery of the instrument.

As stated at the outset, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved itself the master organization of the present as it has been in past years. Other orchestras may continue to put forth their claims of superiority and may

CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY BRIGHT SPOT IN MUSIC SEASON HERE

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth, strong praise but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the state armory, Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying.

The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor. The seat sale for the concert will open Wednesday morning at Cluett and sons' music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale which assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, where he will give them his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

It is interesting to know that M. Monteux, conductor of the Boston symphony is always keen to please his public, and that he is not ashamed of that fact.

"I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one," he said recently. "I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners. The people do not always know what is best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to wir out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?"

Despite his interest in the popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman, there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects. The other kind is concerned first and last with the man before him, and he is much too occupied with the music to try for superficialties.

Schen. Union-Star
Dec 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT ARMORY

Finest Orchestral Organization on Earth to be Presented Here by Ben Franklin.

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth. Strong praise, but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the State Armory, Schenectady, next Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying. The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, and the program to be presented is certain to prove entirely satisfactory to the host of enthusiasts that will be present.

The seat sale for this concert will open on Wednesday morning at Cluett and Son's music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale that assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent to Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, as he gives these his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

Schenectady Gazette
Dec 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE PROGRAM

The height of Schenectady's music season will be attained with the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Saturday night in the armory. The orchestra will appear here with more than 100 men under the leadership of their new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who began his work with the organization with fame and reputation on two continents as an artist of broad views and as a musician with a desire to introduce new and revolutionary scores. Mail orders for seats for this concert should be sent at once to the local manager, Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons' music store, Schenectady, where the seat sale will

New York City

Artist Needs No Patriotic Aid

Compositions of Charles Griffes, Brought to Attention Here by Boston Symphony, Able to Stand Without Label of "American."

The arrival of a new American artist is an event variously received according to one's aesthetic habits and one's critical experience. A great many of our nicest people have had the joy taken out of their evenings, the urge taken out of their impulsiveness, however, by what has been offered them in past months, weeks and years, in the name of pure American art.

There are plenty of the professionally patriotic if misled athletes to cheer enthusiastically for young Mr. Dingdong, the composer of the new tone-poem on "Paul Revere's Ride," because both the composer and the tone-poem exude so obviously the soul of Kansas. You can see them at every concert; they are there either because a new all-American young man or woman is presenting or playing this or that creation for the first time, or is singing a series of Delaware River folk-ballads in the original patois, orchestrated with the concertina.

The great mistake the young American school has too often made—encouraged as they have been by the patriotic push—is that they have thought the musical ears of the country were waiting, simply waiting, for an apotheosis of American music out of the State of Michigan.

More Than Citizenship Needed.

This is no brief for the continental or Old World art; rather an insistence that more than citizenship and American background are needed to make a dent on the artistic scene. Dents have been made; some of them have remained lasting impressions. It is all the more encouraging, too, that a young American composer, Charles Griffes, whose work occupied a large part of a recent Boston symphony programme here, should in addition to giving his audience a pleasant evening have led all the critics to the statement that he is not merely an American.

He, from what they say about him, has written music of an imaginative power and individualistic construction; music impressing the ear with its beauty, entirely after the Griffes style, employing in its construction the theories and tricks of the moderns, very evidently being modern music rather than modern American.

You are not reminded of MacDowell by this man; he is not trying to serve up a well scored history of the Leatherstocking legend, and as he well might; rather do you remember, having heard in him traces and strains of Debussy and Stravinsky, the younger French and the most ancient orientals. If they could have written on the Western scale.

Well Received in Boston.

The Boston Symphony produced a symphonic poem of Mr. Griffes entitled the "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which brought its composer rather prominently to the ear of New York audiences. This is not to say that a great many people did not know about him already; that Boston audiences had not risen to an unusual amount of excitement the week before.

Most of the world, no matter how twentieth century in their tastes, can be conjured into a world of fantasy with Coleridge's poem; but if Mr. Griffes was insuperably aided by familiar poetic magic, he at least did it honor with his music. Where "Alph, the sacred river ran," is a far country, which the fantasy and the imagination more than the cold mind can describe. Mr. Griffes wrote into his score all the imagery and the sounds and the echoes which ring against the silence in the far lands of fancy. The Orient and the mystic and Asia and Chinese are peopled and echoed in his score, as they properly should be. For the romantic and the fantastic are nothing but the unfamiliar and the strange, things like Kubla Khan, halfway between a fairy tale and a partially remembered haunting dream.

Born in Elmira, N. Y.

Of course having written what those who know consider a good piece of music, it is good to say that Mr. Griffes is a young American. He was born about thirty-five years ago in Elmira, N. Y., where bad boys go to reform school. He studied music with a local teacher, and before he was 20 went over to Germany, where he stayed four years studying with various masters in Berlin and Leipzig. He never went to the Conservatoire, and although all his studying outside of Elmira was done in Germany, that German teaching left few traces in his style.

They have said it about him that he studied composition under Engelbert Humperdinck, and that is why his music seems to sound like Humperdinck, which Mr. Griffes emphatically denies. He studied with Humperdinck, but never composition and very little of that with any one.

Mr. Griffes said himself to this paper that he had spent the last fourteen years of his life since coming home from Germany at the Hackley School at Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson, and that when he wasn't teaching music or playing the piano he has been composing. The things he has written during the last few years have created notice enough among the careful and critical listeners, but the isolated confines of a boy's school in the country do not lead as quickly to obvious fame as does the daily beaten track of the metropolitan music hound. If you are to be registered as important by the unimportant you must hang around.

Has Not Gone Unwatched.

All Mr. Griffes has done so far, however, has been to write some rather interesting music, and he has not gone unwatched. His music has come out of himself; reeks neither of the negro, the Indian, nor of the conventional prettiness of so many American composers; he is a modern, and his score is streaked with the line of the neo-French and the younger Russians.

"When I went to Germany," Mr. Griffes said, "I was of course ready to be swept under by the later Wagner and Strauss; it is only logical I suppose that when I began to write I wrote in the vein of Debussy and Stravinsky, those particular wide intervalled dissonances are the natural medium of the composer who writes to-day's music. And if I have written into my score Oriental sounds and Slavic themes it is only because those tonal combinations and melodies have said and expressed the thing I wanted to say."

The past record of Mr. Griffes as a composer is adequate, yet not too profuse. He has worked slowly and painstakingly. A very modern piano sonata in one movement has yet to be played, although Harold Bauer is interested in placing it on one of his coming programme. His piano pieces "The Peacock" and a scherzo, both modern, are familiar to concertgoers; a dance drama conceived last year for the Neighborhood Playhouse, entitled the "Kairn in Koriden," made a favorable impression.

Mr. Griffes's interest in Oriental music is revealed in his setting of Javanese songs, interpreted by Mme. Evd. Gauthier, and he is preparing a new cycle for her use at a coming winter concert. For Michio Itow, the Japanese dancer, he wrote "Sho-Jo" for small orchestra, which was produced in the summer of 1917 at the Bolm Ballet at the Booth Theatre. He has also set a series of Japanese folk-songs.

No matter how Tarrytownish his background, there has been no lack of the subtly cadent Oriental in his composition. There are besides all of these, two orchestra pieces, a string quartet, which the Flonzaley has played, and a setting of five Chinese and Japanese poems, written in the old pentatonic and sexatonic scale.

All of which is proof that, despite Germany and Tarrytown and teaching the young to play the piano, Mr. Griffes's writing finger has not been kept out of his fancied East by the shut doors of his environment.

Science's New "Super-Hen" Lays Eggs Nearly Twice the Size We Get Now! See Next Sunday's AMERICAN. Largest circulation in America.—Adv.

Mon. Dec. 22

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MR. ORNSTEIN JUSTIFIES HIMSELF AND A POLICY

His Promise as Pianist Fulfilled and Youth in Deserved Place at the Symphony Concerts—The Annual Christmas Rite of "The Messiah" Duly Accomplished—Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin" in Prospect—Mme. Frijsh and Notable Songs from Musorgsky—Mr. Thibaud and a Rarely Played Piece

ON more scores than one, it was a pleasure to see Mr. Ornstein sitting gravely at the piano on the stage of Symphony Hall last Friday and Saturday, and to hear the public of the Symphony Concerts applauding warmly his playing of MacDowell's Concerto in D-minor—a piece nowadays more displaying the pianist than the composer. By all means a searching and exemplary standard should determine the coming of an "assisting artist" to the Symphony Orchestra at home. The invitation should be kept, as it has long been, a signal honor, smirched only when some protégé was forced unworthily into the concerts and immediately and coldly discovered as such by a practised audience. In double fashion, however, should that standard be applied. It should measure the best of the youthful talents in our concert-rooms and the best of the matured abilities. When both have been sifted, then both should be summoned to Symphony Hall. In the final years of the Higginsonian régime, far too many of the "soloists" were "old stagers" from whom the listeners knew precisely what to expect in personality and performance. Fortunate in those days was the youngster for whom the door was set ajar. Able and interesting as he usually proved himself, it was hard not to believe that he was somebody's protégé. Wisely the new management has sought deserving youth for "soloists," as in other respects it has transfused new blood and young blood into the Symphony Concerts. Last season, for example, it called Mr. Heifetz and Mr. Levitzi; while this season it has already brought Mr. Spalding and Mr. Ornstein. To all four the audiences have returned long and loud applause. Clearly no wish have they, for the most part, that the Symphony Concerts become a "closed shop"—either on the stage or in the auditorium—for the elderly.

The pleasure of Mr. Ornstein's presence and playing ran the higher because a few years ago, "the safe and sane," who are quite as numerous as they should be in the public of Symphony Hall, counted him no more than a passing "freak." In those days, Mr. Ornstein undertook recitals of his own in Boston and divided the programmes between pieces by the ultra-moderns and pieces by himself. His Schönberg and Scott, his Ravel and Korngold were interesting to hear. So, also, however strange, were his own numbers. Mr. Ornstein was then barely out of his teens; in them he had written much music in which he had expressed mood, picture, emotion, impression, the piano, himself, vehemently, outlandishly, extravagantly, but always sincerely, and, as some of us chose to believe, often with imagination, range and individuality, and never with the prudence and the predilections of mediocrity. Moreover, the quality of Mr. Ornstein's ultra-moderns and his own quality as composer were one thing, while the merit and the promise of his playing were quite another. Few who heard him in Boston in the winter of 1915-16, if they had open ears to hear and open minds to judge could have doubted that he was a pianist even then in rare command of touch and tone, versed in his instrument, sensitive and imaginative with it, as responsive and resourceful with the music in hand. In four short years, he has ripened and deepened his finer instincts, traits, abilities. It was a distinguished pianist in many an attribute that the audience of Friday and Saturday heard and applauded. Mr. Ornstein might well have waved away the nervousness that plainly beset him. For in the ears of all who heard, his promise stood unmistakably fulfilled.

Programmes in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Jan. 2 and Saturday, Jan. 3, when happily there is no "assisting artist," Mr. Monteux has put on the programme two novel pieces—the one, Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," heard once in Boston, but hitherto unplayed by the Symphony Orchestra; and the other, Debussy's ballet, "Jeux," unknown alike to American theatres and American concert-halls. "Stenka Razin"—the name of a fine old Cossack brigand—stands among Glazunov's earlier and pictorial pieces when he took more thought of Russian folk-song and folk-tale than of classic German example and modern German reputation. The music recounts the death of the pirate, even though he resigns his fair Persian mistress to the Volga, typified through the tone-poem by the celebrated song ("Ay-Ouchem") of the laboring boatmen. Few who have heard that folk-tune of toil and moil ever forget it. "Jeux" is the mimed episode that Nijinsky, Debussy and Bakst devised in 1911 or 1912 for Mr. Diaghilev's Russian ballet. The action passes in a garden whither a youth and two maidens have chased a lost tennis ball. They speedily forgot the object of their search in amorous play in and out of the shrubbery, in which the boy makes merry with the jealousies of the girls. A second ball falls into the garden, reminds the youthful amorists that they may be watched—and off they fly. Heard by itself apart from the somewhat stilted miming that Nijinsky has contrived, the music charms.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux to Resurrect Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—A Concert by Mr. Havens—The Soviets and Isadora—"The Foremost Orchestra in Europe"

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 2 and 3, Mr. Monteux announces a veritable feat of resurrection. There and then he purposes to play Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—music that the composer was unwilling to publish because he liked it so little; music that has not been heard in Boston for thirty-three years; music finally that nowadays is scarcely heard anywhere—no, not even in darkest England. Yet there is a Mendelssohn—say of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and of sundry overtures—who is perennially fresh and interesting.

Recent visitors to Germany and Austria agree that the quality of the orchestra at the opera house in Dresden and of the Philharmonic Society in Vienna declined much during the later years of the war. Both lost many expert musicians; while the ranks of young and promising players were grievously depleted by death in the field. With the decline of these two bands, the Swiss reviewers write, the Gebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, has become the foremost orchestra in Europe. Perhaps this is the moment to recall that when the trustees of the Boston Orchestra asked Mr. Rabaud last winter whom they should seek in Europe as conductor, he replied: "Either Toscanini or Mengelberg."

Evening Sun - Scheneg. Dec. 15th 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY S HEARD AT ARMORY

Superiority of Organization is Again Demonstrated Under the Baton of Pierre Monteux.

One of the events which mark the annual ebb tide in things musical was presented by Ben Franklin at the Armory Saturday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared. A large audience was in attendance and in many ways it was a remarkable one. It was an audience composed almost exclusively of musical zealots, if that usually offensive word may be used to describe the superlative form of attention—adoration even—with which the efforts of the great body of musicians was drunk in.

The Boston Symphony Orche again demonstrated its vast superiority over other any other existing organization of its kind. Under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra has lost nothing and gained much. With a minimum of visible effort, this conductor procures a maximum in musicianly results.

Detailed description of the program and the profound sensations which stirred the audience with its presentation is beyond the power of printer's ink to transmit. The program opened with the complete interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony in D Major, No. 2. It cannot be described. Others have tried and failed. The orchestra spread it before an enthralled audience with matchless brilliancy and, as was the case with the rest of the program also, it was demonstrated that the organization stands alone as the most perfectly co-ordinated musical machine made up of human units that has ever been banded together for this purpose.

The playing of Balakireff's "Thamar," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were only repeated demonstrations of the marvelous ability of the individual members of the orchestra working as a united whole to present the masterpieces in a manner as nearly approaching perfection as human beings can ever hope to attain.

The orchestra refused all demands for encores and, as usual, the audience was compelled to wend its way homeward with its musical desires unsatiated.

The program afforded little opportunity for individual features. It was only by close discernment that very incidental prominence could be accorded any particular member. And even then it is impossible for any save those intimately familiar with the personnel to designate by name.

First and foremost, perhaps, some mention should be made of the work of a master violincellist who appeared on the platform only during the rendition of the Symphony. He played as man might who was in a trance and whose fingers are being directed by an unseen power. To him, the printed score on the rack in front of him was a non-essential incutus—a thing thoroughly inconsequential. During the forty minutes, or thereabouts, which were required to present the four movements of the work, his eyes struck upon the score only casually, the while his left hand ran the gamut of the finger-board with the abandon and accuracy only possible after a life time of intimacy with the music being played.

The work of the trumpets in the final movement of the symphony attracted marked attention also, the tonal effects demanded of them requiring what appeared to be almost super-human mastery of the instrument.

As stated at the outset, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved itself the master organization of the present as it has been in past years. Other orchestras may continue to put forth their claims of superiority and may well strive to attain their aim but

CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY BRIGHT SPOT IN MUSIC SEASON HERE

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth, strong praise but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the state armory, Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying.

The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor. The seat sale for the concert will open Wednesday morning at Cluett and sons' music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale which assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, where he will give them his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

It is interesting to know that M. Monteux, conductor of the Boston symphony is always keen to please his public, and that he is not ashamed of that fact.

"I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one," he said recently. "I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners. The people do not always know what is best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to win out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?"

Despite his interest in the popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman, there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects. The other kind is concerned first and last with the man before him, and he is much too occupied with the music to try for superficialties.

Schen. Union-Star Dec 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT ARMORY

Finest Orchestral Organization on Earth to be Presented Here by Ben Franklin.

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth. Strong praise, but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the State Armory, Schenectady, next Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying. The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, and the program to be presented is certain to prove entirely satisfactory to the host of enthusiasts that will be present.

The seat sale for this concert will open on Wednesday morning at Cluett and Son's music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale that assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent to Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, as he gives these his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

Schenectady Gazette Dec 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE PROGRAM

The height of Schenectady's music season will be attained with the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Saturday night in the armory. The orchestra will appear here with more than 100 men under the leadership of their new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who began his work with the organization with fame and reputation on two continents as an artist of broad views and as a musician with a desire to introduce new and revolutionary scores. Mail orders for seats for this concert should be sent at once to the local manager, Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons' music store, Schenectady, where the seat sale will

EVENING SUN
New York City

Artist Needs No Patriotic Aid

Compositions of Charles Griffes, Brought to Attention Here by Boston Symphony, Able to Stand Without Label of "American."

The arrival of a new American artist is an event variously received according to one's aesthetic habits and one's critical experience. A great many of our nicest people have had the joy taken out of their evenings, the urge taken out of their impulsiveness, however, by what has been offered them in past months, weeks and years, in the name of pure American art.

There are plenty of the professionally patriotic if misled athletes to cheer enthusiastically for young Mr. Dingdong, the composer of the new tone-poem on "Paul Revere's Ride," because both the composer and the tone-poem exude so obviously the soul of Kansas. You can see them at every concert; they are there either because a new all-American young man or woman is presenting or playing this or that creation for the first time, or is singing a series of Delaware River folk-ballads in the original patois, orchestrated with the concertina.

The great mistake the young American school has too often made—encouraged as they have been by the patriotic push—is that they have thought the musical ears of the country were waiting, simply waiting, for an apotheosis of American music out of the State of Michigan.

More Than Citizenship Needed.

This is no brief for the continental or Old World art; rather an insistence that more than citizenship and American background are needed to make a dent on the artistic scene. Dents have been made; some of them have remained lasting impressions. It is all the more encouraging, too, that a young American composer, Charles Griffes, whose work occupied a large part of a recent Boston symphony programme here, should in addition to giving his audience a pleasant evening have led all the critics to the statement that he is not merely an American.

He, from what they say about him, has written music of an imaginative power and individualistic construction; music impressing the ear with its beauty, entirely after the Griffes style, employing in its construction the theories and tricks of the moderns, very evidently being modern music rather than modern American.

You are not reminded of MacDowell by this man; he is not trying to serve up a well scored history of the Leatherstocking legend, and as he well might; rather do you remember, having heard in him traces and strains of Debussy and Stravinsky, the younger French and the most ancient orientals. If they could have written on the Western scale.

Well Received in Boston.

The Boston Symphony produced a symphonic poem of Mr. Griffes entitled the "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which brought its composer rather prominently to the ear of New York audiences. This is not to say that a great many people did not know about him already; that Boston audiences had not risen to an unusual amount of excitement the week before.

Most of the world, no matter how twentieth century in their tastes, can be conjured into a world of fantasy with Coleridge's poem; but if Mr. Griffes was insuperably aided by familiar poetic magic, he at least did it honor with his music. Where "Alph, the sacred river ran," is a far country, which the fantasy and the imagination more than the cold mind can describe. Mr. Griffes wrote into his score all the imagery and the sounds and the echoes which ring against the silence in the far lands of fancy. The Orient and the mystic and Asia and Chinese are peopled and echoed in his score, as they properly should be. For the romantic and the fantastic are nothing but the unfamiliar and the strange, things like Kubla Khan, halfway between a fairy tale and a partially remembered haunting dream.

Born in Elmira, N. Y.

Of course having written what those who know consider a good piece of music, it is good to say that Mr. Griffes is a young American. He was born about thirty-five years ago in Elmira, N. Y., where bad boys go to reform school. He studied music with a local teacher, and before he was 20 went over to Germany, where he stayed four years studying with various masters in Berlin and Leipzig. He never went to the Conservatoire, and although all his studying outside of Elmira was done in Germany, that German teaching left few traces in his style.

They have said it about him that he studied composition under Engelbert Humperdinck, and that is why his music seems to sound like Humperdinck, which Mr. Griffes emphatically denies. He studied with Humperdinck, but never composition and very little of that with any one.

Mr. Griffes said himself to this paper that he had spent the last fourteen years of his life since coming home from Germany at the Hackley School at Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson, and that when he wasn't teaching music or playing the piano he has been composing. The things he has written during the last few years have created notice enough among the careful and critical listeners, but the isolated confines of a boy's school in the country do not lead as quickly to obvious fame as does the daily beaten track of the metropolitan music hound. If you are to be registered as important by the unimportant you must hang around.

Has Not Gone Unwatched.

All Mr. Griffes has done so far, however, has been to write some rather interesting music, and he has not gone unwatched. His music has come out of himself; reeks neither of the negro, the Indian, nor of the conventional prettiness of so many American composers; he is a modern, and his score is streaked with the line of the neo-French and the younger Russians.

"When I went to Germany," Mr. Griffes said, "I was of course ready to be swept under by the later Wagner and Strauss; it is only logical I suppose that when I began to write I wrote in the vein of Debussy and Stravinsky; those particular wide intervalled dissonances are the natural medium of the composer who writes to-day's music. And if I have written into my score Oriental sounds and Slavic themes it is only because those tonal combinations and melodies have said and expressed the thing I wanted to say."

The past record of Mr. Griffes as a composer is adequate, yet not too profuse. He has worked slowly and painstakingly. A very modern piano sonata in one movement has yet to be played, although Harold Bauer is interested in placing it on one of his coming programme. His piano pieces "The Peacock" and a scherzo, both modern, are familiar to concertgoers; a dance drama conceived last year for the Neighborhood Playhouse, entitled the "Kairn in Koriden," made a favorable impression.

Mr. Griffes's interest in Oriental music is revealed in his setting of Javanese songs, interpreted by Mme. Eva Gauthier, and he is preparing a new cycle for her use at a coming winter concert. For Michio Itow, the Japanese dancer, he wrote "Sho-Jo" for small orchestra, which was produced in the summer of 1917 at the Bolm Ballet at the Booth Theatre. He has also set a series of Japanese folk-songs.

No matter how Tarrytownish his background, there has been no lack of the subtly cadent Oriental in his composition. There are besides all of these, two orchestra pieces, a string quartet, which the Flonzaley has played, and a setting of five Chinese and Japanese poems, written in the old pentatonic and sexatonic scale.

All of which is proof that, despite Germany and Tarrytown and teaching the young to play the piano, Mr. Griffes's writing finger has not been kept out of his fancied East by the shut doors of his environment.

Science's New "Super-Hen" Lays Eggs Nearly Twice the Size We Get Now! See Next Sunday's AMERICAN. Largest circulation in America.—Adv.

Mon. Dec. 2

CONCERT-G

MR. ORNSTEIN JU... AND A P...

His Promise as Pia... Youth in Deserved P... phony Concerts—The ... Rite of "The Messia... plished—Debussy's "J... nov's "Stenka Razin" i... Frijsh and Notable Son... sky—Mr. Thibaud and ... Piece

ON more scores th... pleasure to see ... ting gravely at th... stage of Symphon... day and Saturday, and to ... of the Symphony Concerts a... ly his playing of MacDow... D-minor—a piece nowaday... ing the pianist than the co... means a searching and ex... ard should determine the ... "assisting artist" to the ... chestra at home. The in... be kept, as it has long been... or, smirched only when som... forced unworthily into the ... immediately and coldly disco... by a practised audience. In ... however, should that standard ... It should measure the best ... ful talents in our concert-... best of the matured abilities ... have been sifted, then ... summoned to Symphony Ha... years of the Higginsonian ... many of the "soloists" wer... from whom the listeners ... what to expect in perso... formance. Fortunate in ... the youngster for whom th... ajar. Able and interesting ... proved himself, it was ... lieve that he was som... Wisely the new manage... deserving youth for "solo... respects it has transfuse... young blood into the Sy... Last season, for exam... Heifetz and Mr. Levitzki ... it has already brought ... Mr. Ornstein. To all ... have returned long a... Clearly no wish have ... part, that the Symphony ... a "closed shop"—either ... the auditorium—for th...

The pleasure of Mr. ... and playing ran the hi... years ago, "the safe ... quite as numerous as ... the public of Symphony ... no more than a passing ... days, Mr. Ornstein u... his own in Boston and ... grammes between piec... erns and pieces by h... berg and Scott, his B... were interesting to h... ever strange, were his... Ornstein was then bar... in them he had wri... which he had expr... emotion, impression, ... hemently, outlandish... always sincerely, and ... to believe, often w... and individuality, a... dence and the pre... Moreover, the qu... ultra-moderns and ... poser were one t... the promise of hi... other. Few who ... the winter of ... ears to hear and ... could have doubt... even then in ... tone, versed in ... and imaginativ... resourceful wi... four short yeate... ened his finer ... was a distingu... tribute that ... Saturday hea... stein might ... nervousness ... in the ears ... stood unmis...

Programmes in Prospect

For the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Jan. 2 and Saturday, Jan. 3, when happily there is no "assisting artist," Mr. Monteux has put on the programme two novel pieces—the one, Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," heard once in Boston, but hitherto unplayed by the Symphony Orchestra; and the other, Debussy's ballet, "Jeux," unknown alike to American theatres and American concert-halls. "Stenka Razin"—the name of a fine old Cossack brigand—stands among Glazunov's earlier and pictorial pieces when he took more thought of Russian folk-song and folk-tale than of classic German example and modern German reputation. The music recounts the death of the pirate, even though he resigns his fair Persian mistress to the Volga, typified through the tone-poem by the celebrated song ("Ay-Ouchem") of the laboring boatmen. Few who have heard that folk-tune of toil and mou ever forget it. "Jeux" is the mimed episode that Nijinsky, Debussy and Bakst devised in 1911 or 1912 for Mr. Diaghilev's Russian ballet. The action passes in a garden whither a youth and two maidens have chased a lost tennis ball. They speedily forgot the object of their search in amorous play in and out of the shrubbery, in which the boy makes merry with the jealousies of the girls. A second ball fal's into the garden, reminds the youthful amorists that they may be watched—and off they fly. Heard by itself apart from the somewhat stilted miming that Nijinsky contrived, the music charms.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mr. Monteux to Resurrect Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—A Concert by Mr. Havens—The Soviets and Isadora—"The Foremost Orchestra in Europe"

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Jan. 2 and 3, Mr. Monteux announces a veritable feat of resurrection. There and then he purposes to play Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"—music that the composer was unwilling to publish because he liked it so little; music that has not been heard in Boston for thirty-three years; music finally that nowadays is scarcely heard anywhere—no, not even in darkest England. Yet there is a Mendelssohn—say of the music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and of sundry overtures—who is perennially fresh and interesting.

Recent visitors to Germany and Austria agree that the quality of the orchestra at the opera house in Dresden and of the Philharmonic Society in Vienna declined much during the later years of the war. Both lost many expert musicians; while the ranks of young and promising players were grievously depleted by death in the field. With the decline of these two bands, the Swiss reviewers write, the Gebouw Orchestra at Amsterdam, under Mengelberg, has become the foremost orchestra in Europe. Perhaps this is the moment to recall that when the trustees of the Boston Orchestra asked Mr. Rabaud last winter whom they should seek in Europe as conductor, he replied: "Either Toscanini or Mengelberg."

Mon Stas-Ecken
Dec. 15th 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ARMORY

Superiority of Organization is Again Demonstrated Under the Baton of Pierre Monteux.

One of the events which mark the annual ebb tide in things musical was presented by Ben Franklin at the Armory Saturday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared. A large audience was in attendance and in many ways it was a remarkable one. It was an audience composed almost exclusively of musical zealots, if that usually offensive word may be used to describe the superlative form of attention—adoration even—with which the efforts of the great body of musicians was drunk in.

The Boston Symphony Orche... again demonstrated its vast superiority over other any other existing Cross organization of its kind. Under the baton of Pierre Monteux, the orchestra has lost nothing and gained much. With a minimum of visible effort, this conductor procures a maximum in musicianly results.

Detailed description of the program and the profound sensations which stirred the audience with its presentation is beyond the power of printer's ink to transmit. The program opened with the complete interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony in D Major, No. 2. It cannot be described. Others have tried and failed. The orchestra spread it before an enthralled audience with matchless brilliancy and, as was the case with the rest of the program also, it was demonstrated that the organization stands alone as the most perfectly co-ordinated musical machine made up of human units that has ever been banded together for this purpose.

The playing of Balakireff's "Thamar," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" were only repeated demonstrations of the marvelous ability of the individual members of the orchestra working as a united whole to present the masterpieces in a manner as nearly approaching perfection as human beings can ever hope to attain.

The orchestra refused all demands for encores and, as usual, the audience was compelled to wend its way homeward with its musical desires unsatiated.

The program afforded little opportunity for individual features. It was only by close discernment that very incidental prominence could be accorded any particular member. And even then it is impossible for any save those intimately familiar with the personnel to designate by name.

First and foremost, perhaps, some mention should be made of the work of a master violincellist who appeared on the platform only during the rendition of the Symphony. He played as man might who was in a trance and whose fingers are being directed by an unseen power. To him, the printed score on the rack in front of him was a non-essential incutus—a thing thoroughly inconsequential. During the forty minutes, or thereabouts, which were required to present the four movements of the work, his eyes struck upon the score only casually, the while his left hand ran the gamut of the finger-board with the abandon and accuracy only possible after a life time of intimacy with the music being played.

The work of the trumpets in th... final movement of the symphony a... tracted marked attention also, th... tonal effects demanded of them re... quiring what appeared to be almos... super-human mastery of the instru... ment.

As stated at the outset, the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved itself the master organization of the present as it has been in past years. Other orchestras may continue to put forth their claims of superiority and may well strive to attain their aim but

CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY BRIGHT SPOT IN MUSIC SEASON HERE

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth, strong praise but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the state armory, Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying.

The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor. The seat sale for the concert will open Wednesday morning at Cluett and sons' music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale which assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, where he will give them his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

It is interesting to know that M. Monteux, conductor of the Boston symphony is always keen to please his public, and that he is not ashamed of that fact.

"I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one," he said recently. "I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for us who present the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners. The people do not always know what is best, not always do they like it. But wait, do not be discouraged. The best is bound to wir out, else why is it called and admitted to be the best?"

Despite his interest in the popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman, there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects. The other kind is concerned first and last with the man before him, and he is much too occupied with the music to try for superficialties.

Schen. Union-Star
Dec 8
1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT ARMORY

Finest Orchestral Organization on Earth to be Presented Here by Ben Franklin.

The hundreds that will attend the coming concert of the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will be present with a full appreciation of the fact that they are to enjoy an event by the finest orchestral organization on earth. Strong praise, but true in every particular. This concert will take place at the State Armory, Schenectady, next Saturday night, and is given under the local management of Ben Franklin. That it will be the feature of the most brilliant musical season that Schenectady has yet experienced goes without saying. The celebrated orchestra comes to this city with its full membership, under the efficient leadership of Pierre Monteux, its new conductor, and the program to be presented is certain to prove entirely satisfactory to the host of enthusiasts that will be present.

The seat sale for this concert will open on Wednesday morning at Cluett and Son's music store, and mail orders are now being accepted and filled as received, many already having taken advantage of this sale that assures patrons of best locations. All such orders should be sent to Ben Franklin, in care of the Cluett store, as he gives these his personal attention. The concert will begin at 8:15 o'clock sharp, and later comers will be obliged to stand until the completion of the first number.

Schenectady Gazette
Dec 6

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL GIVE PROGRAM

The height of Schenectady's music season will be attained with the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Saturday night in the armory. The orchestra will appear here with more than 100 men under the leadership of their new conductor, Pierro Monteux, who began his work with the organization with fame and reputation on two continents as an artist of broad views and as a musician with a desire to introduce new and revolutionary scores. Mail orders for seats for this concert should be sent at once to the local manager, Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons' music store, Schenectady, where the seat sale will

EVENING SUN
New York City

Artist Needs No Patriotic Aid

Compositions of Charles Griffes, Brought to Attention Here by Boston Symphony, Able to Stand Without Label of "American."

The arrival of a new American artist is an event variously received according to one's aesthetic habits and one's critical experience. A great many of our nicest people have had the joy taken out of their evenings, the urge taken out of their impulsiveness, however, by what has been offered them in past months, weeks and years, in the name of pure American art.

There are plenty of the professionally patriotic if misled athletes to cheer enthusiastically for young Mr. Dingdong, the composer of the new tone-poem on "Paul Revere's Ride," because both the composer and the tone-poem exude so obviously the soul of Kansas. You can see them at every concert; they are there either because a new all-American young man or woman is presenting or playing this or that creation for the first time, or is singing a series of Delaware River folk-ballads in the original patois, orchestrated with the concertina.

The great mistake the young American school has too often made—encouraged as they have been by the patriotic push—is that they have thought the musical ears of the country were waiting, simply waiting, for an apotheosis of American music out of the State of Michigan.

More Than Citizenship Needed.

This is no brief for the continental or Old World art; rather an insistence that more than citizenship and American background are needed to make a dent on the artistic scene. Dents have been made; some of them have remained lasting impressions. It is all the more encouraging, too, that a young American composer, Charles Griffes, whose work occupied a large part of a recent Boston symphony programme here, should in addition to giving his audience a pleasant evening have led all the critics to the statement that he is not merely an American.

He, from what they say about him, has written music of an imaginative power and individualistic construction; music impressing the ear with its beauty, entirely after the Griffes style, employing in its construction the theories and tricks of the moderns, very evidently being modern music rather than modern American.

You are not reminded of MacDowell by this man; he is not trying to serve up a well scored history of the Leatherstocking legend, and as he well might; rather do you remember, having heard in him traces and strains of Debussy and Stravinsky, the younger French and the most ancient orientals. If they could have written on the Western scale.

Well Received in Boston.

The Boston Symphony produced a symphonic poem of Mr. Griffes entitled the "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," which brought its composer rather prominently to the ear of New York audiences. This is not to say that a great many people did not know about him already; that Boston audiences had not risen to an unusual amount of excitement the week before.

Most of the world, no matter how twentieth century in their tastes, can be conjured into a world of fantasy with Coleridge's poem; but if Mr. Griffes was insuperably aided by familiar poetic magic, he at least did it honor with his music. Where "Alph, the sacred river ran," is a far country, which the fantasy and the imagination more than the cold mind can describe. Mr. Griffes wrote into his score all the imagery and the sounds and the echoes which ring against the silence in the far lands of fancy. The Orient and the mystic and Asia and Chinese are peopled and echoed in his score, as they properly should be. For the romantic and the fantastic are nothing but the unfamiliar and the strange, things like Kubla Khan, halfway between a fairy tale and a partially remembered haunting dream.

Born in Elmira, N. Y.

Of course having written what those who know consider a good piece of music, it is good to say that Mr. Griffes is a young American. He was born about thirty-five years ago in Elmira, N. Y., where bad boys go to reform school. He studied music with a local teacher, and before he was 20 went over to Germany, where he stayed four years studying with various masters in Berlin and Leipzig. He never went to the Conservatoire, and although all his studying outside of Elmira was done in Germany, that German teaching left few traces in his style.

They have said it about him that he studied composition under Engelbert Humperdinck, and that is why his music seems to sound like Humperdinck, which Mr. Griffes emphatically denies. He studied with Humperdinck, but never composition and very little of that with any one.

Mr. Griffes said himself to this paper that he had spent the last fourteen years of his life since coming home from Germany at the Hackley School at Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson, and that when he wasn't teaching music or playing the piano he has been composing. The things he has written during the last few years have created notice enough among the careful and critical listeners, but the isolated confines of a boy's school in the country do not lead as quickly to obvious fame as does the daily beaten track of the metropolitan music hound. If you are to be registered as important by the unimportant you must hang around.

Has Not Gone Unwatched.

All Mr. Griffes has done so far, however, has been to write some rather interesting music, and he has not gone unwatched. His music has come out of himself; reeks neither of the negro, the Indian, nor of the conventional prettiness of so many American composers; he is a modern, and his score is streaked with the line of the neo-French and the younger Russians.

"When I went to Germany," Mr. Griffes said, "I was of course ready to be swept under by the later Wagner and Strauss; it is only logical I suppose that when I began to write I wrote in the vein of Debussy and Stravinsky; those particular wide intervalled dissonances are the natural medium of the composer who writes to-day's music. And if I have written into my score Oriental sounds and Slavic themes it is only because those tonal combinations and melodies have said and expressed the thing I wanted to say."

The past record of Mr. Griffes as a composer is adequate, yet not too profuse. He has worked slowly and painstakingly. A very modern piano sonata in one movement has yet to be played, although Harold Bauer is interested in placing it on one of his coming programme. His piano pieces "The Peacock" and a scherzo, both modern, are familiar to concertgoers; a dance drama conceived last year for the Neighborhood Playhouse, entitled the "Kairn in Koriden," made a favorable impression.

Mr. Griffes's interest in Oriental music is revealed in his setting of Javanese songs, interpreted by Mme. Eva Gauthier, and he is preparing a new cycle for her use at a coming winter concert. For Michio Itow, the Japanese dancer, he wrote "Sho-Jo" for small orchestra, which was produced in the summer of 1917 at the Bolm Ballet at the Booth Theatre. He has also set a series of Japanese folk-songs.

No matter how Tarrytownish his background, there has been no lack of the subtly cadent Oriental in his composition. There are besides all of these, two orchestra pieces, a string quartet, which the Flonzaley has played, and a setting of five Chinese and Japanese poems, written in the old pentatonic and sexatonic scale.

All of which is proof that, despite Germany and Tarrytown and teaching the young to play the piano, Mr. Griffes's writing finger has not been kept out of his fancied Fast by the shut doors of his environment.

Science's New "Super-Hen" Lays Eggs Nearly Twice the Size We Get Now! See Next Sunday's AMERICAN. Largest circulation in America.—Adv.

Dec 27 BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, 1919 Herald

SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS IS PLAYED

'Mephisto' Waltz and Concerto Also on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The heroic symphony of Brahms in C minor opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph Bonnet played the organ in the performance of a Handel concerto in F major for organ and orchestra. Listzt's "Mephisto" waltz brought the end of the concert.

WORK A CLASSIC

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the Brahms symphony showed again what a serious and ardent student of classic masterpieces he is, and the Brahms of the C minor symphony is certainly a classic today, romantic as are many pages of this extraordinary work.

A work so extraordinary in its dramatic outbursts, its frequent passages of nobly lyrical feeling, that one wonders what this first symphony would have turned into had Brahms been just a little less reverential in his attitude toward the orchestra of Beethoven and the virtue of symphonic form. In the first place the music, no matter how sympathetic one feels toward it, seems to cry out for richer and more telling instrumentation.

Then as to form: If only there were not so conscious a girding of the loins in the finale and so lofty an attitude of goodness in the slow movement. We prefer to this movement the slow movement of the second symphony. It is as deep, as reflective, as Brahmsish as anyone could wish, but it is profoundly and intrinsically Brahms, whereas the slow movement of this first symphony appears to us as Brahms rather deliberately donning the toga of Beethoven. It also appears as if Brahms in place of a scherzo which could be grim, domoniac, but lively in pace, was afraid that if in this gray and heroic work he indulged in a scherzo he might by some chance laugh. Perhaps he had in mind a Boston audience when he wrote the movement, for he does not laugh. He goes walking along through the country with a dignified demeanor and an autumnal smile. If there were a little less material in the finale, if the main lines of this great movement were a little less sub-divided in details—details so rich, so important, so intimately related to all the rest—the powerful sweep of the music would be less difficult to maintain.

Shows Understanding

Mr. Monteux, as we have said, shows his depth of understanding of the great symphonic works whenever he touches them. He has a very strong feeling for their proportion, their logic and continuity of thought. Some conductors make a prodigious effect with the introduction of this symphony, then rush madly through the main body of the movement. Mr. Monteux did not exaggerate the characteristics of either section. By admirably chosen tempi he made the entire movement indivisible and also brought out into full relief the lyrical phrases which frequently occur and which are as frequently neglected by conductors. There were new nuances, wholly appropriate to the thought in the slow movement, and beautiful orchestral colors. For us the pace of the third movement was too slow, but there were those who felt that they had heard the right tempo for this movement for the first time in many seasons.

Mr. Bonnet rates the Handel concerto very highly. He certainly played the organ beautifully and with musicianly authority, arousing great enthusiasm by his performance. For the writer the high lights of the concerto are the slow movement and the introduction to the last. He finds the opening very commonplace and 'pedestrian in the manner of Handel's time. The fugue is brilliant and well made, and the organ sounds bravely. Mr. Bonnet was recalled fully half a dozen times.

Irreverent by Comparison

Irreverant, if not indelicate, was the pot-house music of Liszt after those eminent worthies, Handel and Brahms, who had preceded him. The "Mephisto" waltz, which Mr. Monteux played with abounding deviltry, seemed to stick its tongue in its cheek and make faces at what had gone by. This waltz is pretty "old hat" today. We are no longer alarmed as we listened to music inspired by the scene from Lenau's "Faust," the scene in which Mephistopheles throws Faust into the arms of a black-eyed village wench and fiddles till the very walls totter and turn pale because they cannot join in the dance. Just the same, the opening—Mephistopheles tuning his fiddle—has a flair. Mr. Bedetti's gorgeous tone graced the passage which today is almost maudlin, senile in its sentimentality, its pseudo-amorousness. At such a lover the wench of Lenau would have snapped her fingers. But this one can note and at it marvel: Liszt's amazing mastery of form, his wit, his spirit, his originality in instrumentation, tarnished and tawdry as some of it sounds today, more than half a century after it was conceived. After all, it is the music of a genius.

9TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Compositions by Brahms, Handel and Liszt Prominent on the Program

ORGANIST BONNET WINS APPLAUSE

The program of the ninth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux, conductor, the first of which was given yesterday in Symphony Hall, follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor; Handel, Concerto in F major No. 4 (organist), Joseph Bonnet; Liszt, "The Dance in the Village Tavern" (Mephiste Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

Undeterred by the holidays, the concert patrons were present in full number to enjoy the good, solid, foundational music of Brahms, Handel and Liszt. Joseph Bonnet, a devoted exponent of the older and finer organ music, is to be commended for choosing the Concerto in F major No. 4, which in no part is "lesser" Handel. It was perhaps Handel's genius that made the display in the first movement plausible and impressive, the ornament felicitous in all its elaboration. The Andante, dignified and serene, is wonderfully rich in treasure, and the final Allegro, nobly ushered in, piles up in power by contrapuntal skill to a high flood of joyousness. Complemented by the singing strings about him, Mr. Bonnet's playing was ideal to the purpose—clean, delicate and poised, always regardful of the ensemble. Judging from the many bows he had to make, he must have provided as much pleasure as many a pianist and singer.

Applause also indicated a great satisfaction in the first Symphony of Brahms, always eagerly returned to, which on this occasion had a robust and sonorous performance. In the famous solo passage for the French horn, Mr. Van Den Berg, newly come to the orchestra from Europe, disclosed a smooth and lustrous tone which fully qualifies him to sit with such distinguished virtuosi as Messrs. Longy, Sand, Laurent and Fradkin, who glorified the exquisite episodes allotted to them, and were again well heard in the music of Liszt. The "Mephisto Waltz" cannot compete with certain symphonic poems if only a tune is desired, but the devil described in it is interesting—the more so for his trumpery and sleight-of-hand. As orchestration the piece remains splendid to hear with effects unsurpassed.

The program for the Symphony concerts of Jan. 2 and 3, follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 5 ("Reformation"); Debussy, "Jeux" ("Play"), danced poem; Glazounoff ("Stenka Razine"), symphonic poem.

Post

Members of Symphony Orchestra Insured

Acting on a recent decision the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for the members of the orchestra to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, which institution remains as firm, as it is of long standing.

Items and Announcements

It is permissible to hope that when Mr. Bonnet plays his Concerto for organ at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, his instrument may be so placed that his "foot-work" upon the pedals may not be as visible and vivid as it was on like occasion a year ago. Then and in spite of themselves not a few auditors were so impressed and fascinated by this agility that they forgot not only the music in hand but Mr. Bonnet's other and perhaps more essential abilities as organist.

It is definitely settled that the new French pianist, Robert Schmitz, of whom Mr. Monteux thinks highly, will be heard at the Symphony Concerts, probably in February, possibly later in the season. Meanwhile uncertainty overhangs the projected performance of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus. Mr. Monteux thought of the concerts of Holy Week as becoming occasion, but various circumstances counsel another time.

Herald Dec 27

CONCERT NOTES

At the Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performances of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since this highly praised score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song" ("Ay Ouchem") as a principal theme.

Post Dec 27

DEBUSSY'S "PLAY" AT SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performance of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since this highly praised score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song" ("Ay Ouchem") as a principal theme.

Monitor Dec 27

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on December 26 with the following program:

Brahms—Symphony No. 1.
Handel—Organ concerto No. 4 in F major.
Liszt—Second episode from Lenau's Faust (Mephisto Waltz).
Joseph Bonnet was the soloist.

Yesterday's performance of the symphony was the first since November 10, 1916 and is was interesting to note its effect after so long an interval. It would seem that one either admires Brahms' music warmly or coldly respects it. Those who are moved by admiration must have felt that admiration increased after yesterday, and those who are moved by respect must have felt their respect, let us hope, not diminished. The playing of the symphony could have aroused nothing but enthusiasm. The whole conception of the piece both on the part of the conductor and the orchestra was clear and the execution well balanced.

The more we hear of Handel's music the more we regret that there are still so many of his compositions which are neglected—arias, orchestral pieces, concertos—a perfect mine of beautiful music awaiting discovery by some musical adventurer. The concerto for the organ was a delight from beginning to end—that is as played by Mr. Bonnet, who gave the needed grace and charm to its flowing eighteenth century phrases. His registration contained many happy effects, especially near the close of the andante, and he displayed throughout the work the qualities of taste and refinement for which he is so justly renowned. Liszt's Mephisto Waltz brought the program to a brilliant close. Little by little we are beginning to realize Liszt's greatness as a composer—perhaps the greatest of the romantic school—and we are gradually coming to see him as a great innovator in harmonic and orchestral coloring, the originator of many of the devices deemed novel by present-day composers. As we are introduced to one so-called novel effect after another in the music of the moderns, it becomes more and more interesting to trace their origins in the music of the great Abbé. The performance was brilliant, rhythmic and poetic and proved Mr. Monteux's fine understanding of Liszt's music, if further proof were needed after his superlatively fine reading of "Les Préludes" earlier in the season.

Globe Dec 27

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Parisian Organist Assists in Handel Concerto

Joseph Bonnet, organist of the Church of Saint Eustache in Paris, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He is well known in Boston from several appearances here in recitals and as soloist at a pair of Symphony concerts last season. A note which he contributed to the program book explains that he has made very few additions and changes in Handel's score of the Concerto in F major, op 4, no 4.

He deserves commendation for thus refraining from introducing the modern "improvements" in the shape of an augmented orchestration and "brilliant" cadenzas which disfigure so many performances of 18th century music nowadays. His technical skill is phenomenal. Few indeed are the organists who can play legato passages deftly and rapidly without blurring a single note, and without lapses into staccato.

His runs are like those of a great pianist bent on perfecting his technique. But the technical problems of organ playing seems to absorb most of his attention. He neglects nuances in his interpretation.

The real feature was the Brahms Symphony in C minor, No. 1. It seems almost incredible that the supposed dullness and crudeness of Brahms should ever have lent point to the jest that the fire escapes in Symphony Hall ought to be labeled "This way out in case of Brahms." Yet the vehement applause which compelled the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment as the end came mainly from the younger portion of the audience, to whom, of course, that composer seems thoroughly comparable to Beethoven, Bach and Wagner, and as surely immortal as any one of the three.

The finale of the symphony, which shows the influence of the symphonic poems of the romantic composers in its comparative freedom of structure, surpasses them all both in perfection of workmanship and in emotional intensity. It needs no literary program or rhapsodic commentary to make it enthralling. It is more powerful, if less perfect, than the other symphonic movement, which is the highest achievement of Brahms, the first one in his Fourth Symphony, a masterpiece of construction.

America Dec 27

NEW DEBUSSY AT SYMPHONY

Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play") will have its first performances in America at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since Pierre Monteux also gave the piece its first public performance, under the personal supervision of the composer, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts, Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony (No. 5). The closing number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Globe Dec. 28

Debussy's "Jeux" at the Next Symphony Concerts

At the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performances of Debussy's "Jeux ("Play"). Since this score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr Monteux, under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts Mr Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 6. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian Symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song," "Ay Ouchem," as a principal theme.

Mr Monteux' interpretation showed that he felt strongly and understood perfectly the power of the themes. In development passages, however, he often quickened the tempo and sometimes chopped up the phrases, either through nervousness or in a mistaken endeavor for expressiveness.

The true eloquence comes from steady lengthening and broadening of the phrases. The episodes must be subordinated to the total effect of the whole movement. Halt at least of the excellence of Dr Muck as a conductor of such music was due to his perception of the fact that the variety in great symphonic movements is there only because it really contributes to their essential unity.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played. This program will be repeated tonight. At the concerts next week Mendelssohn's forgotten "Reformation" Symphony will be revived, Debussy's "Jeux" will be given for the first times in America, and Glazounoff "Stenka Razine" will be played for the first time at these concerts.

Elson Reviews Music Events of Year

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

As there is no secular music to record this week, it may be fitting to sum up the chief events that have occurred in Boston during the past year and see how they compare with previous seasons.

M Rabaud took leave of us and of our symphony orchestra with a program of special dullness, excellently played. Anything more tiresome than St. Saens' "Lyre and Harp' we do not care to hear. But even if some of his programs were heavy, M. Rabaud left a splendid impression an dwas notable for the excellent balance of tone which he elicited from the orchestra.

But M. Monteux is far and away the better program-maker, although he shines best in the dramatic and sensational in music. In such works as Schmitt's "Salomo," Balakireff's "Thamar," Stravinsky's "Firebird," etc., he was distinctly in advance of his predecessors. In Schumann and Brahms we did not find him to be a rival of Muck or those before him. The programmes are more interesting than they have been for a long time.

Among the soloists at these concerts Madeleine Brard, who appeared at a Pension Fund Concert, made the most striking impression. A young miss of sixteen, and looking even younger, she played St. Saens' G minor piano concerto in a manner that excelled the composer himself in the work.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts next ... afternoon and Saturday even... Pierre Monteux will conduct the ... American performances of De... "Jeux." Since this highly ... score had its first public per... at the hands of Mr. Mon... under the personal supervi... himself, who told ... should be inter... reading ma...

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Debussy's Ballet-Music, "Jeux," for the First Times in America—Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" to Be Resurrected—Glazunov's Vivid Tone-Poem, "Stenka Razin," Timely Revived—Miss Baird as Pianist and the Freakish Rosenblatt

OUR severest youth may not reproach Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with lack of novelty. He begins with Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," now seldom played anywhere and unheard in Boston for three-and-thirty years. Even the composer himself came to think ill of his child, born in 1830 on commission for a celebration of the ter-centenary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by German Protestants. Darkest England seldom hears the "Reformation Symphony," and elsewhere by common consent conductors have put it by. When Mr. Monteux has concluded these rites he will pass to a very different sort of music, the ballet, "Jeux," written by Debussy to oblige Mr. Diaghilev, the director of th Russian dancers, linked to a "choreographic action" devised by Nijinsky and clothed in a setting by Bakst. By common consent Nijinsky's "action" was at odds with the contours, the rhythms and the implications generally of the music. For these were the days when the dancer was enamored of angular and arbitrary poses. Mr. Monteux, therefore, does well to play the piece as a tone-poem, with a prefatory "argument." It has been so played in Paris; it will be so played in Boston for the first times in America. By hint of the score the music runs brightly, gracefully, charmingly in crossed rhythms, interwoven melody and light and glinting harmonic and instrumental color. But of it particularly and of "Jeux" in general, there will be more time and ampler space in which to write next week. Finally, Mr. Monteux proposes Glazunov's early tone-poem, long and undeservedly fallen from the active repertory of the Symphony Orchestra, "Stenka Razin," written when the composer preferred Russian rather than German ways and suggestion in music-making and conned the legends of his country for spur to his imagination. "Stenka Razin," accordingly, deploys the life and death of the fine old brigand who names it, in particular his battle with the Volga, won by the mighty river, though he flung his mistress for bribe to it. Time and again also the music sings the unforgettable folk-tune of the Volga boatmen tugging at the ropes that haul the ships. A promising programme, if there ever was one.

ALA

Dec 27 BOSTON POST, SATURD 27, 1919 Herald

SYMPHONY OF BRAHMS IS PLAYED

'Mephisto' Waltz and Concerto Also on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The heroic symphony of Brahms in C minor opened the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph Bonnet played the organ in the performance of a Handel concerto in F major for organ and orchestra. Listzt's "Mephisto" waltz brought the end of the concert.

WORK A CLASSIC

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the Brahms symphony showed again what a serious and ardent student of classic masterpieces he is, and the Brahms of the C minor symphony is certainly a classic today, romantic as are many pages of this extraordinary work.

A work so extraordinary in its dramatic outbursts, its frequent passages of nobly lyrical feeling, that one wonders what this first symphony would have turned into had Brahms been just a little less reverential in his attitude toward the orchestra of Beethoven and the virtue of symphonic form. In the first place the music, no matter how sympathetic one feels toward it, seems to cry out for richer and more telling instrumentation.

Then as to form: If only there were not so conscious a girding of the loins in the finale and so lofty an attitude of goodness in the slow movement. We prefer to this movement the slow movement of the second symphony. It is as deep, as reflective, as Brahmsish as anyone could wish, but it is profoundly and intrinsically Brahms, whereas the slow movement of this first symphony appears to us as Brahms rather deliberately donning the toga of Beethoven. It also appears as if Brahms in place of a scherzo which could be grim, domoniac, but lively in pace, was afraid that if in this gray and heroic work he indulged in a scherzo he might by some chance laugh. Perhaps he had in mind a Boston audience when he wrote the movement, for he does not laugh. He goes walking along through the country with a dignified demeanor and an autumnal smile. If there were a little less material in the finale, if the main lines of this great movement were a little less sub-divided in details—details so rich, so important, so intimately related to all the rest—the powerful sweep of the music would be less difficult to maintain.

Shows Understanding

Mr. Monteux, as we have said, shows his depth of understanding of the great symphonic works whenever he touches them. He has a very strong feeling for their proportion, their logic and continuity of thought. Some conductors make a prodigious effect with the introduction of this symphony, then rush madly through the main body of the movement. Mr. Monteux did not exaggerate the characteristics of either section. By admirably chosen tempi he made the entire movement indivisible and also brought out into full relief the lyrical phrases which frequently occur and which are as frequently neglected by conductors. There were new nuances, wholly appropriate to the thought in the slow movement, and beautiful orchestral colors. For us the pace of the third movement was too slow, but there were those who felt that they had heard the right tempo for this movement for the first time in many seasons

Mr. Bonnet rates the Handel concerto very highly. He certainly played the organ beautifully and with musicianly authority, arousing great enthusiasm by his performance. For the writer the high lights of the concerto are the slow movement and the introduction to the last. He finds the opening very commonplace and 'pedestrian in the manner of Handel's time. The fugue is brilliant and well made, and the organ sounds bravely. Mr. Bonnet was recalled fully half a dozen times.

Irreverent by Comparison

Irreverant, if not indelicate, was the pot-house music of Liszt after those eminent worthies, Handel and Brahms, who had preceded him. The "Mephisto" waltz, which Mr. Monteux played with abounding devilry, seemed to stick its tongue in its cheek and make faces at what had gone by. This waltz is pretty "old hat" today. We are no longer alarmed as we listened to music inspired by the scene from Lenau's "Faust," the scene in which Mephistopheles throws Faust into the arms of a black-eyed village wench and fiddles till the very walls totter and turn pale because they cannot join in the dance. Just the same, the opening—Mephistopheles tuning his fiddle—has a flair. Mr. Bedetti's gorgeous tone graced the passage which today is almost maudlin, senile in its sentimentality, its pseudo-amorousness. At such a lover the wench of Lenau would have snapped her fingers. But this one can note and at it marvel: Liszt's amazing mastery of form, his wit, his spirit, his originality in instrumentation, tarnished and tawdry as some of it sounds today, more than half a century after it was conceived. After all, it is the music of a genius.

9TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Compositions by Brahms, Handel and Liszt Prominent on the Program

ORGANIST BONNET WINS APPLAUSE

The program of the ninth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Pierre Monteux, conductor, the first of which was given yesterday in Symphony Hall, follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor; Handel, Concerto in F major No. 4 (organist), Joseph Bonnet; Liszt, "The Dance in the Village Tavern" (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

Undeterred by the holidays, the concert patrons were present in full number to enjoy the good, solid, foundational music of Brahms, Handel and Liszt. Joseph Bonnet, a devoted exponent of the older and finer organ music, is to be commended for choosing the Concerto in F major No. 4, which in no part is "lesser" Handel. It was perhaps Handel's genius that made the display in the first movement plausible and impressive, the ornament felicitous in all its elaboration. The Andante, dignified and serene, is wonderfully rich in treasure, and the final Allegro, nobly ushered in, piles up in power by contrapuntal skill to a high flood of joyousness. Complemented by the singing strings about him, Mr. Bonnet's playing was ideal to the purpose—clean, delicate and poised, always regardful of the ensemble. Judging from the many bows he had to make, he must have provided as much pleasure as many a pianist and singer.

Applause also indicated a great satisfaction in the first Symphony of Brahms, always eagerly returned to, which on this occasion had a robust and sonorous performance. In the famous solo passage for the French horn, Mr. Van Den Berg, newly come to the orchestra from Europe, disclosed a smooth and lustrous tone which fully qualifies him to sit with such distinguished virtuosi as Messrs. Longy, Sand, Laurent and Fradkin, who glorified the exquisite episodes allotted to them, and were again well heard in the music of Liszt. The "Mephisto Waltz" cannot compete with certain symphonic poems if only a tune is desired, but the devil described in it is interesting—the more so for his trumpery and sleight-of-hand. As orchestration the piece remains splendid to hear with effects unsurpassed.

The program for the Symphony concerts of Jan. 2 and 3, follows: Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 5 ("Reformation"); Debussy, "Jeux" ("Play"), danced poem; Glazounoff ("Stenka Razine"), symphonic poem.

Post

Members of Symphony Orchestra Insured

Acting on a recent decision the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for the members of the orchestra to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member. This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, which institution remains as firm, as it is of long standing.

Items and Announcements

It is permissible to hope that when Mr. Bonnet plays his Concerto for organ at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, his instrument may be so placed that his "foot-work" upon the pedals may not be as visible and vivid as it was on like occasion a year ago. Then and in spite of themselves not a few auditors were so impressed and fascinated by this agility that they forgot not only the music in hand but Mr. Bonnet's other and perhaps more essential abilities as organist.

It is definitely settled that the new French pianist, Robert Schmitz, of whom Mr. Monteux thinks highly, will be heard at the Symphony Concerts, probably in February, possibly later in the season. Meanwhile uncertainty overhangs the projected performance of Franck's oratorio, "The Beatitudes," by the Symphony Orchestra and the Symphony Chorus. Mr. Monteux thought of the concerts of Holy Week as becoming occasion, but various circumstances counsel another time.

Herald Dec 28

CONCERT NOTES

At the Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performances of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since this highly praised score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song" ("Ay Ouchem") as a principal theme.

America Dec 27

NEW DEBUSSY AT SYMPHONY

Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play") will have its first performances in America at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Since Pierre Monteux also gave the piece its first public performance, under the personal supervision of the composer, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts, Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony (No. 5). The closing number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Globe Dec. 28

Debussy's "Jeux" at the Next Symphony Concerts

At the Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performances of Debussy's "Jeux ("Play"). Since this score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr Monteux, under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts Mr Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song," "Ay Ouchem," as a principal theme.

Post Dec

DEBUSSY'S "PLAY" AT SYMPHONY

At the Boston Symphony concerts to take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the initial American performance of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since this highly praised score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. To open this pair of concerts Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song" ("Ay Ouchem") as a principal theme.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Debussy's Ballet-Music, "Jeux," for the First Times in America—Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" to Be Resurrected—Glazunov's Vivid Tone-Poem, "Stenka Razin," Timely Revived—Miss Baird as Pianist and the Freakish Rosenblatt

OUR severest youth may not reproach Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with lack of novelty. He begins with Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," now seldom played anywhere and unheard in Boston for three-and-thirty years. Even the composer himself came to think ill of his child, born in 1830 on commission for a celebration of the ter-centenary of the adoption of the Augsburg Confession by German Protestants. Darkest England seldom hears the "Reformation Symphony," and elsewhere by common consent conductors have put it by. When Mr. Monteux has concluded these rites he will pass to a very different sort of music, the ballet, "Jeux," written by Debussy to oblige Mr. Diaghilev, the director of th Russian dancers, linked to a "choreographic action" devised by Nijinsky and clothed in a setting by Bakst. By common consent Nijinsky's "action" was at odds with the contours, the rhythms and the implications generally of the music. For these were the days when the dancer was enamored of angular and arbitrary poses. Mr. Monteux, therefore, does well to play the piece as a tone-poem, with a prefatory "argument." It has been so played in Paris; it will be so played in Boston for the first times in America. By hint of the score the music runs brightly, gracefully, charmingly in crossed rhythms, interwoven melody and light and glinting harmonic and instrumental color. But of it particularly and of "Jeux" in general, there will be more time and ampler space in which to write next week. Finally, Mr. Monteux proposes Glazunov's early tone-poem, long and undeservedly fallen from the active repertory of the Symphony Orchestra, "Stenka Razin," written when the composer preferred Russian rather than German ways and suggestion in music-making and conned the legends of his country for spur to his imagination. "Stenka Razin," accordingly, deploys the life and death of the fine old brigand who names it, in particular his battle with the Volga, won by the mighty river, though he flung his mistress for bribe to it. Time and again also the music sings the unforgettable folk-tune of the Volga boatmen tugging at the ropes that haul the ships. A promising programme, if there ever was one.

Monitor Dec 27

The Music of Boston

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place on December 26 with the following program:

Brahms—Symphony No. 1.
Handel—Organ concerto No. 4 in F major.
Liszt—Second episode from Lenau's Faust (Mephisto Waltz).
Joseph Bonnet was the soloist.

Yesterday's performance of the symphony was the first since November 10, 1916 and is was interesting to note its effect after so long an interval. It would seem that one either admires Brahms' music warmly or coldly respects it. Those who are moved by admiration must have felt that admiration increased after yesterday, and those who are moved by respect must have felt their respect, let us hope, not diminished. The playing of the symphony could have aroused nothing but enthusiasm. The whole conception of the piece both on the part of the conductor and the orchestra was clear and the execution well balanced.

The more we hear of Handel's music the more we regret that there are still so many of his compositions which are neglected—arias, orchestral pieces, concertos—a perfect mine of beautiful music awaiting discovery by some musical adventurer. The concerto for the organ was a delight from beginning to end—that is as played by Mr. Bonnet, who gave the needed grace and charm to its flowing eighteenth century phrases. His registration contained many happy effects, especially near the close of the andante, and he displayed throughout the work the qualities of taste and refinement for which he is so justly renowned. Liszt's Mephisto Waltz brought the program to a brilliant close. Little by little we are beginning to realize Liszt's greatness as a composer—perhaps the greatest of the romantic school—and we are gradually coming to see him as a great innovator in harmonic and orchestral coloring, the originator of many of the devices deemed novel by present-day composers. As we are introduced to one so-called novel effect after another in the music of the moderns, it becomes more and more interesting to trace their origins in the music of the great Abbé. The performance was brilliant, rhythmic and poetic and proved Mr. Monteux's fine understanding of Liszt's music, if further proof were needed after his superlatively fine reading of "Les Préludes" earlier in the season.

Globe Dec 27

BONNET SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Parisian Organist Assists in Handel Concerto

Joseph Bonnet, organist of the Church of Saint Eustache in Paris, was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. He is well known in Boston from several appearances here in recitals and as soloist at a pair of Symphony concerts last season. A note which he contributed to the program book explains that he has made very few additions and changes in Handel's score of the Concerto in F major, op 4, no 4.

He deserves commendation for thus refraining from introducing the modern "improvements" in the shape of an augmented orchestration and "brilliant" cadenzas which disfigure so many performances of 18th century music nowadays. His technical skill is phenomenal. Few indeed are the organists who can play legato passages deftly and rapidly without blurring a single note, and without lapses into staccato.

His runs are like those of a great pianist bent on perfecting his technique. But the technical problems of organ playing seems to absorb most of his attention. He neglects nuances in his interpretation.

The real feature was the Brahms Symphony in C minor, No. 1. It seems almost incredible that the supposed dullness and crudeness of Brahms should ever have lent point to the jest that the fire escapes in Symphony Hall ought to be labeled "This way out in case of Brahms." Yet the vehement applause which compelled the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment as the end came mainly from the younger portion of the audience, to whom, of course, that composer seems thoroughly comparable to Beethoven, Bach and Wagner, and as surely immortal as any one of the three.

The finale of the symphony, which shows the influence of the symphonic poems of the romantic composers in its comparative freedom of structure, surpasses them all both in perfection of workmanship and in emotional intensity. It needs no literary program or rhapsodic commentary to make it enthralling. It is more powerful, if less perfect, than the other symphonic movement, which is the highest achievement of Brahms, the first one is his Fourth Symphony, a masterpiece of construction.

Mr Monteux' interpretation showed that he felt strongly and understood perfectly the power of the themes. In development passages, however, he often quickened the tempo and sometimes chopped up the phrases, either through nervousness or in a mistaken endeavor for expressiveness.

The true eloquence comes from steady lengthening and broadening of the phrases. The episodes must be subordinated to the total effect of the whole movement. Halt at least of the excellence of Dr Muck as a conductor of such music was due to his perception of the fact that the variety in great symphonic movements is there only because it really contributes to their essential unity.

Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played. This program will be repeated tonight. At the concerts next week Mendelssohn's forgotten "Reformation" Symphony will be revived, Debussy's "Jeux" will be given for the first times in America, and Glazounoff "Stenka Razine" will be played for the first time at these concerts.

Elson Reviews Music Events of Year

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

AS there is no secular music to record this week, it may be fitting to sum up the chief events that have occurred in Boston during the past year and see how they compare with previous seasons.

M Rabaud took leave of us and of our symphony orchestra with a program of special dullness, excellently played. Anything more tiresome than St. Saens' 'Lyre and Harp' we do not care to hear. But even if some of his programs were heavy, M. Rabaud left a splendid impressin an dwas notable for the excellent balance of tone which he elicited from the orchestra.

But M. Monteux is far and away the better program-maker, although he shines best in the dramatic and sensational in music. In such works as Schmitt's "Salome," Balakireff's "Thamar," Stravinsky's "Firebird," etc., he was distinctly in advance of his predecessors. In Schumann and Brahms we did not find him to be a rival of Muck or those before him. The programmes are more interesting than they have been for a long time.

Among the soloists at these concerts Madeleine Brard, who appeared at a Pension Fund Concert, made the most striking impression. A young miss of sixteen, and looking even younger, she played St. Saens' G minor piano concerto in a manner that excelled the composer himself in the work.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct the first American performances of Debussy's "Jeux." Since this highly praised score had its first public performance at the hands of Mr. Monteux under the personal supervision of Debussy himself, who told him in detail how it should be interpreted, an authoritative reading may be expected. Mr. Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5. The closing piece will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," notable for its use of the "Volga Bargemen's Song" ("Ay Ouchem") as a principal theme.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE AFTERNOON OF BRAHMS AND BONNET

Mr. Monteux Succeeds Well, in Spite of Occasional Shortcomings, with the German's First and Eloquent Symphony—The Organist Exalts a Concerto by Haendel Already Exalted, and Last Liszt as Devil's Advocate in Devil's Dance

WHEN, at the Symphony Concerts, the new régime of French conductors succeeded the old régime of German, there was ominous shaking of heads among the devotees hereabouts of the music of Brahms. We shall never hear it again, they said one to another lamenting. For in the Teutonic view or the pseudo-Teutonic view—both not unknown in and around concert-halls in these United States—it is unthinkable that a French conductor should, of his own motion, play one, two or three of Brahms's symphonic pieces. If he did so, continued the mourners, striking appropriate attitudes around the bust of the Founder and Sustainer on the easterly side of Symphony Hall, he would yield only to the traditions of the orchestra or to the obvious expectation of its public. None the less, a symphony by Brahms—the pleasurable second—graced one of Mr. Rabaud's programmes last winter, while, yesterday, the more stirring first began the music of the afternoon. Between whiles, it may be recalled, Brahms's second Concerto for piano and orchestra was somehow squeezed into the commemorative concerts a week after the death of Mr. Higginson. By report of kinsfolk and friends he liked the piece. There is not a whit less reason to believe that Mr. Rabaud liked the second symphony and Mr. Monteux the first, though, doubtless, either conductor made his choice with thought of a rounded repertory for a long series of concerts. Neither, it is safe to say, chose his symphony perfunctorily or with uneasy notion of obligation. The deepest-dyed "Brahmsianer" as the Germans say, need have no fear for the future of his favorite composer at the Symphony Concerts, even if that composer's name recur not quite so frequently on programmes as it did in the days of Gericke, Fiedler and Muck. There are others—interesting others—whose names have hardly recurred at all under those dispensations. Mr. Monteux makes diligent and fruitful quest for them.

Moreover, Mr. Rabaud's version of the second symphony and Mr. Monteux's version of the first gave distinct pleasure to open-minded hearers. Mr. Rabaud's in particular, was a notably individualized performance that lent a grace, a charm, a sentiment to the music that many a conductor, more Teutonico, had overlooked. After all, Brahms, light-voiced and seemingly fanciful, was good to hear. In turn, Mr. Monteux's version of the first symphony yesterday, had clear merits and yielded unmistakable satisfactions, even if his was a less individualized "reading" of the music in hand than was Mr. Rabaud's. The relative pace of different conductors with a symphony played at long intervals, is a "pesky" thing to recollect. Possibly, Mr. Monteux took the first movement, especially at the beginning, somewhat more swiftly than Dr. Muck used to do, and with no appreciable gain—indeed with some loss—of eloquence. Possibly also, the Parisian correspondingly stayed the pace of the Andante, but here with audible advantage to the music. Indeed, the longest memory may hardly recall this slow movement played with such loveliness of tone, quiet grace of progress and contrast and suffused melancholy of mood as it was yesterday by Pierre Monteux of Paris and, as it fortunately happens, of other parts of Europe and a section of America.

On the other hand, the conductor missed the rhythmic life, the upspringing elasticity, the leaping exuberance with which the joyous finale can be and, in the ears of many of his hearers, has been, made to sound. Yet with this reservation and even another over certain harsh tumults of sound in the first movement, Mr. Monteux's "reading" gave recurring pleasure. He caught the streaming progress, the rich harmonic coloring of the very first measures of the symphony; nor did he lack freedom or eloquence with the moody transitions that follow; while especially vivid was he in the return of motivs or melody. The Scherzo moved in the shadowy harmonic mist and at the pensive pace altogether characteristic of Brahms. In the celebrated preluding to the Finale Mr. Monteux gained distinctly more tonal suspense than he did in the like transition in Beethoven's fifth symphony. Over-drive the brass as he sometimes will, thicken as he now and then does outline and coloring, he was steadily graphic and often eloquent with this symphony in C minor. If adroit detailing and a conductor's little characterizing touches upon a cherished music were missing, the larger contours, the opener progress, the ampler eloquence of Brahms stood clear. Moreover, at every turn, the orchestra seconded the leader. The strings were a marvel of soft-textured and luminous tone through the Andante, the wood-winds were of like quality; while the new horn-player, Mr. van den Berg, clearly knows the secrets of Brahms's pet instrumental coloring.

Then ensued what to many a hearer was the event of the day. Once more an organist was "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, and an organist of no less proved quality and deserved reputation than Mr. Bonnet, virtuoso of strange fortunes in this town of ours. First he played in a church to an audience of fellow-organists and students of the organ. Next he advanced to a Concerto and, possibly, miscellaneous pieces, at a concert for a war-charity and found himself cut abruptly short by the relentless fuel-dictator. Then others than organists filled a church to hear him; and now, this season as last, he is in full vogue at the Symphony Concerts. Intent silence while he played, loud applause when he had ended, once more attested the public interest and the public favor. Fortunate, however, were the connoisseurs in the music that Mr. Bonnet finally played—Händel's Concerto in F major (Op. 4, No. 4) in lieu of the announced Concerto in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4). He played it, moreover, with no more than the original accompaniment of strings and oboes that Händel himself put, almost completely, to paper. From him so choosing, so playing, many a listener heard for the first time the pure voice of the organ, unalloyed, unclouded, unforced, sensuously beautiful upon the ear and spiritually beautiful upon the imagination.

Far enough is this Concerto from the bedaubed, bespangled, pseudo-orchestral, altogether displayful stuff that many a modern organist intricately and besottedly writes. Hardly less remote was it from the organ as the sentimentalized instrument of "Meditations," "Adorations" and "Visions," wherein one suspects the late Monsieur Massenet, fresh from "Thais" and "Le Jongleur," as persistent organist. Here in Händel's Concerto was limpid beauty of melodic line, occasional loveliness of sparing ornament, the controlled voice of instrumental song now upswelling, but still measured, or else in subdued and pensive glow. The little orchestra wrought its contrasts; the organist wove and colored his patterns; now and again they joined their voices; while once to him alone fell the measures, leading into the Finale, wherein Händel's gentle exaltation rises highest. For here is no music of the bewigged and striding Händel composing pompous Concerti Grossi or ceremonial ode and anthem for the proud and pursy nobility and gentry of a Georgian England; but a Händel achieving the spiritual beauty that may dwell in music and that the voice of the organ may impart and intensify. And here also was Mr. Bonnet, for the time no virtuoso-organist, but priest to summon that beauty by the devotion of head and heart, by the skill of unnoted hand and half-hidden foot out of the shrine in which it waited. Yet doing so, he was the more the master-organist. Seldom has the pure voice of music in spirit and in truth been so lifted in Symphony Hall as it was in this organ-concerto of yesterday.

Last, as in certain ceremonies of the mediæval church, came the turn of the Devil's Advocate. Needless almost, to say, Liszt was at hand to play the part; while the costume that he wore on this occasion was the familiar music of the orchestral the rustic merry-makers filled the tavern with their clumsy romping. Again there was something uncanny in the air, as well as in the empty fifths of the double-basses. Again the hand and the spirit of the fiend somehow penetrated the music. Once more, the violoncello intoned its sensual measures, thrust into the tonal mass like a bold caress. Once more the oboe touched in the sting of voluptuous delights. Loud in the tuba guffawed Mephistopheles and in the tumult out into the woods Faust swept Lenau's willing girl of the black hair. Music of diabolic as well as sensual beat and tang, if the hearer chooses so to regard it—music that once shocked the blue-eyed fathers of symphony concerts in this town. The diabolic in tones, however, has gone a deal farther since the days of the quavering Dwight, since the days, even, of Liszt himself. Strauss has tried his hand at it and so has a certain Monsieur Ravel—each with no slight success and with no little response from the children of darkness, dwelling in this twentieth century. The "Mephisto Waltz," however, remains a vividly theatrical music and with such pieces Mr. Monteux excels.

H. T. PARKER

NEW YORK ESTABLISHED 1881

From Hartford, Conn.

JAN 13 1920

AUDIENCE SEES FAMILIAR FACES

But Boston Orchestra Lacks Musical Quality of Former Days.

DISAPPOINTMENT AT PARSONS'S CONCERT

New Conductor Doesn't Measure Up to Stature of Predecessors.

(BY JULIUS HARTT.)

What's in a name? Everything. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, attracted an audience to Parsons's theater, Monday evening, that completely filled the edifice. Last evening's concert was the first appearance in Hartford of this renowned organization under its new regime. Interest was therefore keen to see and to hear the new conductor and his reorganized

JAN 10 1920

From Post Express
Rochester, N. Y.

Orchestral Clash Threatens.

Do not be surprised if some nearby morning you read about a free-for-all contest among New York's symphony orchestras to secure the best players. Only a few weeks ago I wrote about the New Symphony's needs. It now appears that Artur Bodanzky is putting under contract for next season some of the finest musicians who at present are numbered among the rival organizations. There is a world of money behind the New Symphony, and Bodanzky's instantaneous success in the concert field is exerting its effect upon susceptible players.

The Philharmonic, the New York, the New and the visiting Boston and Philadelphia Symphony orchestras have been falling over one another with their concerts. Still, the patronage holds to its high mark. The "sold-out" sign is becoming weather-beaten enough to bring happiness to managerial hearts. And Sergei Rachmaninoff may celebrate somewhat, for his compositions are finding a place on the programmes of all the leading orchestras.

Fritz Kreisler and Eddy Brown, violinists, and Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot and Rosita Renard, pianists, have been the principal soloists. Cortot is still the polished French artist who made a sterling impression at his previous appearances here. The critics have had many kind words for the conducting of Bodanzky and Stokowski, of the New and the Philadelphia orchestras. Walter Damrosch likewise won some praise for his reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Pierre Monteux, of the Boston band, and the Philharmonic's Josef Stransky, occupied the "back seats."

...ork City

JAN 11 1920

The Russian "Cockerel of Gold Bird" at the Metropolitan O

Following hard upon the caging of Albert Wolff's operatic "Blue Bird" at the Metropolitan, Director Gatti-Casazza has released Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Golden Cockerel" from its pre-season captivity and sent it on its gilded flight last Friday evening through the current repertoire. This introductory sentence is not meant to imply that what follows will be in the nature of a comparison or contrast of the respective merits or demerits of the two operas. If "Le Coq d'Or" finds greater favor with the populace and is found vastly more entertaining we will credit the gay and sun-flamed plumage of the Russian bird for the achievement.

Coming to Friday's performance, several notable changes among the principal participants since last year were observed. The most important of these was the introduction of Artur Bodanzky as conductor, replacing Pierre Monteux, who now leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The writer, for one, has never been able to see any more in Monteux than an amiable and unperturbed gentleman who was also a devout musician. But as an operatic conductor, we deem other natural assets to be essential.

To state then that we regard Bodanzky as far superior in... is to give voice to... our expressi... feigned ...

...ics have extended over a period covering almost the entire history of the organization. Perhaps no other single agency has done so much to familiarize the community with the finest standards and ideals of musical performance. And there was every indication last evening that the great audience which greeted the Boston orchestra welcomed its re-entry into the local concert field with the warmest feelings of appreciation and long established friendship.

There are many new faces among the players, many old ones. Some of the veterans who have filled honored places in the orchestra for many years are still there to bridge the gap between the past and the present. Alwin Schroeder, the voice of whose 'cello has touched the hearts of unnumbered thousands, still by his presence evokes memories of the golden days of this orchestra. Otto Roth, accomplished violinist, sterling artist, and musician through and through, still sits in his place among the first violins where once he touched shoulders with Kneisel. Loeffler, Adamowski and others whose names call up the achievements of the Boston Symphony orchestra in all that is true and beautiful in orchestral art. Georges Longy, for many years one of the conspicuous ornaments of the orchestra, still gives his oboe almost entrancing voice. Enough of the old players are left to save the orchestra from the appearance of strangeness. And for old friends of the organization this is comforting and reassuring.

The program presented last evening included the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Caesar Franck's tone poem "The Wild Horseman," MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, with Leo Ornstein as soloist, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Considering this performance solely on its actual merits it must regretfully be admitted that this concert was a disappointment. The great qualities that so long distinguished the playing of this band and made it pre-eminent among the orchestras of the world were for the most part depressingly absent, or, if present, present more by suggestion than by actual performance. There was woeful falling away from the technical perfection that so long distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, woeful falling off in ensemble, finesse and elegance. There was an obvious slackening of disciplinary standards that bodes serious ill if it is not soon corrected. The fruits of Gericke's years of rigorous and tireless drill bid fair to be wasted. Which were an infinite pity. Karl Muck, the man, is unspeakable. But Karl Muck, the conductor, is among the most consummate masters of the conductor's art of his own or any other time. And while for one reason or another Dr. Muck during the later years of his regime allowed the standards of the Boston Symphony orchestra to slip backward it is beyond belief that Dr. Muck would ever have tolerated a performance from his players so flagrantly coarse and crude as last evening's performance often was. Mr. Monteux has won his laurels as a conductor of grand opera. His work with the Boston orchestra has been praised in Boston and in New York. It is Mr. Monteux's great good fortune in this era of influence for everything French to be a Frenchman. But all good Frenchmen are not necessarily good conductors any more than all bad Germans are necessarily bad conductors. And has

---

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Hartford, Conn.
JAN 17 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Appreciation of Its Concert by Musical Club of Hartford.

To the Editor of The Times:

Will you give space in your paper for a few words of appreciation of the Boston Symphony concert from the Musical club?

The general expression of opinion at the open meeting this week was that of enjoyment of the very musical spirit pervading all the orchestral numbers. The fact that there were many new members in the organization and that they have been working under M. Monteux so short a time might naturally make a thinking musician expect some flaws and a lack of the precision for which this orchestra has been so noted. That there was so little to criticise in these respects gave to the concert a delightful element of surprise; and actual refreshment was given to a large number of the club members who were present.

We would like to voice our recognition of the art and charm in the Symphony which sounded very much like the interpretation of Theodore Thomas, which some of our older members remember with great pleasure.

May we have another Boston Symphony concert soon.

MUSICAL CLUB OF HARTFORD.
Viola Vanderbeek, Pres.
Marguerite Holcombe, Sec.
Hartford, January 14.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 19 1920

GROUP INSURANCE $500,000,000 MARK

One Company Alone Showed 25 Percent Increase in 1919. 400,000 Persons Covered.

Figures now available on the growth of group life insurance during last year show that one company alone had 250 percent more group insurance in force in 1919 than in 1918. This company was the Travelers, which will show, in its record of 1919, $150,000,000 group insurance in force, compared with $42,000,000 in 1918. It is stated that all companies handling this form of insurance have policies outstanding amounting to $500,000,000. The Travelers has covered 400,000 persons by group policies.

Where did the business come from? Corporations in all parts of the country have been taking up group insurance for their employees, on the theory, confirmed by practice, that it is good business. Here are some of the companies that have recently purchased group sickness and accident insurance for their employees in the Travelers: The American Woolen Company, National Spun Silk Company, Maine Coated Paper Company and allied companies of Rumford, Me., with approximately 1,500 employees; Colonial Knitting Mills, Inc. of Philadelphia, California Hotel Company, Pasadena, Cal.; Rosendale Foundry & Machine Company, Pittsburgh; Utah Oil Refining Co., Salt Lake City, Utah; Railway & Industrial Engineering Company, Greensburg, Pa.; French & Heald Company, Milford, N. H.; Osborn Machine Com-

---

...om JAN 4 1920
Commercial Appeal
Memphis, Tenn.

Memorial Concert for Mayor Higginson.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently observed the passing of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, former mayor of the city, with a memorial programme.

The musical offering of the evening was made up of favorite compositions of the late mayor's, including "Schubert's Unfinished Symphony," Beethoven's familiar C minor symphony and Braham's Concerto in B flat, for piano and orchestra.

The soloist of the occasion was Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, who, heartily in sympathy with the occasion, threw himself in the breach caused by Harold Bauer's refusal to participate in the memorial exercises two days before the concert.

While Mr. Higginson bequeathed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his musical scores, instruments and library, valued at about $75,000, great disappointment was felt that he did not arrange a permanent endowment fund for the organization, his widow,

---

Director of Census.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From
Hartford, Conn.
JAN 17 1920

"Charles Jerome Edwards, ... of the Equitable Life in Brooklyn, ... ognizing the benefits and broad ap... cation of group life insurance, ... wishing to demonstrate his appre... tion of the ability and fidelity of ... men and women who make up ... staff, has insured the life of ... agent under contract, as well as ... clerk and assistant, by a policy wh... covers them for insurance for ... amount approximating the first y... commissions or salary earned du... the year, with $2,500 as the maxim... insurance. Mr. Edwards thus ... proves the adage that 'shoemak... children go unshod.' The fact tha... insurance is on a graduating basis, ... the larger the agent's commissions ... larger his insurance, will be sur... stimulate effort and secure persis... production. A period of six mon... service is necessary to qualify a ... agent or employee, upon which re... the year's insurance will be based.

* * *

Boston Symphony Insured.

An interesting item in group in... ance is the covering of the Bo... Symphony Orchestra, as noted in... Insurance Press: "A wider fiel... application for group insurance ... suggested by the $100,000 group p... taken out by the board of truste... the Boston Symphony Orchestra ... all the musicians, covering death ... total disability of any member. T... benefits are in addition to the per... fund, maintained by special con... and contributions."

* * *

Atkinson Agency's Record.

General life insurance busi... made by strides in 1919, as re... new being issued show, and Broo... business was well to the front.

Brooklyn agency of the Northwes... Mutual, conducted by James F. ... William F. Atkinson, report an ... crease of 110 percent in 1919 bus... compared with the previous year. ... agency's total paid-for production ... 1919 was $3,281,500 against $1,56... in 1918.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE AFTERNOON OF BRAHMS AND BONNET

Mr. Monteux Succeeds Well, in Spite of Occasional Shortcomings, with the German's First and Eloquent Symphony—The Organist Exalts a Concerto by Hacndel Already Exalted, and Last Liszt as Devil's Advocate in Devil's Dance

WHEN, at the Symphony Concerts, the new régime of French conductors succeeded the old régime of German, there was ominous shaking of heads among the devotees hereabouts of the music of Brahms. We shall never hear it again, they said one to another lamenting. For in the Teutonic view or the pseudo-Teutonic view—both not unknown in and around concert-halls in these United States—it is unthinkable that a French conductor should, of his own motion, play one, two or three of Brahms's symphonic pieces. If he did so, continued the mourners, striking appropriate attitudes around the bust of the Founder and Sustainer on the easterly side of Symphony Hall, he would yield only to the traditions of the orchestra or to the obvious expectation of its public. None the less, a symphony by Brahms—the pleasurable second—graced one of Mr. Rabaud's programmes last winter, while, yesterday, the more stirring first began the music of the afternoon. Between whiles, it may be recalled, Brahms's second Concerto for piano and orchestra was somehow squeezed into the commemorative concerts a week after the death of Mr. Higginson. By report of kinsfolk and friends he liked the piece. There is not a whit less reason to believe that Mr. Rabaud liked the second symphony and Mr. Monteux the first, though, doubtless, either conductor made his choice with thought of a rounded repertory for a long series of concerts. Neither, it is safe to say, chose his symphony perfunctorily or with uneasy notion of obligation. The deepest-dyed "Brahmsianer" as the Germans say, need have no fear for the future of his favorite composer at the Symphony Concerts, even if that composer's name recur not quite so frequently on programmes as it did in the days of Gericke, Fiedler and Muck. There are others—interesting others—whose names have hardly recurred at all under those dispensations. Mr. Monteux makes diligent and fruitful quest for them.

Moreover,, Mr. Rabaud's version of the second symphony and Mr. Monteux's version of the first gave distinct pleasure to open-minded hearers. Mr. Rabaud's in particular, was a notably individualized performance that lent a grace, a charm, a sentiment to the music that many a conductor, more Teutonico, had overlooked. After all, Brahms, light-voiced and seemingly fanciful, was good to hear. In turn, Mr. Monteux's version of the first symphony yesterday, had clear merits and yielded unmistakable satisfactions, even if it was a less individualized "reading" of the music in hand than was Mr. Rabaud's. The relative pace of different conductors with a symphony played at long intervals, is a "pesky" thing to recollect. Possibly, Mr. Monteux took the first movement, especially at the beginning, somewhat more swiftly than Dr. Muck used to do, and with no appreciable gain—indeed with some loss—of eloquence. Possibly also, the Parisian correspondingly delayed the pace of the Andante, but here with audible advantage to the music. Indeed, the longest memory may hardly recall this slow movement played with such tenderness of tone, quiet grace of progress and contrast and suffused melancholy of mood as it was yesterday by Pierre Monteux of Paris and, as it fortunately happens, of other parts of Europe and a section of America.

On the other hand, the conductor missed the rhythmic life, the upspringing elasticity, the leaping exuberance with which the joyous finale can be and, in the ears of many of his hearers, has been, made to sound. Yet with this reservation and even another over certain harsh tumults of sound in the first movement, Mr. Monteux's "reading" gave recurring pleasure. He caught the streaming progress, the rich harmonic coloring of the very first measures of the symphony; nor did he lack freedom or eloquence with the moody transitions that follow; while especially vivid was he in the return of motivs or melody. The Scherzo moved in the shadowy harmonic mist and at the pensive pace altogether characteristic of Brahms. In the celebrated preluding to the Finale Mr. Monteux gained distinctly more tonal suspense than he did in the like transition in Beethoven's fifth symphony. Over-drive the brass as he sometimes will, thicken as he now and then does outline and coloring, he was steadily graphic and often eloquent with this symphony in C minor. If adroit detailing and a conductor's little characterizing touches upon a cherished music were missing, the larger contours, the opener progress, the ampler eloquence of Brahms stood clear. Moreover, at every turn, the orchestra seconded the leader. The strings were a marvel of soft-textured and luminous tone through the Andante, the wood-winds were of like quality; while the new horn-player, Mr. van den Berg, clearly knows the secrets of Brahms's pet instrumental coloring.

Then ensued what to many a hearer was the event of the day. Once more an organist was "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, and an organist of no less proved quality and deserved reputation than Mr. Bonnet, virtuoso of strange fortunes in this town of ours. First he played in a church to an audience of fellow-organists and students of the organ. Next he advanced to a Concerto and, possibly, miscellaneous pieces, at a concert for a war-charity and found himself cut abruptly short by the relentless fuel-dictator. Then others than organists filled a church to hear him; and now, this season as last, he is in full vogue at the Symphony Concerts. Intent silence while he played, loud applause when he had ended, once more attested the public interest and the public favor. Fortunate, however, were the connoisseurs in the music that Mr. Bonnet finally played—Händel's Concerto in F major (Op. 4, No. 4) in lieu of the announced Concerto in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4). He played it, moreover, with no more than the original accompaniment of strings and oboes that Händel himself put, almost completely, to paper. From him so choosing, so playing, many a listener heard for the first time the pure voice of the organ, unalloyed, unclouded, unforced, sensuously beautiful upon the ear and spiritually beautiful upon the imagination.

Far enough is this Concerto from the bedaubed, bespangled, pseudo-orchestral, altogether displayful stuff that many a modern organist intricately and besottedly writes. Hardly less remote was it from the organ as the sentimentalized instrument of "Meditations," "Adorations" and "Visions," wherein one suspects the late Monsieur Massenet, fresh from "Thais" and "Le Jongleur," as persistent organist. Here in Händel's Concerto was limpid beauty of melodic line, occasional loveliness of sparing ornament, the controlled voice of instrumental song now upswelling, but still measured, or else in subdued and pensive glow. The little orchestra wrought its contrasts; the organist wove and colored his patterns; now and again they joined their voices; while once to him alone fell the measures, leading into the Finale, wherein Händel's gentle exaltation rises highest. For here is no music of the bewigged and striding Händel composing pompous Concerti Grossi or ceremonial ode and anthem for the proud and pursy nobility and gentry of a Georgian England; but a Händel achieving the spiritual beauty that may dwell in music and that the voice of the organ may impart and intensify. And here also was Mr. Bonnet, for the time no virtuoso-organist, but priest to summon that beauty by the devotion of head and heart, by the skill of unnoted hand and half-hidden foot out of the shrine in which it waited. Yet doing so, he was the more the master-organist. Seldom has the pure voice of music in spirit and in truth been so lifted in Symphony Hall as it was in this organ-concerto of yesterday.

Last, as in certain ceremonies of the mediæval church, came the turn of the Devil's Advocate. Needless almost, to say, Liszt was at hand to play the part; while the costume that he wore on this occasion was the familiar music of the orchestral rustic merry-makers filled the tavern with their clumsy romping. Again there was something uncanny in the air, as well as in the empty fifths of the double-basses. Again the hand and the spirit of the fiend somehow penetrated the music. Once more, the violoncello intoned its sensual measures, thrust into the tonal mass like a bold caress. Once more the oboe touched in the sting of voluptuous delights. Loud in the tuba guffawed Mephistopheles and in the tumult out into the woods Faust swept Lenau's willing girl of the black hair. Music of diabolic as well as sensual beat and tang, if the hearer chooses so to regard it—music that once shocked the blue-eyed fathers of symphony concerts in this town. The diabolic in tones, however, has gone a deal farther since the days of the quavering Dwight, since the days, even, of Liszt himself. Strauss has tried his hand at it and so has a certain Monsieur Ravel—each with no slight success and with no little response from the children of darkness, dwelling in this twentieth century. The "Mephisto Waltz," however, remains a vividly theatrical music and with such pieces Mr. Monteux excels.

H. T. PARKER

NEW YORK ... ESTABLISHED 1881

From ... JAN 13 1920

AUDIENCE SEES FAMILIAR FACES

But Boston Orchestra Lacks Musical Quality of Former Days.

DISAPPOINTMENT AT PARSONS'S CONCERT

New Conductor Doesn't Measure Up to Stature of Predecessors.

(BY JULIUS HARTT.)

What's in a name? Everything. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, attracted an audience to Parsons's theater, Monday evening, that completely filled the edifice. Last evening's concert was the first appearance in Hartford of this renowned organization under its new regime. Interest was therefore keen to see and to hear the new conductor and his reorganized ...

From Post Express
Rochester, N. Y.

Orchestral Clash Threatens.

Do not be surprised if some nearby morning you read about a free-for-all contest among New York's symphony orchestras to secure the best players. Only a few weeks ago I wrote about the New Symphony's needs. It now appears that Artur Bodanzky is putting under contract for next season some of the finest musicians who at present are numbered among the rival organizations. There is a world of money behind the New Symphony, and Bodanzky's instantaneous success in the concert field is exerting its effect upon susceptible players.

The Philharmonic, the New York, the New and the visiting Boston and Philadelphia Symphony orchestras have been falling over one another with their concerts. Still, the patronage holds to its high mark. The "sold-out" sign is becoming weather-beaten enough to bring happiness to managerial hearts. And Sergei Rachmaninoff may celebrate somewhat, for his compositions are finding a place on the programmes of all the leading orchestras.

Fritz Kreisler and Eddy Brown, violinists, and Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot and Rosita Renard, pianists, have been the principal soloists. Cortot is still the polished French artist who made a sterling impression at his previous appearances here. The critics have had many kind words for the conducting of Bodanzky and Stokowski, of the New and the Philadelphia orchestras. Walter Damrosch likewise won some praise for his reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Pierre Monteux, of the Boston band, and the Philharmonic's Josef Stransky, occupied the "back seats."

From JAN 4 1920
Commercial Appeal
Memphis, Tenn.

Memorial Concert for Mayor Higginson.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently observed the passing of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, former mayor of the city, with a memorial programme.

The musical offering of the evening was made up of favorite compositions of the late mayor's, including "Schubert's Unfinished Symphony," Beethoven's familiar C minor symphony and Braham's Concerto in B flat, for piano and orchestra.

The soloist of the occasion was Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, who, heartily in sympathy with the occasion, threw himself in the breach caused by Harold Bauer's refusal to participate in the memorial exercises two days before the concert.

While Mr. Higginson bequeathed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his musical scores, instruments and library, valued at about $75,000, great disappointment was felt that he did not arrange a permanent endowment fund for the organization, his widow,

Director of Census.

[redacted]

...w York City

The Russian "Cockerel of Gold ... Bird" at the Metropolitan O...

Following hard upon the caging of Albert Wolff's operatic "Blue Bird" at the Metropolitan, Director Gatti-Casazza has released Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Golden Cockerel" from its pre-season captivity and sent it on its gilded flight last Friday evening through the current repertoire. This introductory sentence is not meant to imply that what follows will be in the nature of a comparison or contrast of the respective merits or demerits of the two operas. If "Le Coq d'Or" finds greater favor with the populace and is found vastly more entertaining we will credit the gay and sun-flamed plumage of the Russian bird for the achievement.

Coming to Friday's performance, several notable changes among the principal participants since last year were observed. The most important of these was the introduction of Artur Bodanzky as conductor, replacing Pierre Monteux, who now leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The writer, for one, has never been able to see any more in Monteux than an amiable and unperturbed gentleman who was also a devout musician. But as an operatic conductor, we deem other natural assets to be essential.

To state then that we reg... danzky as far superior ... is to give voice to ... our expressi... feigned ... mar...

...tions as a symphonic conductor ... upon last evening's performance it must ruefully be admitted, if unbiased candor and judgment are to prevail, that Mr. Monteux comes a long way from measuring up to the stature of the men who have preceded him at the conductor's desk of the Boston orchestra. It is of course possible that last night was an off-night to which solo performers and ensemble players are alike subject. It is, of course, to be remembered that the orchestra includes many new players and that Mr. Monteux's day with the organization is as yet fairly young. But too great a burden may not be laid upon charity.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Fifth symphony was singularly dull and uninspired. A certain respect for conventionality quite characteristically French was advertised, a kind of musicianship admirable in itself when fired with imagination and spontenity but on this occasion dead and lusterless as pedantry always is. Mr. Monteux did indeed erect the shape of the Fifth symphony. He decorated it with ingratiating, indigenous and musicianly detail. But he gave it no soul. It was distinctly a French Beethoven; not the Beethoven of the universal soul. Into the Caesar Franck tone poem Mr. Monteux and his players injected more life, more spontaneous purpose, more daring, more stirring eloquence. Here as in the symphony there were disfiguring blemishes in elementary matters difficult to account for and wholly inexcusable coming from a band with the prestige of the Boston Symphony orchestra. There were ingratiating moments in the Wagner excerpts. There were also regretful memories of the spell wrought by the Boston Symphony orchestra in other days. The MacDowell concerto with its interminable reminiscences of Grieg and Raff, Mr. Ornstein, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra brought to publication that mightily pleased the audience. Whether, however, this concerto has much of solid artistic substance to recommend it, whether Mr. Ornstein did anything with the composition worthy to be called honest and intrinsically artistic pianism—here is matter for opinion but hardly for critical judgment.

...ton Symphony Orchestra ... visits have extended over a period covering almost the entire history of the organization. Perhaps no other single agency has done so much to familiarize the community with the finest standards and ideals of musical performance. And there was every indication last evening that the great audience which greeted the Boston orchestra welcomed its re-entry into the local concert field with the warmest feelings of appreciation and long established friendship.

There are many new faces among the players, many old ones. Some of the veterans who have filled honored places in the orchestra for many years are still there to bridge the gap between the past and the present. Alwin Schroeder, the voice of whose 'cello has touched the hearts of unnumbered thousands, still by his presence evokes memories of the golden days of this orchestra. Otto Roth, accomplished violinist, sterling artist, and musician through and through, still sits in his place among the first violins where once he touched shoulders with Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and others whose names call up the achievements of the Boston Symphony orchestra in all that is true and beautiful in orchestral art. Georges Longy, for many years one of the conspicuous ornaments of the orchestra, still gives his oboe almost entrancing voice. Enough of the old players are left to save the orchestra from the appearance of strangeness. And for old friends of the organization this is comforting and reassuring.

The program presented last evening included the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Caesar Franck's tone poem "The Wild Horseman," MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, with Leo Ornstein as soloist, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Considering this performance solely on its actual merits it must regretfully be admitted that this concert was a disappointment. The great qualities that so long distinguished the playing of this band and made it pre-eminent among the orchestras of the world were for the most part depressingly absent, or, if present, present more by suggestion than by actual performance. There was woeful falling away from the technical perfection that so long distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, woeful falling off in ensemble, finesse and elegance. There was an obvious slackening of disciplinary standards that bodes serious ill if it is not soon corrected. The fruits of Gericke's years of rigorous and tireless drill bid fair to be wasted. Which were an infinite pity. Karl Muck, the man, is unspeakable. But Karl Muck, the conductor, is among the most consummate masters of the conductor's art of his own or any other time. And while for one reason or another Dr. Muck during the later years of his regime allowed the standards of the Boston Symphony orchestra to slip backward it is beyond belief that Dr. Muck would ever have tolerated a performance from his players so flagrantly coarse and crude as last evening's performance often was. Mr. Monteux has won his laurels as a conductor of grand opera. His work with the Boston orchestra has been praised in Boston and in New York. It is Mr. Monteux's great good fortune in this era of influence for everything French to be a Frenchman. But all good Frenchmen are not necessarily good conductors any more than all bad Germans are necessarily bad conductors. And has

---

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 19 1920

GROUP INSURANCE ... $500,000,000 MARK

One Company Alone Showed 25 ... Percent Increase in 1919.

400,000 Persons Covered.

Figures now available on the growth of group life insurance during last year show that one company alone had 250 percent more group insurance in force in 1919 than in 1918. This company was the Travelers, which will show, in its record of 1919, $150,000,000 group insurance in force, compared with $42,000,000 in 1918. It is stated that all companies handling this form of insurance have policies outstanding amounting to $500,000,000. The Travelers has covered 400,000 persons by group policies.

Where did the business come from? Corporations in all parts of the country have been taking up group insurance for their employees, on the theory, confirmed by practice, that it is good business. Here are some of the companies that have recently purchased group sickness and accident insurance for their employees in the Travelers: The American Woolen Company, National Spun Silk Company, Maine Coated Paper Company and allied companies of Rumford, Me., with approximately 1,500 employees; Colonial Knitting Mills, Inc. of Philadelphia, California Hotel Company, Pasadena, Cal.; Rosendale Foundry & Machine Company, Pittsburgh; Utah Oil Refining Co., Salt Lake City, Utah; Railway & Industrial Engineering Company, Greensburg, Pa.; French & Heald Company, Milford, N. H.; Osborn Machine Com-

---

ESTABLISHED 1881

From ...

JAN 17 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appreciation of Its Concert by Musical Club of Hartford.

To the Editor of The Times:

Will you give space in your paper for a few words of appreciation of the Boston Symphony concert from the Musical club?

The general expression of opinion at the open meeting this week was that of enjoyment of the very musical spirit pervading all the orchestral numbers. The fact that there were many new members in the organization and that they have been working under M. Monteux so short a time might naturally make a thinking musician expect some flaws and a lack of the precision for which this orchestra has been so noted. That there was so little to criticise in these respects gave to the concert a delightful element of surprise; and actual refreshment was given to a large number of the club members who were present.

We would like to voice our recognition of the art and charm in the Symphony which sounded very much like the interpretation of Theodore Thomas, which some of our older members remember with great pleasure.

May we have another Boston Symphony concert soon.

MUSICAL CLUB OF HARTFORD.
Viola Vanderbeek, Pres.
Marguerite Holcombe, Sec.
Hartford, January 17.

In ... to ...

"Charles Jerome Edwards, ... of the Equitable Life in Brooklyn, ... ognizing the benefits and broad ap... cation of group life insurance, ... wishing to demonstrate his appre... tion of the ability and fidelity of ... men and women who make up ... staff, has insured the life of ... agent under contract, as well as ... clerk and assistant, by a policy wh... covers them for insurance for ... amount approximating the first ye... commissions or salary earned du... the year, with $2,500 as the maxim... insurance. Mr. Edwards thus ... proves the adage that 'shoemak... children go unshod.' The fact tha... insurance is on a graduating basis, ... the larger the agent's commissions ... larger his insurance, will be sure ... stimulate effort and secure persis... production. A period of six mon... service is necessary to qualify a ... agent or employee, upon which re... the year's insurance will be based.

* * *

Boston Symphony Insured.

An interesting item in group in... ance is the covering of the Bo... Symphony Orchestra, as noted in ... Insurance Press: "A wider field ... application for group insurance ... suggested by the $100,000 group p... taken out by the board of trustee... the Boston Symphony Orchestra ... all the musicians, covering death ... total disability of any member. T... benefits are in addition to the pen... fund, maintained by special cont... and contributions."

* * *

Atkinson Agency's Record.

General life insurance busi... made by strides in 1919, as re... new being issued show, and Broo... business was well to the front.

Brooklyn agency of the Northweste... Mutual, conducted by James F. ... William F. Atkinson, report an ... crease of 110 percent in 1919 busi... compared with the previous year. ... agency's total paid-for productio... 1919 was $3,281,500 against $1,56... in 1918.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE AFTERNOON OF BRAHMS AND BONNET

Mr. Monteux Succeeds Well, in Spite of Occasional Shortcomings, with the German's First and Eloquent Symphony—The Organist Exalts a Concerto by Haendel Already Exalted, and Last Liszt as Devil's Advocate in Devil's Dance

WHEN, at the Symphony Concerts, the new régime of French conductors succeeded the old régime of German, there was ominous shaking of heads among the devotees hereabouts of the music of Brahms. We shall never hear it again, they said one to another lamenting. For in the Teutonic view or the pseudo-Teutonic view—both not unknown in and around concert-halls in these United States—it is unthinkable that a French conductor should, of his own motion, play one, two or three of Brahms's symphonic pieces. If he did so, continued the mourners, striking appropriate attitudes around the bust of the Founder and Sustainer on the easterly side of Symphony Hall, he would yield only to the traditions of the orchestra or to the obvious expectation of its public. None the less, a symphony by Brahms—the pleasurable second—graced one of Mr. Rabaud's programmes last winter, while, yesterday, the more stirring first began the music of the afternoon. Between whiles, it may be recalled, Brahms's second Concerto for piano and orchestra was somehow squeezed into the commemorative concerts a week after the death of Mr. Higginson. By report of kinsfolk and friends he liked the piece. There is not a whit less reason to believe that Mr. Rabaud liked the second symphony and Mr. Monteux the first, though, doubtless, either conductor made his choice with thought of a rounded repertory for a long series of concerts. Neither, it is safe to say, chose his symphony perfunctorily or with uneasy notion of obligation. The deepest-dyed "Brahmsianer" as the Germans say, need have no fear for the future of his favorite composer at the Symphony Concerts, even if that composer's name recur not quite so frequently on programmes as it did in the days of Gericke, Fiedler and Muck. There are others—interesting others—whose names have hardly recurred at all under those dispensations. Mr. Monteux makes diligent and fruitful quest for them.

Moreover,, Mr. Rabaud's version of the second symphony and Mr. Monteux's version of the first gave distinct pleasure to open-minded hearers. Mr. Rabaud's in particular, was a notably individualized performance that lent a grace, a charm, a sentiment to the music that many a conductor, more Teutonico, had overlooked. After all, Brahms, light-voiced and seemingly fanciful, was good to hear. In turn, Mr. Monteux's version of the first symphony yesterday, had clear merits and yielded unmistakable satisfactions, even if it was a less individualized "reading" of the music in hand than was Mr. Rabaud's. The relative pace of different conductors with a symphony played at long intervals, is a "pesky" thing to recollect. Possibly, Mr. Monteux took the first movement, especially at the beginning, somewhat more swiftly than Dr. Muck used to do, and with no appreciable gain—indeed with some loss—of eloquence. Possibly also, the Parisian correspondingly delayed the pace of the Andante, but here with audible advantage to the music. Indeed, the longest memory may hardly recall this slow movement played with such loveliness of tone, quiet grace of progress and contrast and suffused melancholy of mood as it was yesterday by Pierre Monteux of Paris and, as it fortunately happens, of other parts of Europe and a section of America.

On the other hand, the conductor missed the rhythmic life, the upspringing elasticity the leaping exuberance with which the joyous finale can be and, in the ears of many of his hearers, has been made to sound. Yet with this reservation and even another over certain harsh tumults of sound in the first movement, Mr. Monteux's "reading" gave recurring pleasure. He caught the streaming progress, the rich harmonic coloring of the very first measures of the symphony; nor did he lack freedom or eloquence with the moody transitions that follow; while especially vivid was he in the return of motivs or melody. The Scherzo moved in the shadowy harmonic mist and at the pensive pace altogether characteristic of Brahms. In the celebrated preluding to the Finale Mr. Monteux gained distinctly more tonal suspense than he did in the like transition in Beethoven's fifth symphony. Over-drive the brass as he sometimes will, thicken as he now and then does outline and coloring, he was steadily graphic and often eloquent with this symphony in C minor. If adroit detailing and a conductor's little characterizing touches upon a cherished music were missing, the larger contours, the opener progress, the ampler eloquence of Brahms stood clear. Moreover, at every turn, the orchestra seconded the leader. The strings were a marvel of soft-textured and luminous tone through the Andante, the wood-winds were of like quality; while the new horn-player, Mr. van den Berg, clearly knows the secrets of Brahms's pet instrumental coloring.

Then ensued what to many a hearer was the event of the day. Once more an organist was "soloist" at the Symphony Concerts, and an organist of no less proved quality and deserved reputation than Mr. Bonnet, virtuoso of strange fortunes in this town of ours. First he played in a church to an audience of fellow-organists and students of the organ. Next he advanced to a Concerto and, possibly, miscellaneous pieces, at a concert for a war-charity and found himself cut abruptly short by the relentless fuel-dictator. Then others than organists filled a church to hear him; and now, this season as last, he is in full vogue at the Symphony Concerts. Intent silence while he played, loud applause when he had ended, once more attested the public interest and the public favor. Fortunate, however, were the connoisseurs in the music that Mr. Bonnet finally played—Händel's Concerto in F major (Op. 4, No. 4) in lieu of the announced Concerto in D minor (Op. 7, No. 4). He played it, moreover, with no more than the original accompaniment of strings and oboes that Händel himself put, almost completely, to paper. From him so choosing, so playing, many a listener heard for the first time the pure voice of the organ, unalloyed, unclouded, unforced, sensuously beautiful upon the ear and spiritually beautiful upon the imagination.

Far enough is this Concerto from the bedaubed, bespangled, pseudo-orchestral, altogether displayful stuff that many a modern organist intricately and besottedly writes. Hardly less remote was it from the organ as the sentimentalized instrument of "Meditations," "Adorations" and "Visions," wherein one suspects the late Monsieur Massenet, fresh from "Thais" and "Le Jongleur," as persistent organist. Here in Händel's Concerto was limpid beauty of melodic line, occasional loveliness of sparing ornament, the controlled voice of instrumental song now upswelling, but still measured, or else in subdued and pensive glow. The little orchestra wrought its contrasts; the organist wove and colored his patterns; now and again they joined their voices; while once to him alone fell the measures, leading into the Finale, wherein Händel's gentle exaltation rises highest. For here is no music of the bewigged and striding Händel composing pompous Concerti Grossi or ceremonial ode and anthem for the proud and pursy nobility and gentry of a Georgian England; but a Händel achieving the spiritual beauty that may dwell in music and that the voice of the organ may impart and intensify. And here also was Mr. Bonnet, for the time no virtuoso-organist, but priest to summon that beauty by the devotion of head and heart, by the skill of unnoted hand and half-hidden foot out of the shrine in which it waited. Yet doing so, he was the more the master-organist. Seldom has the pure voice of music in spirit and in truth been so lifted in Symphony Hall as it was in this organ-concerto of yesterday.

Last, as in certain ceremonies of the mediæval church, came the turn of the Devil's Advocate. Needless almost, to say, Liszt was at hand to play the part; while the costume that he wore on this occasion was the familiar music of the orchestral the rustic merry-makers filled the tavern with their clumsy romping. Again there was something uncanny in the air, as well as in the empty fifths of the double-basses. Again the hand and the spirit of the fiend somehow penetrated the music. Once more, the violoncello intoned its sensual measures, thrust into the tonal mass like a bold caress. Once more the oboe touched in the sting of voluptuous delights. Loud in the tuba guffawed Mephistopheles and in the tumult out into the woods Faust swept Lenau's willing girl of the black hair. Music of diabolic as well as sensual beat and tang, if the hearer chooses so to regard it—music that once shocked the blue-eyed fathers of symphony concerts in this town. The diabolic in tones, however, has gone a deal farther since the days of the quavering Dwight, since the days, even, of Liszt himself. Strauss has tried his hand at it and so has a certain Monsieur Ravel—each with no slight success and with no little response from the children of darkness, dwelling in this twentieth century. The "Mephisto Waltz," however, remains a vividly theatrical music and with such pieces Mr. Monteux excels.

H. T. PARKER

From Commercial Appeal
Memphis, Tenn.

JAN 4 1920

Memorial Concert for Mayor Higginson.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra recently observed the passing of its founder, Henry Lee Higginson, former mayor of the city, with a memorial programme.

The musical offering of the evening was made up of favorite compositions of the late mayor's, including "Schubert's Unfinished Symphony," Beethoven's familiar C minor symphony and Braham's Concerto in B flat, for piano and orchestra.

The soloist of the occasion was Felix Fox, the well-known Boston pianist, who, heartily in sympathy with the occasion, threw himself in the breach caused by Harold Bauer's refusal to participate in the memorial exercises two days before the concert.

While Mr. Higginson bequeathed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his musical scores, instruments and library, valued at about $75,000, great disappointment was felt that he did not arrange a permanent endowment fund for the organization, his widow,

Director of Census.

NEW YORK ...
TABLISHED 1861

From ...

JAN 13 1920

AUDIENCE SEES FAMILIAR FACES

But Boston Orchestra Lacks Musical Quality of Former Days.

DISAPPOINTMENT AT PARSONS'S CONCERT

New Conductor Doesn't Measure Up to Stature of Predecessors.

(BY JULIUS HARTT.)

What's in a name? Everything. The Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, attracted an audience to Parsons's theater, Monday evening, that completely filled the edifice. Last evening's concert was the first appearance in Hartford of this renowned organization under its new regime. Interest was therefore keen to see and to hear the new conductor and his reorganized

JAN 13 1920

From Post Express
Rochester, N. Y.

Orchestral Clash Threatens.

Do not be surprised if some nearby morning you read about a free-for-all contest among New York's symphony orchestras to secure the best players. Only a few weeks ago I wrote about the New Symphony's needs. It now appears that Artur Bodanzky is putting under contract for next season some of the finest musicians who at present are numbered among the rival organizations. There is a world of money behind the New Symphony, and Bodanzky's instantaneous success in the concert field is exerting its effect upon susceptible players.

The Philharmonic, the New York, the New and the visiting Boston and Philadelphia Symphony orchestras have been falling over one another with their concerts. Still, the patronage holds to its high mark. The "sold-out" sign is becoming weather-beaten enough to bring happiness to managerial hearts. And Sergei Rachmaninoff may celebrate somewhat, for his compositions are finding a place on the programmes of all the leading orchestras.

Fritz Kreisler and Eddy Brown, violinists, and Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot and Rosita Renard, pianists, have been the principal soloists. Cortot is still the polished French artist who made a sterling impression at his previous appearances here. The critics have had many kind words for the conducting of Bodanzky and Stokowski, of the New and the Philadelphia orchestras. Walter Damrosch likewise won some praise for his reading of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Pierre Monteux, of the Boston band, and the Philharmonic's Josef Stransky, occupied the "back seats."

w York City

The Russian "Cockerel of Gold Bird" at the Metropolitan O

Following hard upon the caging of Albert Wolff's operatic "Blue Bird" at the Metropolitan, Director Gatti-Casazza has released Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Golden Cockerel" from its pre-season captivity and sent it on its gilded flight last Friday evening through the current repertoire. This introductory sentence is not meant to imply that what follows will be in the nature of a comparison or contrast of the respective merits or demerits of the two operas. If "Le Coq d'Or" finds greater favor with the populace and is found vastly more entertaining we will credit the gay and sun-flamed plumage of the Russian bird for the achievement.

Coming to Friday's performance, several notable changes among the principal participants since last year were observed. The most important of these was the introduction of Artur Bodanzky as conductor, replacing Pierre Monteux, who now leads the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The writer, for one, has never been able to see any more in Monteux than an amiable and unperturbed gentleman who was also a devout musician. But as an operatic conductor, we deem other natural assets to be essential.

To state then that we reg... danzky as far superior ... is to give voice to ... our expressio... feigned ...

...ton Symphony Orchestra ... visits have extended over a period covering almost the entire history of the organization. Perhaps no other single agency has done so much to familiarize the community with the finest standards and ideals of musical performance. And there was every indication last evening that the great audience which greeted the Boston orchestra welcomed its reentry into the local concert field with the warmest feelings of appreciation and long established friendship.

There are many new faces among the players, many old ones. Some of the veterans who have filled honored places in the orchestra for many years are still there to bridge the gap between the past and the present. Alwin Schroeder, the voice of whose 'cello has touched the hearts of unnumbered thousands, still by his presence evokes memories of the golden days of this orchestra. Otto Roth, accomplished violinist, sterling artist, and musician through and through, still sits in his place among the first violins where once he touched shoulders with Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and others whose names call up the achievements of the Boston Symphony orchestra in all that is true and beautiful in orchestral art. Georges Longy, for many years one of the conspicuous ornaments of the orchestra, still gives his oboe almost entrancing voice. Enough of the old players are left to save the orchestra from the appearance of strangeness. And for old friends of the organization this is comforting and reassuring.

The program presented last evening included the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Caesar Franck's tone poem "The Wild Horseman," MacDowell's Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, with Leo Ornstein as soloist, and the prelude and "Love Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." Considering this performance solely on its actual merits it must regretfully be admitted that this concert was a disappointment. The great qualities that so long distinguished the playing of this band and made it pre-eminent among the orchestras of the world were for the most part depressingly absent, or, if present, present more by suggestion than by actual performance. There was woeful falling away from the technical perfection that so long distinguished the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, woeful falling off in ensemble, finesse and elegance. There was an obvious slackening of disciplinary standards that bodes serious ill if it is not soon corrected. The fruits of Gericke's years of rigorous and tireless drill bid fair to be wasted. Which were an infinite pity. Karl Muck. the man, is unspeakable. But Karl Muck, the conductor, is among the most consummate masters of the conductor's art of his own or any other time. And while for one reason or another Dr. Muck during the later years of his regime allowed the standards of the Boston Symphony orchestra to slip backward it is beyond belief that Dr. Muck would ever have tolerated a performance from his players so flagrantly coarse and crude as last evening's performance often was. Mr. Monteux has won his laurels as a conductor of grand opera. His work with the Boston orchestra has been praised in Boston and in New York. It is Mr. Monteux's great good fortune in this era of influence for everything French to be a Frenchman. But all good Frenchmen are not necessarily good conductors any more than all bad Germans are necessarily bad conductors. And ha...

tions as a symphonic conductor ... upon last evening's performance it must ruefully be admitted, if unbiased candor and judgment are to prevail, that Mr. Monteux comes a long way from measuring up to the stature of the men who have preceded him at the conductor's desk of the Boston orchestra. It is of course possible that last night was an off-night to which solo performers and ensemble players are alike subject. It is, of course, to be remembered that the orchestra includes many new players and that Mr. Monteux's day with the organization is as yet fairly young. But too great a burden may not be laid upon charity.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the Fifth symphony was singularly dull and uninspired. A certain respect for conventionality quite characteristically French was advertised, a kind of musicianship admirable in itself when fired with imagination and spontenity but on this occasion dead and lusterless as pedantry always is. Mr. Monteux did indeed erect the shape of the Fifth symphony. He decorated it with ingratiating, indigenous and musicianly detail. But he gave it no soul. It was distinctly a French Beethoven; not the Beethoven of the universal soul. Into the Caesar Franck tone poem Mr. Monteux and his players injected more life, more spontaneous purpose, more daring, more stirring eloquence. Here as in the symphony there were disfiguring blemishes in elementary matters difficult to account for and wholly inexcusable coming from a band with the prestige of the Boston Symphony orchestra. There were ingratiating moments in the Wagner excerpts. There were also regretful memories of the spell wrought by the Boston Symphony orchestra in other days. The MacDowell concerto with its interminable reminiscences of Grieg and Raff, Mr. Ornstein, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra brought to publication that mightily pleased the audience. Whether, however, this concerto has much of solid artistic substance to recommend it, whether Mr. Ornstein did anything with the composition worthy to be called honest and intrinsically artistic pianism—here is matter for opinion but hardly for critical judgment.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From ...

JAN 17 ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Appreciation of Its Concert by Musical Club of Hartford.

To the Editor of The Times:

Will you give space in your paper for a few words of appreciation of the Boston Symphony concert from the Musical club?

The general expression of opinion

SWEDISH EV. LUTHERAN EMANUEL CHURCH
Capitol Ave. and Hungerford St.
Morning services in English at 9:30. Swedish 10:45. Sunday school in church, 12

...ment of ...
...shment was ... 10:30 a. m.; ...
...s of the club ... 928 Main ...
...present.
...to voice our ...
...charm ...

St. Paul's Anglish Evangelical Lutheran church, Park street and Park terrace. Rev. David G. Jaxheimer, pastor. Service 10:30 a. m. and 7:30 p. m. Bible school 11:45 a. m.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 1 6 1920

GROUP INSURANCE AT $500,000,000 MARK

One Company Alone Showed 250 Percent Increase in 1919.

400,000 Persons Covered.

Figures now available on the growth of group life insurance during last year show that one company alone had 250 percent more group insurance in force in 1919 than in 1918. This company was the Travelers, which will show, in its record of 1919, $150,000,000 group insurance in force, compared with $42,000,000 in 1918. It is stated that all companies handling this form of insurance have policies outstanding amounting to $500,000,000. The Travelers has covered 400,000 persons by group policies.

Where did the business come from? Corporations in all parts of the country have been taking up group insurance for their employees, on the theory, confirmed by practice, that it is good business. Here are some of the companies that have recently purchased group sickness and accident insurance for their employees in the Travelers: The American Woolen Company, National Spun Silk Company, Maine Coated Paper Company and allied companies of Rumford, Me., with approximately 1,500 employees; Colonial Knitting Mills, Inc. of Philadelphia, California Hotel Company, Pasadena, Cal.; Rosendale Foundry & Machine Company, Pittsburgh; Utah Oil Refining Co., Salt Lake City, Utah; Railway & Industrial Engineering Company, Greensburg, Pa.; French & Heald Company, Milford, N. H.; Osborn Machine Company, DuBois, Pa.; and the Mor... Ellis Hosiery Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

Charles Jerome Edwards Uses I...

The Insurance Press, in its issue Jan. 14, takes more than casual no... of what Charles Jerome Edwa... well known Brooklyn manager of ... Equitable Life, has been doing w... group insurance in his own busin... in the following comment:

"Charles Jerome Edwards, mana... of the Equitable Life in Brooklyn, ... ognizing the benefits and broad ap... cation of group life insurance, ... wishing to demonstrate his appre... tion of the ability and fidelity of ... men and women who make up ... staff, has insured the life of e... agent under contract, as well as ... clerk and assistant, by a policy wh... covers them for insurance for ... amount approximating the first ye... commissions or salary earned du... the year, with $2,500 as the maxim... insurance. Mr. Edwards thus ... proves the adage that 'shoemak... children go unshod.' The fact tha... insurance is on a graduating basis, ... the larger the agent's commissions ... larger his insurance, will be sure ... stimulate effort and secure persis... production. A period of six mon... service is necessary to qualify a ... agent or employee, upon which re... the year's insurance will be based."

* * *

Boston Symphony Insured.

An interesting item in group in... ance is the covering of the Bo... Symphony Orchestra, as noted in ... Insurance Press: "A wider field ... application for group insurance ... suggested by the $100,000 group p... taken out by the board of trustee... the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ... all the musicians, covering death ... total disability of any member. T... benefits are in addition to the per... fund, maintained by special con... and contributions."

* * *

Atkinson Agency's Record.

General life insurance busi... made by strides in 1919, as re... now being issued show, and Broo... business was well to the front.

Brooklyn agency of the Northweste... Mutual, conducted by James F. ... William F. Atkinson, report an ... crease of 110 percent in 1919 busi... compared with the previous year. ... agency's total paid-for productio... 1919 was $3,281,500 against $1,5... in 1918.

Some Musical Superstitions

Wherein One Star of the Baton Differeth from Another in Glory—Why Some German Conductors Mutilate Their Own Masterpieces—The People Who Talk About "Form" in Music—What Musical "Form," in Plain Words, Means—Men of Today Who Are Upsetting Conventional Ideas and Putting Into Practice New and Artistic Discoveries

In Boston musical circles there are some very funny people, so secure in realms of art and society that they remove their eyeglasses under no conceivable circumstances.

Thus, last Friday afternoon a week ago, that is to say, Friday of nine days ago, Mr. Monteux led at the Boston Symphony concerts a wonderful performance of Mili Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," after Lermentoff. Out in the corridor during the intermission we remarked to an acquaintance, with pardonable enthusiasm, that it had been a wonderful performance. To which the gentleman replied, "Yes, but I will not admit that he is a greater conductor than Muck."

No one had suggested that he should admit this, but the point seemed to worry him. And so last Friday, "What did you think of the Brahms symphony?"

"Very fair; but compare it with Muck's."

Well, if it will ease anybody's soul we have no objection at all to comparing it with Muck's. No one's reputation will perish by the comparison. Muck was not, musically speaking, the deity, but he was a very remarkable musician. Very remarkable musicians have succeeded him, very remarkable men preceded him, one of whom at least had genius, which Muck had not. That man was Arthur Nikisch. On a number of occasions the two conductors, Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, have given finer performances of classic and modern works than Muck ever gave, and on other occasions which we can easily recall, and are perfectly willing to, Muck surpassed his successors.

THAMAR A LA POTSDAM

We preferred Monteux's performance of "Thamar" to Muck, who played the piece as if it had been composed in Potsdam, where there must be very ugly furniture. We also preferred Monteux's reading of Schumann's "Spring" symphony—a very well known German composition—not only to Muck's, but to anyone's reading of this symphony which we have heard. We also preferred Monteux's "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert to Muck's. We preferred Muck's Brahms symphony—at least his first Brahms symphony, which was the symphony Mr. Monteux played last Friday and Saturday—to Mr. Monteux's. Principally because Mr. Monteux's performance of this work, the first performance of it he had given with the Boston orchestra, had on Friday afternoon, when we heard it, a rather tentative character. The new conductor's conception of the music, which differed in details from Dr. Muck's, had not, as it were, settled into the orchestra, and then there was a new horn from La Belle France, for whom, perhaps, a combined dose of Boston and Brahms was too much for a first impression. Once or twice his horn, which had otherwise a very pure and beautiful tone, got the snuffles.

Let us add here that we never approved wildly of Muck's first Brahms symphony, because, while great and noble in spirit, and masterly as regarded tempi and big grip of the frame of the music, it lacked, for us, sufficient passion in the first and the last movements. Where Muck was pre-eminent in Brahms, where we doubt if he could ever be surpassed, if equalled, was in his performance, not of the first, but of the second symphony. There he was incomparable, as he was incomparable in Liszt's "Faust" symphony, as we believe him to have been incomparable—for no other conductor has played it in Boston—in the performance of Sibelius' fourth symphony and in other works which do not come immediately to mind.

Sibelius Revealed

But Max Fiedler played Sibelius' second symphony far better than Muck dreamed of playing it, and Fiedler played Richard Strauss' "Zarathustra" with orchestral roughness, but with a splendor of conception which matched the wonder of the music with an imagination which Muck totally lacked, apparently, when he gave academic performances of this colossal piece of [illegible]. Mr. Rabaud, in our opinion, absolutely surpassed Muck in his performance of that treasured German masterpiece, Beethoven's 5th symphony. Neither Muck nor any other conductor, in our opinion, rose to such heights in conducting this work, which conductors who have visited Boston, as well as those at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, have played so frequently. Recall also Mr. Rabaud's performance of the Cesar Franck symphony. We personally prefer it in certain details to Mr. Monteux's. But unless memory is much at fault, the finest performance of this symphony was given neither by Muck, Rabaud, nor Monteux, but by one Wilhelm Gericke, the true musical founder—we do not speak of the great departed, who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a possibility—but the true musical developer of this orchestra.

Conductors' Temperaments

All conductors have their great performances and their less great performances. Conductors are much more variable by temperament than the public perhaps realize. A conductor is not a stick waving machine. He is so intimately related to his orchestra that his slightest impulse echoes like a tremor through the whole body. The leader on the stand may deceive the audience. He can never deceive his men. What he is as leader and musician their performance will be. Hence it is that many causes, some of temperament, some of technic, and a great many consisting in conditions of the moment, influence the results which conductors achieve.

But this much is very certain and perceptible to those not wedded to the Muck superstition, that we have had in Boston in the last two years two admirable conductors of the French school, whose ministrations have done the Boston Symphony Orchestra great good and not harm; that these men have interpreted as for the first time modern French and Russian compositions of which the true character was more or less thoroughly disguised by German conductors; and that, in addition, the French conductors have shown a profound sympathy with and understanding of masterpieces of the German school, which they have approached with an open mind and a sympathetic scholarship seldom displayed by German musicians unless they were dealing with music produced by their own nation.

"Open-minded" Revisers

And not always "open mind and a sympathetic scholarship," even then! It appears that there is no one more willing to monkey with masterpieces than your average German conductor or editor. Think of the editions of Beethoven sonatas. Think of the instrumental retouching given a number of the symphonies. Mr. Rabaud did the unique and praiseworthy thing to revert to Beethoven's original scoring when he used three horns instead of six in the trio of the scherzo of Beethoven's third symphony, and when he restored the original instrumentation in Beethoven's fifth symphony. In these columns he was praised for doing these things. An ardent correspondent piped up and remarked that it was almost a universal custom to double brass parts in these places—the custom which Rabaud insisted on destroying. And he was right. Who started this custom of noisy "doubling" of instruments, which is especially atrocious in the forest music of the third symphony? Who but Germans!

Ask Felix Weingartner, virtuoso conductor, and too many of his predecessors. From there spread the custom which had become "almost universal." It was the wonderful Mr. Philip Hale, who is worth all the other music critics of Boston put together, who supplied the fitting comment to the activities of these industrious people, when, in a lecture, he referred to German investigators of Shakspere. "They dove and they dove, and the deeper they dove the muddier they came up."

The Fetish of "Form"

Another thing which is always fetched up by academicianss and, no doubt, by the rockbound admirers of Muck and nobody but Muck, is this old bugaboo of "form." A Brahms symphony is played. There is a "first theme," a "second theme," a "development section," a "recapitulation," and all the rest of it. "Ah," they sigh, "what 'form'." There is plenty of form, all right. Yes, indeed. And if there had been less of this "form" paramount in the mind of the composer Brahms would have been a greater musician.

There are certain people who try very hard to get into circles of people whom they greatly admire, perhaps in all sincerity, by trying to fit themselves, their lives, their thoughts, into the frame adopted by these people. This is done in a contemptible and superficial way in human society. It is done in business. It is done in circles of education. It is done in art. Sometimes it is done in a very noble spirit. Brahms, on his knees before the genius of Bach, of Beethoven, of Schubert, tried most earnestly and with his whole soul to be worthy of his art and to fit himself for their society. That is the reason why he will never be a Bach, Beethoven or Schubert. Possibly it is also the reason why he is Brahms. But in his devotion to classic form and the principles of the classic school Brahms certainly restricted his own development as a composer.

Now what do mean by form? Do you mean a piece of wood, so many inches by so many other inches? Or do you mean an art form which is not only lines visible to the eye, or tonal outlines and rhythmical vibrations audible to the ear, which shall be the pure, perfect, complete embodiment of an artistic vision? Because if you mean the first, you mean, roughly and fundamentally speaking, the principles of set proportions and set procedure of a Brahms symphony. If you mean the latter, you mean such a work as Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," the most exquisite, tenuous, fugitive music you can imagine, which is absolutely perfect in its form. We did not say greater in its spirit, loftier in its message, or anything like that. We are now discussing not a message, or a precept, or a moral, but art. The form of the vague and beautiful music of Debussy, inspired by an equally vague and beautiful poem of Stephane Mallarme, is a form so perfect, so at one with the idea, so faithful in every successive note to the dictates of that idea, which the composer follows, surely and confidently, without a superflous note, through a magic realm of hitherto unrealized beauty, that the form of the Brahms symphony is clumsy and imperfect by comparison.

Plotinus Describes Music

Not that Brahms should try to write like Debussy. Not that he should necessarily try to escape wholly from the symphonic form. But that his form, his way of putting his musical ideas into effect, should be dictated not by the principles of a musical structure established before the idea, but by the idea itself, which would bring about its own direction and manner of development.

In Brahms' day, however, composers did not even try to take account of the fugitive and subtle impressions, visions, sleep-chasings, which Debussy and others put so confidently and surely on music paper. Why? Because there was not the necessary mastery and flexibility of form.

The best definition of musical form we have ever seen—we are again indebted to Mr. Hale for the quotation, is that of Plotinus—and he was not talking about music either, while he defined its secret so marvellously: "It is on this account that fire surpasses all other bodies in beauty, because, compared with the other elements, it obtains the order of form; for it is more eminent than the rest, and is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." The greatest masters of musical "form" today are found in modern France. And they are the ones who make the least fuss about it. They can be so free and so sure only because of profound mastery and an innate sense of fitness and proportion which can only be in part acquired. A foreign musician was much surprised one day to find that Maurice Ravel, whom he did not understand, and had therefore rated as being insecure in technic and an amateurish experimenter, was a member of the examining board in counterpoint at the Paris Conservatoire. Ravel's audacity comes from his mastery. It is not a set of amateurs or mere impressionists who are today thoroughly upsetting the conventional conception of musical "form."

And what manner of man is this Ravel? We asked the question recently of Robert Schmidt, the young French pianist and conductor, personally acquainted with the composer, and an enthusiastic exponent of his works, who will be heard later in the season in Boston. In reply, Mr. Schmidt sends us the following description of Ravel, written by himself:

Maurice Ravel, born in Cibourne, Basses-Pyrenees, France, seems to be a sensitive film upon which the sun and all the ardent nature of that "pays-Basque" have concentrated their richest and most radiant colors during the first years of his life, colors that he has kept and embodied intensely in his work.

Very small in stature, he might be described by these words, "energetic and vivacious miniature." He is the Chiquito of our modern music. The "glissando" of the harps in his orchestra seem to describe the exquisite curves of aerial "pelotas basques."

Two piercing eyes, sometimes dreamy, as if lost in the exoticism of Klingsor, sometimes malicious and observing (Aloysius Bertrand), seem to reflect the capricious vivacity of his thought.

His character was always definite, whether it was clad in the dress suit of parma gray that he used to wear certain evenings in 1918, or in the French uniform he wore gloriously during the great match against the invader or again when he was discussing choreographical sinuosities with the ballet master, Fokine.

Many say of him that he is eccentric. This is absolutely false. He is simple and cordial.

To see Ravel on the rocks of Cibourne with on his head a soft hat verging on the romantic, dreaming before the wild untamed beauties of the scenery, then to find him again in his refined home, enables one to understand the man and the artist in his diversity.

Monteux, Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Action

ABLISHED 1881
[illegible] Courant
rom
TIMES
X JAN 12 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons's theater at 8:15 to-night, when Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor of the great orchestra, will present the following eventful program: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor; Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Leo Ornstein, the highly admired and much discussed pianist-composer, will be the soloist of the evening. He will be heard to signal advantage in MacDowell's brilliant Second Concerto.

Arpeggios.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the third concert of its Washington series yesterday afternoon in the National Theater before a large and distinguished audience. Leo Ornstein, pianist, was the soloist, substituting for Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, who is ill. The program chosen by M. Monteux was interesting, though too long by half an hour for an afternoon concert. The orchestra played the "Reformation" symphony, No. 5, in D minor, opus 107, by Mendelssohn; the second episode from Linau's "Faust," by Liszt, and for the last number Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

The symphony was beautifully played in tone and interpretation, the second movement particularly delightful in rhythm and daintiness, and the last movement, in sharp contrast, was filled with rich organ effects. "Stenka Razine" is a brilliant composition, rich in harmonies, which M. Monteux made the most of, finishing with a climax of tragedy.

Mr. Ornstein played the MacDowell concerto in D minor, opus 23, No. 2, with brilliant technic, rich tone and tremendous climaxes. The second movement, presto geocoso, was charmingly played with daintiness, clean fingerwork and fascinating rhythm. The latter part of the last movement, molto allegro, was taken at an astounding tempo and the youthful pianist gave out scintillating scales and arpeggios, which sometimes startled his hearers by their perfection. Some of the beauty of the last climax was, however, marred by too loud an accompaniment by the orchestra.

K. B.

rom
Post
Hartford, Conn.
JAN [illegible] 1920

Boston Symphony.

Great interest and curiosity were felt in the single performance this season of the Boston orchestra, in Hartford, and some dissatisfaction is expressed with that performance.

Of course, the Boston Symphony orchestra of nineteen twenty is not the Boston Symphony orchestra we were accustomed to hear, as liberal and sweeping changes were made in the personnel.

All the enemy aliens are gone, for which we can all be grateful. The remainder, comprising perhaps sixty per cent of the original, are still with us, and have not deteriorated.

A large number of new players have been incorporated into the orchestra, players selected as carefully as possible and of as high a standard as usual—apparently there is no loss of power or quality here.

But the organization is partly new, and the leader is new, and the orchestra is choosing different music. All these things ought to please us.

Granting utmost diversity of view as to conductors, etc., does it not seem that the orchestra personnel is better, and with more work, will develop as fine esprit de corps as it ever had.

To me the new Boston Symphony is better than the old Boston Symphony in one other aspect, there is less obvious repression of the players and more individual enthusiasm among them.

While an ironclad control may be valuable discipline, and an almost automatic individuality may impress some; yet no two violins being alike, nor any two bows, the greatest and most splendid results are found, not when all individuals of a choir are made alike, but when each individual is at his best, and all together.

The first method is Prussian, the second promotes the highest [illegible] clanship.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Leo Ornstein, Pianist and Composer, to Be Soloist With Musical Organization at Parsons's Monday Evening.

Hartford will have its opportunity of judging the qualities of Pierre Monteux, the noted new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra when that famous organization makes its only appearance in Hartford this season at Parsons's theater next Monday evening. Mr. Monteux will come to Hartford with a precedent, for he has amply justified his reputation as a conductor of opera, concert and ballet on two continents by making the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra one of the busiest and in every sense the most successful in its history. The music which he has prepared for the concert in Hartford exemplifies Mr. Monteux's reputation as a program maker of cosmopolitanism, discrimination and interest.

As soloist, Leo Ornstein, who has come to be one of the most highly admired pianists of our day, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra—music which should set off to fine advantage the artist's light and brilliant dexterity, his infectious rhythmic instinct, and the lyrical beauty of his tone. The coming together of such an orchestra and such a pianist is indeed the musical event of the Hartford season.

Some Musical Superstitions

Wherein One Star of the Baton Differeth from Another in Glory—Why Some German Conductors Mutilate Their Own Masterpieces—The People Who Talk About "Form" in Music—What Musical "Form," in Plain Words, Means—Men of Today Who Are Upsetting Conventional Ideas and Putting Into Practice New and Artistic Discoveries

In Boston musical circles there are some very funny people, so secure in realms of art and society that they remove their eyeglasses under no conceivable circumstances.

Thus, last Friday afternoon a week ago, that is to say, Friday of nine days ago, Mr. Monteux led at the Boston Symphony concerts a wonderful performance of Mili Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," after Lermentoff. Out in the corridor during the intermission we remarked to an acquaintance, with pardonable enthusiasm, that it had been a wonderful performance. To which the gentleman replied, "Yes, but I will not admit that he is a greater conductor than Muck."

No one had suggested that he should admit this, but the point seemed to worry him. And so last Friday, "What did you think of the Brahms symphony?"

"Very fair; but compare it with Muck's."

Well, if it will ease anybody's soul we have no objection at all to comparing it with Muck's. No one's reputation will perish by the comparison. Muck was not, musically speaking, the deity, but he was a very remarkable musician. Very remarkable musicians have succeeded him, very remarkable men preceded him, one of whom at least had genius, which Muck had not. That man was Arthur Nikisch. On a number of occasions the two conductors, Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, have given finer performances of classic and modern works than Muck ever gave, and on other occasions which we can easily recall, and are perfectly willing to, Muck surpassed his successors.

THAMAR A LA POTSDAM

We preferred Monteux's performance of "Thamar" to Muck, who played the piece as if it had been composed in Potsdam, where there must be very ugly furniture. We also preferred Monteux's reading of Schumann's "Spring" symphony—a very well known German composition—not only to Muck's, but to anyone's reading of this symphony which we have heard. We also preferred Monteux's "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert to Muck's. We preferred Muck's Brahms symphony—at least his first Brahms symphony, which was the symphony Mr. Monteux played last Friday and Saturday—to Mr. Monteux's. Principally because Mr. Monteux's performance of this work, the first performance of it he had given with the Boston orchestra, had on Friday afternoon, when we heard it, a rather tentative character. The new conductor's conception of the music, which differed in details from Dr. Muck's, had not, as it were, settled into the orchestra, and then there was a crazy horn from La Belle France, for whom, perhaps, a combined dose of Boston and Brahms was too much for a first impression. Once or twice his horn, which had otherwise a very pure and beautiful tone, got the snuffles.

Let us add here that we never approved wildly of Muck's first Brahms symphony, because, while great and noble in spirit, and masterly as regarded tempi and big grip of the frame of the music, it lacked, for us, sufficient passion in the first and the last movements. Where Muck was pre-eminent in Brahms, where we doubt if he could ever be surpassed, if equalled, was in his performance, not of the first, but of the second symphony. There he was incomparable, as he was incomparable in Liszt's "Faust" symphony, as we believe him to have been incomparable—for no other conductor has played it in Boston—in the performance of Sibelius' fourth symphony and in other works which do not come immediately to mind.

Sibelius Revealed

But Max Fiedler played Sibelius' second symphony far better than Muck dreamed of playing it, and Fiedler played Richard Strauss' "Zarathustra" with orchestral roughness, but with a splendor of conception which matched the wonder of the music, with an imagination which Muck totally lacked, apparently, when he gave academic performances of this colossal piece of music.

Again, Mr. Rabaud, in our opinion, completely surpassed Muck in his performance of that treasured German masterpiece, Beethoven's 5th symphony. Neither Muck nor any other conductor, in our opinion, rose to such heights in conducting this work, which conductors who have visited Boston, as well as those at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, have played so frequently. Recall also Mr. Rabaud's performance of the Cesar Franck symphony. We personally prefer it in certain details to Mr. Monteux's. But unless memory is much at fault, the finest performance of this symphony was given neither by Muck, Rabaud, nor Monteux, but by one Wilhelm Gericke, the true musical founder—we do not speak of the great departed, who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a possibility—but the true musical developer of this orchestra.

Conductors' Temperaments

All conductors have their great performances and their less great performances. Conductors are much more variable by temperament than the public perhaps realize. A conductor is not a stick waving machine. He is so intimately related to his orchestra that his slightest impulse echoes like a tremor through the whole body. The leader on the stand may deceive the audience. He can never deceive his men. What he is as leader and musician their performance will be. Hence it is that many causes, some of temperament, some of technic, and a great many consisting in conditions of the moment, influence the results which conductors achieve.

But this much is very certain and perceptible to those not wedded to the Muck superstition, that we have had in Boston in the last two years two admirable conductors of the French school, whose ministrations have done the Boston Symphony Orchestra great good and not harm; that these men have interpreted as for the first time modern French and Russian compositions of which the true character was more or less thoroughly disguised by German conductors; and that, in addition, the French conductors have shown a profound sympathy with and understanding of masterpieces of the German school, which they have approached with an open mind and a sympathetic scholarship seldom displayed by German musicians unless they were dealing with music produced by their own nation.

"Open-minded" Revisers

And not always "open mind and a sympathetic scholarship," even then! It appears that there is no one more willing to monkey with masterpieces than your average German conductor or editor. Think of the editions of Beethoven sonatas. Think of the instrumental retouching given a number of the symphonies. Mr. Rabaud did the unique and praiseworthy thing to revert to Beethoven's original scoring when he used three horns instead of six in the trio of the scherzo of Beethoven's third symphony, and when he restored the original instrumentation in Beethoven's fifth symphony. In these columns he was praised for doing these things. An ardent correspondent piped up and remarked that it was almost a universal custom to double brass parts in these places—the custom which Rabaud insisted on destroying. And he was right. Who started this custom of noisy "doubling" of instruments, which is especially atrocious in the forest music of the third symphony? Who but Germans!

Ask Felix Weingartner, virtuoso conductor, and too many of his predecessors. From there spread the custom which had become "almost universal." It was the wonderful Mr. Philip Hale, who is worth all the other music critics of Boston put together, who supplied the fitting comment to the activities of these industrious people, when, in a lecture, he referred to German investigators of Shakspere. "They dove and they dove, and the deeper they dove the muddier they came up."

The Fetish of "Form"

Another thing which is always fetched up by academicianss and, no doubt, by the rockbound admirers of Muck and nobody but Muck, is this old bugaboo of "form." A Brahms symphony is played. There is a "first theme," a "second theme," a "development section," a "recapitulation," and all the rest of it. "Ah," they sigh, "what 'form'." There is plenty of form, all right. Yes, indeed. And if there had been less of this "form" paramount in the mind of the composer Brahms would have been a greater musician.

There are certain people who try very hard to get into circles of people whom they greatly admire, perhaps in all sincerity, by trying to fit themselves, their lives, their thoughts, into the frame adopted by these people. This is done in a contemptible and superficial way in human society. It is done in business. It is done in circles of education. It is done in art. Sometimes it is done in a very noble spirit. Brahms, on his knees before the genius of Bach, of Beethoven, of Schubert, tried most earnestly and with his whole soul to be worthy of his art and to fit himself for their society. That is the reason why he will never be a Bach, Beethoven or Schubert. Possibly it is also the reason why he is Brahms. But in his devotion to classic form and the principles of the classic school Brahms certainly restricted his own development as a composer.

Now what do mean by form? Do you mean a piece of wood, so many inches by so many other inches? Or do you mean an art form which is not only lines visible to the eye, or tonal outlines and rhythmical vibrations audible to the ear, which shall be the pure, perfect, complete embodiment of an artistic vision? Because if you mean the first, you mean, roughly and fundamentally speaking, the principles of set proportions and set procedure of a Brahms symphony. If you mean the latter, you mean such a work as Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," the most exquisite, tenuous, fugitive music you can imagine, which is absolutely perfect in its form. We did not say greater in its spirit, loftier in its message, or anything like that. We are now discussing not a message, or a precept, or a moral, but art. The form of the vague and beautiful music of Debussy, inspired by an equally vague and beautiful poem of Stephane Mallarme, is a form so perfect, so at one with the idea, so faithful in every successive note to the dictates of that idea, which the composer follows, surely and confidently, without a superflous note, through a magic realm of hitherto unrealized beauty, that the form of the Brahms symphony is clumsy and imperfect by comparison.

Plotinus Describes Music

Not that Brahms should try to write like Debussy. Not that he should necessarily try to escape wholly from the symphonic form. But that his form, his way of putting his musical ideas into effect, should be dictated not by the principles of a musical structure established before the idea, but by the idea itself, which would bring about its own direction and manner of development.

In Brahms' day, however, composers did not even try to take account of the fugitive and subtle impressions, visions, sleep-chasings, which Debussy and others put so confidently and surely on music paper. Why? Because there was not the necessary mastery and flexibility of form.

The best definition of musical form we have ever seen—we are again indebted to Mr. Hale for the quotation, is that of Plotinus—and he was not talking about music either, while he defined its secret so marvellously: "It is on this account that fire surpasses all other bodies in beauty, because, compared with the other elements, it obtains the order of form; for it is more eminent than the rest, and is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." The greatest masters of musical "form" today are found in modern France. And they are the ones who make the least fuss about it. They can be so free and so sure only because of profound mastery and an innate sense of fitness and proportion which can only be in part acquired. A foreign musician was much surprised one day to find that Maurice Ravel, whom he did not understand, and had therefore rated as being insecure in technic and an amateurish experimenter, was a member of the examining board in counterpoint at the Paris Conseravtoire. Ravel's audacity comes from his mastery. It is not a set of amateurs or mere impressionists who are today thoroughly upsetting the conventional conception of musical "form."

And what manner of man is this Ravel? We asked the question recently of Robert Schmidt, the young French pianist and conductor, personally acquainted with the composer, and an enthusiastic exponent of his works, who will be heard later in the season in Boston. In reply, Mr. Schmidt sends us the following description of Ravel, written by himself:

Maurice Ravel, born in Cibourne, Basses-Pyrenees, France, seems to be a sensitive film upon which the sun and all the ardent nature of that "pays-Basque" have concentrated their richest and most radiant colors during the first years of his life, colors that he has kept and embodied intensely in his work.

Very small in stature, he might be described by these words, "energetic and vivacious miniature." He is the Chiquito of our modern music. The "glissando" of the harps in his orchestra seem to describe the exquisite curves of aerial "pelotas basques."

Two piercing eyes, sometimes dreamy, as if lost in the exoticism of Klingsor, sometimes malicious and observing (Aloysius Bertrand), seem to reflect the capricious vivacity of his thought.

His character was always definite, whether it was clad in the dress suit of parma gray that he used to wear certain evenings in 1918, or in the French uniform he wore gloriously during the great match against the invader or again when he was discussing chorographical sinuosities with the ballet master, Fokine.

Many say of him that he is eccentric. This is absolutely false. He is simple and cordial.

To see Ravel on the rocks of Cibourne with on his head a soft hat verging on the romantic, dreaming before the wild untamed beauties of the scenery, then to find him again in his refined home, enables one to understand the man and the artist in his diversity.

Monteux, Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Action

ABLISHED 1881

om

X 1A

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

The famous Boston Symphony orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons's theater at 8:15 to-night, when Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor of the great orchestra, will present the following eventful program: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor; Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Leo Ornstein, the highly admired and much discussed pianist-composer, will be the soloist of the evening. He will be heard to signal advantage in MacDowell's brilliant Second Concerto.

Arpeggios.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the third concert of its Washington series yesterday afternoon in the National Theater before a large and distinguished audience. Leo Ornstein, pianist, was the soloist, substituting for Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, who is ill. The program chosen by M. Monteux was interesting, though too long by half an hour for an afternoon concert. The orchestra played the "Reformation" symphony, No. 5, in D minor, opus 107, by Mendelssohn; the second episode from Linau's "Faust," by Liszt, and for the last number Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

The symphony was beautifully played in tone and interpretation, the second movement particularly delightful in rhythm and daintiness, and the last movement, in sharp contrast, was filled with rich organ effects. "Stenka Razine" is a brilliant composition, rich in harmonies, which M. Monteux made the most of, finishing with a climax of tragedy.

Mr. Ornstein played the MacDowell concerto in D minor, opus 23, No. 2, with brilliant technic, rich tone and tremendous climaxes. The second movement, presto geocoso, was charmingly played with daintiness, clean fingerwork and fascinating rhythm. The latter part of the last movement, molto allegro, was taken at an astounding tempo, and the youthful pianist gave out scintillating scales and arpeggios, which sometimes startled his hearers by their perfection. Some of the beauty of the last climax was, however, marred by too loud an accompaniment by the orchestra.

K. B.

om

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Leo Ornstein, Pianist and Composer, to Be Soloist With Musical Organization at Parsons's Monday Evening.

Hartford will have its opportunity of judging the qualities of Pierre Monteux, the noted new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra when that famous organization makes its only appearance in Hartford this season at Parsons's theater next Monday evening. Mr. Monteux will come to Hartford with a precedent, for he has amply justified his reputation as a conductor of opera, concert and ballet on two continents by making the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra one of the busiest and in every sense the most successful in its history. The music which he has prepared for the concert in Hartford exemplifies Mr. Monteux's reputation as a program maker of cosmopolitanism, discrimination and interest.

As soloist, Leo Ornstein, who has come to be one of the most highly admired pianists of our day, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra—music which should set off to fine advantage the artist's light and brilliant dexterity, his infectious rhythmic instinct, and the lyrical beauty of his tone. The coming together of such an orchestra and such a pianist is indeed the musical event of the Hartford season.

rom
Post
Hartford, Conn.

Boston Symphony.

Great interest and curiosity were felt in the single performance this season of the Boston orchestra, in Hartford, and some dissatisfaction is expressed with that performance.

Of course, the Boston Symphony orchestra of nineteen twenty is not the Boston Symphony orchestra we were accustomed to hear, as liberal and sweeping changes were made in the personnel.

All the enemy aliens are gone, for which we can all be grateful. The remainder, comprising perhaps sixty per cent of the original, are still with us, and have not deteriorated.

A large number of new players have been incorporated into the orchestra; players selected as carefully as possible and of as high a standard as usual—apparently there is no loss of power or quality here.

But the organization is partly new, and the leader is new, and the orchestra is choosing different music. All these things ought to please us.

Granting utmost diversity of view as to conductors, etc., does it not seem that the orchestra personnel is better, and with more work, will develop as fine esprit de corps as it ever had.

To me the new Boston Symphony is better than the old Boston Symphony in one other aspect, there is less obvious repression of the players and more individual enthusiasm among them.

While an ironclad control may be valuable discipline, and an almost automatic individuality may impress some; yet no two violins being alike, nor any two bows, the greatest and most splendid results are found, not when all individuals of a choir are made alike, but when each individual is at his best, and all together.

The best method is Prussian; second promotes the highest [illegible] ciaship.

Some Musical Superstitions

Wherein One Star of the Baton Differeth from Another in Glory—Why Some German Conductors Mutilate Their Own Masterpieces—The People Who Talk About "Form" in Music—What Musical "Form," in Plain Words, Means—Men of Today Who Are Upsetting Conventional Ideas and Putting Into Practice New and Artistic Discoveries

In Boston musical circles there are some very funny people, so secure in realms of art and society that they remove their eyeglasses under no conceivable circumstances.

Thus, last Friday afternoon a week ago, that is to say, Friday of nine days ago, Mr. Monteux led at the Boston Symphony concerts a wonderful performance of Mili Balakireff's tone poem, "Thamar," after Lermentoff. Out in the corridor during the intermission we remarked to an acquaintance, with pardonable enthusiasm, that it had been a wonderful performance. To which the gentleman replied, "Yes, but I will not admit that he is a greater conductor than Muck."

No one had suggested that he should admit this, but the point seemed to worry him. And so last Friday, "What did you think of the Brahms symphony?"

"Very fair; but compare it with Muck's."

Well, if it will ease anybody's soul we have no objection at all to comparing it with Muck's. No one's reputation will perish by the comparison. Muck was not, musically speaking, the deity, but he was a very remarkable musician. Very remarkable musicians have succeeded him, very remarkable men preceded him, one of whom at least had genius, which Muck had not. That man was Arthur Nikisch. On a number of occasions the two conductors, Messrs. Rabaud and Monteux, have given finer performances of classic and modern works than Muck ever gave, and on other occasions which we can easily recall, and are perfectly willing to, Muck surpassed his successors.

THAMAR A LA POTSDAM

We preferred Monteux's performance of "Thamar" to Muck, who played the piece as if it had been composed in Potsdam, where there must be very ugly furniture. We also preferred Monteux's reading of Schumann's "Spring" symphony—a very well known German composition—not only to Muck's, but to anyone's reading of this symphony which we have heard. We also preferred Monteux's "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert to Muck's. We preferred Muck's Brahms symphony—at least his first Brahms symphony, which was the symphony Mr. Monteux played last Friday and Saturday—to Mr. Monteux's. Principally because Mr. Monteux's performance of this work, the first performance of it he had given with the Boston orchestra, had on Friday afternoon, when we heard it, a rather tentative character. The new conductor's conception of the music, which differed in details from Dr. Muck's, had not, as it were, settled into the orchestra, and then there was a row horn from La Belle France, for whom, perhaps, a combined dose of Boston and Brahms was too much for a first impression. Once or twice his horn, which had otherwise a very pure and beautiful tone, got the snuffles.

Let us add here that we never approved wildly of Muck's first Brahms symphony, because, while great and noble in spirit, and masterly as regarded tempi and big grip of the frame of the music, it lacked, for us, sufficient passion in the first and the last movements. Where Muck was pre-eminent in Brahms, where we doubt if he could ever be surpassed, if equalled, was in his performance, not of the first, but of the second symphony. There he was incomparable, as he was incomparable in Liszt's "Faust" symphony, as we believe him to have been incomparable—for no other conductor has played it in Boston—in the performance of Sibelius' fourth symphony and in other works which do not come immediately to mind.

Sibelius Revealed

But Max Fiedler played Sibelius' second symphony far better than Muck dreamed of playing it, and Fiedler played Richard Strauss' "Zarathustra" with orchestral roughness, but with a splendor of conception which matched the wonder of the music, with an imagination which Muck totally lacked, apparently, when he gave academic performances of this colossal piece of music.

Again, Mr. Rabaud, in our opinion, completely surpassed Muck in his performance of that treasured German masterpiece, Beethoven's 5th symphony. Neither Muck nor any other conductor, in our opinion, rose to such heights in conducting this work, which conductors who have visited Boston, as well as those at the head of the Symphony Orchestra, have played so frequently. Recall also Mr. Rabaud's performance of the Cesar Franck symphony. We personally prefer it in certain details to Mr. Monteux's. But unless memory is much at fault, the finest performance of this symphony was given neither by Muck, Rabaud, nor Monteux, but by one Wilhelm Gericke, the true musical founder—we do not speak of the great departed, who made the Boston Symphony Orchestra a possibility—but the true musical developer of this orchestra.

Conductors' Temperaments

All conductors have their great performances and their less great performances. Conductors are much more variable by temperament than the public perhaps realize. A conductor is not a stick waving machine. He is so intimately related to his orchestra that his slightest impulse echoes like a tremor through the whole body. The leader on the stand may deceive the audience. He can never deceive his men. What he is as leader and musician their performance will be. Hence it is that many causes, some of temperament, some of technic, and a great many consisting in conditions of the moment, influence the results which conductors achieve.

But this much is very certain and perceptible to those not wedded to the Muck superstition, that we have had in Boston in the last two years two admirable conductors of the French school, whose ministrations have done the Boston Symphony Orchestra great good and not harm; that these men have interpreted as for the first time modern French and Russian compositions of which the true character was more or less thoroughly disguised by German conductors; and that, in addition, the French conductors have shown a profound sympathy with and understanding of masterpieces of the German school, which they have approached with an open mind and a sympathetic scholarship seldom displayed by German musicians unless they were dealing with music produced by their own nation.

"Open-minded" Revisers

And not always "open mind and a sympathetic scholarship," even then! It appears that there is no one more willing to monkey with masterpieces than your average German conductor or editor. Think of the editions of Beethoven sonatas. Think of the instrumental retouching given a number of the symphonies. Mr. Rabaud did the unique and praiseworthy thing to revert to Beethoven's original scoring when he used three horns instead of six in the trio of the scherzo of Beethoven's third symphony, and when he restored the original instrumentation in Beethoven's fifth symphony. In these columns he was praised for doing these things. An ardent correspondent piped up and remarked that it was almost a universal custom to double brass parts in these places—the custom which Rabaud insisted on destroying. And he was right. Who started this custom of noisy "doubling" of instruments, which is especially atrocious in the forest music of the third symphony? Who but Germans!

Ask Felix Weingartner, virtuoso conductor, and too many of his predecessors. From there spread the custom which had become "almost universal." It was the wonderful Mr. Philip Hale, who is worth all the other music critics of Boston put together, who supplied the fitting comment to the activities of these industrious people, when, in a lecture, he referred to German investigators of Shakspere. "They dove and they dove, and the deeper they dove the muddier they came up."

The Fetish of "Form"

Another thing which is always fetched up by academicianss and, no doubt, by the rockbound admirers of Muck and nobody but Muck, is this old bugaboo of "form." A Brahms symphony is played. There is a "first theme," a "second theme," a "development section," a "recapitulation," and all the rest of it. "Ah," they sigh, "what 'form'." There is plenty of form, all right. Yes, indeed. And if there had been less of this "form" paramount in the mind of the composer Brahms would have been a greater musician.

There are certain people who try very hard to get into circles of people whom they greatly admire, perhaps in all sincerity, by trying to fit themselves, their lives, their thoughts, into the frame adopted by these people. This is done in a contemptible and superficial way in human society. It is done in business. It is done in circles of education. It is done in art. Sometimes it is done in a very noble spirit. Brahms, on his knees before the genius of Bach, of Beethoven, of Schubert, tried most earnestly and with his whole soul to be worthy of his art and to fit himself for their society. That is the reason why he will never be a Bach, Beethoven or Schubert. Possibly it is also the reason why he is Brahms. But in his devotion to classic form and the principles of the classic school Brahms certainly restricted his own development as a composer.

Now what do mean by form? Do you mean a piece of wood, so many inches by so many other inches? Or do you mean an art form which is not only lines visible to the eye, or tonal outlines and rhythmical vibrations audible to the ear, which shall be the pure, perfect, complete embodiment of an artistic vision? Because if you mean the first, you mean, roughly and fundamentally speaking, the principles of set proportions and set procedure of a Brahms symphony. If you mean the latter, you mean such a work as Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faun," the most exquisite, tenuous, fugitive music you can imagine, which is absolutely perfect in its form. We did not say greater in its spirit, loftier in its message, or anything like that. We are now discussing not a message, or a precept, or a moral, but art. The form of the vague and beautiful music of Debussy, inspired by an equally vague and beautiful poem of Stephane Mallarme, is a form so perfect, so at one with the idea, so faithful in every successive note to the dictates of that idea, which the composer follows, surely and confidently, without a superflous note, through a magic realm of hitherto unrealized beauty, that the form of the Brahms symphony is clumsy and imperfect by comparison.

Plotinus Describes Music

Not that Brahms should try to write like Debussy. Not that he should necessarily try to escape wholly from the symphonic form. But that his form, his way of putting his musical idea into effect, should be dictated not by the principles of a musical structure established before the idea, but by the idea itself, which would bring about its own direction and manner of development.

In Brahms' day, however, composers did not even try to take account of the fugitive and subtle impressions, visions, sleep-chasings, which Debussy and others put so confidently and surely on music paper. Why? Because there was not the necessary mastery and flexibility of form.

The best definition of musical form we have ever seen—we are again indebted to Mr. Hale for the quotation, is that of Plotinus—and he was not talking about music either, while he defined its secret so marvellously: "It is on this account that fire surpasses all other bodies in beauty, because, compared with the other elements, it obtains the order of form; for it is more eminent than the rest, and is the most subtle of all, bordering as it were on an incorporeal nature." The greatest masters of musical "form" today are found in modern France. And they are the ones who make the least fuss about it. They can be so free and so sure only because of profound mastery and an innate sense of fitness and proportion which can only be in part acquired. A foreign musician was much surprised one day to find that Maurice Ravel, whom he did not understand, and had therefore rated as being insecure in technic and an amateurish experimenter, was a member of the examining board in counterpoint at the Paris Conseravtoire. Ravel's audacity comes from his mastery. It is not a set of amateurs or mere impressionists who are today thoroughly upsetting the conventional conception of musical "form."

And what manner of man is this Ravel? We asked the question recently of Robert Schmidt, the young French pianist and conductor, personally acquainted with the composer, and an enthusiastic exponent of his works, who will be heard later in the season in Boston. In reply, Mr. Schmidt sends us the following description of Ravel, written by himself:

Maurice Ravel, born in Cibourne, Basses-Pyrenees, France, seems to be a sensitive film upon which the sun and all the ardent nature of that "pays Basque" have concentrated their richest and most radiant colors during the first years of his life, colors that he has kept and embodied intensely in his work.

Very small in stature, he might be described by these words, "energetic and vivacious miniature." He is the Chiquito of our modern music. The "glissando" of the harps in his orchestra seem to describe the exquisite curves of aerial "pelotas basques."

Two piercing eyes, sometimes dreamy, as if lost in the exoticism of Klingsor, sometimes malicious and observing (Aloysius Bertrand), seem to reflect the capricious vivacity of his thought.

His character was always definite, whether it was clad in the dress suit of parma gray that he used to wear certain evenings in 1918, or in the French uniform he wore gloriously during the great match against the invader or again when he was discussing chorographical sinuosities with the ballet master, Fokine.

Many say of him that he is eccentric. This is absolutely false. He is simple and cordial.

To see Ravel on the rocks of Cibourne with on his head a soft hat verging on the romantic, dreaming before the wild untamed beauties of the scenery, then to find him again in his refined home, enables one to understand the man and the artist in his diversity.

Monteux, Head of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Action

ABLISHED 1881

om

Mr. Walsh has no force with which to enforce. Every man and woman
The following are facts:
not aware of my identity.
friends in defending his course. He is have not been influenced by him or his or related to Mr. Walsh in any way and lector Walsh. I am not connected with think Mr. Graves has misjudged Colhibition enforcement, such as it is? I
I shall set forth; also my view of pro-through your columns, a few facts that

PIANIST FEATURES BOSTON SYMPHONY

Leo Arnstein Is Perfect in His Scales and Arpeggios.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave the third concert of its Washington series yesterday afternoon in the National Theater before a large and distinguished audience. Leo Ornstein, pianist, was the soloist, substituting for Emilio de Gogorza, barytone, who is ill. The program chosen by M. Monteux was interesting, though too long by half an hour for an afternoon concert. The orchestra played the "Reformation" symphony, No. 5, in D minor, opus 107, by Mendelssohn; the second episode from Linau's "Faust," by Liszt, and for the last number Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

The symphony was beautifully played in tone and interpretation, the second movement particularly delightful in rhythm and daintiness, and the last movement, in sharp contrast, was filled with rich organ effects. "Stenka Razine" is a brilliant composition, rich in harmonies, which M. Monteux made the most of, finishing with a climax of tragedy.

Mr. Ornstein played the MacDowell concerto in D minor, opus 23, No. 2, with brilliant technic, rich tone and tremendous climaxes. The second movement, presto geocoso, was charmingly played with daintiness, clean fingerwork and fascinating rhythm. The latter part of the last movement, molto allegro, was taken at an astounding tempo, and the youthful pianist gave out scintillating scales and arpeggios, which sometimes startled his hearers by their perfection. Some of the beauty of the last climax was, however, marred by too loud an accompaniment by the orchestra.

K. B.

rom

Post

Hartford, Conn.

JAN 18 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Leo Ornstein, Pianist and Composer, to Be Soloist With Musical Organization at Parsons's Monday Evening.

Hartford will have its opportunity of judging the qualities of Pierre Monteux, the noted new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra when that famous organization makes its only appearance in Hartford this season at Parsons's theater next Monday evening. Mr. Monteux will come to Hartford with a precedent, for he has amply justified his reputation as a conductor of opera, concert and ballet on two continents by making the present season of the Boston Symphony orchestra one of the busiest and in every sense the most successful in its history. The music which he has prepared for the concert in Hartford exemplifies Mr. Monteux's reputation as a program maker of cosmopolitanism, discrimination and interest.

As soloist, Leo Ornstein, who has come to be one of the most highly admired pianists of our day, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra—music which should set off to fine advantage the artist's light and brilliant dexterity, his infectious rhythmic instinct, and the lyrical beauty of his tone. The coming together of such an orchestra and such a pianist is indeed the musical event of the Hartford season.

rom

Post

Hartford, Conn.

Boston Symphony.

Great interest and curiosity were felt in the single performance this season of the Boston orchestra, in Hartford, and some dissatisfaction is expressed with that performance.

Of course, the Boston Symphony orchestra of nineteen twenty is not the Boston Symphony orchestra we were accustomed to hear, as liberal and sweeping changes were made in the personnel.

All the enemy aliens are gone, for which we can all be grateful. The remainder, comprising perhaps sixty per cent of the original, are still with us, and have not deteriorated.

A large number of new players have been incorporated into the orchestra, players selected as carefully as possible and of as high a standard as usual—apparently there is no loss of power or quality here.

But the organization is partly new, and the leader is new, and the orchestra is choosing different music. All these things ought to please us.

Granting utmost diversity of view as to conductors, etc., does it not seem that the orchestra personnel is better, and with more work, will develop as fine esprit de corps as it ever had.

To me the new Boston Symphony is better than the old Boston Symphony in one other aspect, there is less obvious repression of the players and more individual enthusiasm among them.

While an ironclad control may be valuable discipline, and an almost automatic individuality may impress some; yet no two violins being alike, nor any two bows, the greatest and most splendid results are found, not when all individuals of a choir are made alike, but when each individual is at his best, and all together.

The first method is Prussian, the second promotes the highest citizenship.

TIGHT BINDING

Leo Ornstein With the Boston Symphony Orchestra At Parsons January 12.

LEO ORN STEIN.
Famous Pianist to Appear at Parsons's With Boston Symphony Orchestra January 12.

Miss Gillmore is the daughter of Frank Gillmore, whose activities with the Equity have won him renown. Miss Gillmore is extremely young, extremely pretty, and extremely intelligent. Jack vital

PRINCESS.

Ora Carew, in "Loot," a Universal Melodrama—"The I...

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

...tive Program Has Been Arranged ...the Concert at Parsons's January ...—Leo Ornstein, Soloist.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its sole visit of the season to Hartford on Monday evening, January 12 playing in Parsons's theater (for which tickets are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's), Leo Ornstein, the phenomenal Russian-American pianist, will be heard as soloist in MacDowell's brilliant Second Concerto. When he played this same splendid work with the great orchestra in Boston recently, even the reactionary academies who had been shaking their heads over Ornstein's wild and revolutionary compositions, enthusiastically attested his supreme powers as a pianist, for his swift and limpid touch and buoyant rhythms are irresistible.

In addition to the program originally announced for this concert, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished new conductor, will include the prelude and final apotheosis of love and death from the greatest love music ever written—"Tristan and Isolde"—by which he has restored Wagner to the symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic orchestra...

ORNSTEIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its sole visit of the season to Hartford on Monday evening, January 12, playing in Parsons Theatre (for which tickets are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's), Leo Ornstein, the phenomenal Russian-American pianist, will be heard as soloist in MacDowell's brilliant second concerto. When he played this same splendid work with the great orchestra in Boston recently, even the reactionary academies who had been shaking their heads over Ornstein's wild and revolutionary compositions, enthusiastically attested his supreme powers as a pianist, for his swift and limpid touch and buoyant rhythms are irresistible.

In addition to the program originally announced for this concert, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished new conductor, will include the prelude and final apotheosis of love and death from the greatest love music ever written—"Tristan and Isolde"—by which he has restored Wagner to the Symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic orchestra has already played, Cesar Franck's brilliant and rousing symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," will be performed in its stead.

PARSONS' THEATER, MON. EVE., Jan. 12

Only Hartford Concert This Season by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST, LEO ORNSTEIN, PIANO

Tickets $2, $1.50, $1. No Tax

NOW ON SALE AT SEDGWICK & CASEY'S

139 Asylum Street

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE, JAN. 12

Leo Ornstein to Play MacDowell's Second Concerto at Parsons's.

When Leo Ornstein, who will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 12, for which tickets are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, was announced recently to play the same splendid concerto with the great orchestra in Boston, the conservatives shook their heads over the Russian-American who composes such wild and revolutionary pieces. But of Ornstein the pianist there was but one opinion. His amazing swiftness, clarity and resilient vitality entranced all who heard him. In addition to the program originally announced for this, the single Hartford concert of the season, Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor, will conduct the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," by which he has restored Wagner to the Symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs, on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic Orchestra has already played, Cesar Franck's rousing and brilliant symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," will be performed in its stead.

AY EVENING, JANUARY 1, 1920

Hartford Post

Leo Ornstein With Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES JANUARY 12

For the sole concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford this season, which will take place at Parsons Thertre on Monday evening, January 12th, the sale of... seats will open tomorrow at Sedgwick and Casey's, 139 Asylum street. The great Orchestra is now in its highe... state of illustrious excellence. Pierre Monteux, the renowned new conductor has put upon the programme Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony Cesar Franck's symphonic Poem "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from Tristan and Isolde." As the... terrace, ...Telephone Charter $305.

...RNSTEIN IS PIANIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence playing in Parsons's theater Monday evening, January 12, music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization in what is considered the highest and most illustrious state of perfection it has ever reached. This perfection may be in part attributed to the distinguished personnel of the orchestra, but much credit is also due to the genius of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. He will open this concert with Beethoven's dramatic Fifth Symphony in C minor—the most popular and enduring of all symphonies, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind, will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist, as soloist. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor, which he has recently played in Boston with the great Orchestra with striking success. The infection with his rythms, the marvelous swiftness and delicacy of his touch—these qualities aroused en-

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Great Orchestra With Leo Ornstein as Special Artist Will Play at Parsons's January 12.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence playing in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January ... music-lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization in what is considered the highest and most illustrious state of perfection it has ever reached. This perfection may be in part attributed to the distinguished personnel of the orchestra, but much credit is also due to the genius of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. He will open this concert with Beethoven's dramatic Fifth Symphony in C minor—the most popular and enduring of all symphonies. Rossini's overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist, as soloist. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor, which he has recently played in Boston with the great orchestra with striking success. The infection of his rhythms, the marvelous swiftness and delicacy of his touch—these qualities aroused enthu-

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Seat Sale Begins On Friday for Concert To Be Given at Parsons's on January 12.

Hartford Courant Jan 1

Friday at Sedgwick & Casey's, No. 139 Asylum street tickets will be on sale for the only Hartford concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season which will be given at Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 12. There is exceptional interest in Pieire Monteux the famous new conductor who has made the concerts of this season the most brilliant in years, according to general opinion and crowded attendance. He will direct on this occasion Beethoven's ever popular Fifth symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman," Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." As soloist, Leo Ornstein, the noted composer-pianist will play MacDowell's second concerto with the great orchestra.

ORNSTEIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence, playing in Parsons Theatre on Monday evening, January 12,

music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor will open his concert with Beethoven's dramatic fifth Symphony in C minor the most popular and enduring of all symphonies. Rossini's overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind, will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist, as soloist. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor.

Hartford Courant Jan 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MONDAY

Celebrated Orchestra with Leo Ornstein Comes to Parsons's.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its sole appearance of the season in Hartford at Parsons's Theater tomorrow evening, there will be the opportunity of hearing the famous orchestra in the state of illustrious brilliance which it has reached under the inspired guidance of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor. A season more crowded than the present one, and more successful from every point of view, the orchestra has never enjoyed. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the most enduringly popular of them all, will head a program further notable for Cesar's Franck's pictorial and exciting Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from the music drama "Tristan and Isolde."

As soloist, Leo Ornstein, who has come to be one of the most highly admired pianists of our day, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra—music which should set off to fine advantage the artist's light and brilliant dexterity, his infectious rhythmic instinct, and the lyrical beauty of his tone. The coming together of such an orchestra and such a pianist is the musical event of the Hartford season.

FROM ... 1920

Courant

Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM AT PARSONS'S TONIGHT

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons's Theater at 8:15 tonight, when Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the great orchestra, will present the following program:—

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Leo Ornstein, the much discussed pianist-composer, will be the soloist

From JAN 12 1920

Post

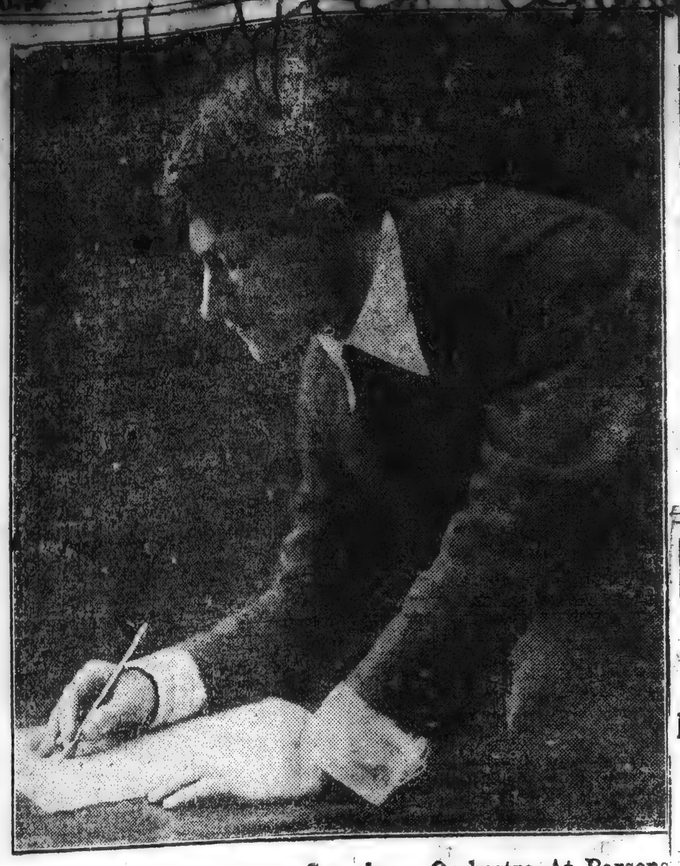
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons Theatre at 8:15 tonight, when Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor of the great Orchestra, will present the following eventful programme—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and ... Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Leo Ornstein, the highly admired and travel... much discussed pianist-compos... will be the soloist this evening. He...

TIGHT BINDING

DAY, JANUARY 1920.



Leo Ornstein With the Boston Symphony Orchestra At Parsons January 12.

LEO ORN STEIN.
Famous Pianist to Appear at Parsons's With Boston Symphony Orchestra January 12.

Miss Gillmore is the daughter of Frank Gillmore, whose activities with the Equity have won him renown. Miss Gillmore is extremely young, extremely pretty, and extremely intelligent. Jack vital

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

ctve Program Has Been Arranged the Concert at Parsons's January —Leo Ornstein, Soloist.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its sole visit of the season to Hartford on Monday evening, January 12, playing in Parsons Theatre (for which tickets are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's), Leo Ornstein, the phenomenal Russian-American pianist, will be heard as soloist in MacDowell's brilliant Second Concerto. When he played this same splendid work with the great orchestra in Boston recently, even the reactionary academies who had been shaking their heads over Ornstein's wild and revolutionary compositions, enthusiastically attested his supreme powers as a pianist, for his swift and limpid touch and buoyant rhythms are irresistible.

In addition to the program originally announced for this concert, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished new conductor, will include the prelude and final apotheosis of love and death from the greatest love music ever written—"Tristan and Isolde"—by which he has restored Wagner to the symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic orchestra has already played, Cesar Franck's brilliant and rousing symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," will be performed in its stead.

Don't wonder

PRINCESS.

Ora Carew in "Loot," a Universal Melodrama—"The I

ORNSTEIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony orchestra makes its sole visit of the season to Hartford on Monday evening, January 12, playing in Parsons Theatre (for which tickets are on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's), Leo Ornstein, the phenomenal Russian-American pianist, will be heard as soloist in MacDowell's brilliant second concerto. When he played this same splendid work with the great orchestra in Boston recently, even the reactionary academies who had been shaking their heads over Ornstein's wild and revolutionary compositions, enthusiastically attested his supreme powers as a pianist, for his swift and limpid touch and buoyant rhythms are irresistible.

In addition to the program originally announced for this concert, Pierre Monteux, the distinguished new conductor, will include the prelude and final apotheosis of love and death from the greatest love music ever written—"Tristan and Isolde"—by which he has restored Wagner to the Symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic orchestra has already played, Cesar Franck's rousing and brilliant symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," will be performed in its stead.

PARSONS' THEATER, MON. EVE., Jan. 12

Only Hartford Concert This Season by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

SOLOIST, LEO ORNSTEIN, PIANO

Tickets $2, $1.50, $1. No Tax

NOW ON SALE AT SEDGWICK & CASEY'S

139 Asylum Street

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS HERE, JAN. 12

Leo Ornstein to Play MacDowell's Second Concerto at Parsons's.

When Leo Ornstein, who will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in Parsons's Theater on Monday evening, January 12, for which tickets are now on sale at Sedgwick & Casey's, was announced recently to play the same splendid concerto with the great orchestra in Boston, the conservatives shook their heads over the Russian-American who composes such wild and revolutionary pieces. But of Ornstein the pianist there was but one opinion. His amazing swiftness, clarity and resilient vitality entranced all who heard him. In addition to the program originally announced for this, the single Hartford concert of the season, Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor, will conduct the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde," by which he has restored Wagner to the Symphony programs, in accordance with his expressed policy of choosing the best music of all lands and epochs, on its intrinsic merits only. The symphony at this concert will be Beethoven's immortal Fifth in C minor, the most popular and enduring of them all, which, according to history, overpowered and terrified Goethe beyond expression. In order not to repeat Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," which the Hartford Philharmonic Orchestra has already played, Cesar Franck's rousing and brilliant symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," will be performed in its stead.

AY EVENING, JANUARY 1, 1920

Hartford Post

Leo Ornstein With Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES JANUARY 12

For the sole concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford this season, which will take place at Parsons Thertre on Monday evening, January 12th, the sale of seats will open tomorrow at Sedgwick and Casey's, 139 Asylum street. They great Orchestra is now in its highe vice city ther Mac- cele- set- to

Will ance

hard ains or- pen- uard

" is New r all been cing at be not also ists. aret ting

RNSTEIN IS PIANIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence, playing in Parsons's theater Monday evening, January 12, music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization in what is considered the highest and most illustrious state of perfection it has ever reached. This perfection may be in part attributed to the distinguished personnel of the orchestra, but much credit is also due to the genius of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux.

He will open this concert with Beethoven's dramatic Fifth Symphony in C minor—the most popular and enduring of all symphonies, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind, will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist as solost. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor, which he has recently played in Boston with the great Orchestra with striking success. The infection with his rythms, the marvelous swiftness and delicacy of his touch—these qualities aroused enthu- sides state of illustrious excellence. Pierre Monteux, the renowned new conductor has put upon the programme Beethoven's immortal Fifth Symphony Cesar Franck's symphonic Poem "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from Tristan and Isolde." As the terrace, Telephone Charter 3905.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Great Orchestra With Leo Ornstein as Special Artist Will Play at Parsons's January 12.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence, playing in Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 12, music-lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization in what is considered the highest and most illustrious state of perfection it has ever reached. This perfection may be in part attributed to the distinguished personnel of the orchestra, but much credit is also due to the genius of the new conductor, Pierre Monteux. He will open this concert with Beethoven's dramatic Fifth Symphony in C minor—the most popular and enduring of all symphonies. Rossini's overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist, as soloist. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor, which he has recently played in Boston with the great orchestra with striking success. The infection of his rhythms, the marvelous swiftness and delicacy of his touch—these qualities aroused enthu- Will be heard to

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Seat Sale Begins On Friday for Concert To Be Given at Parsons's on January 12.

Hartford Courant Jan 1

Friday at Sedgwick & Casey's, No. 139 Asylum street tickets will be on sale for the only Hartford concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra this season which will be given at Parsons's theater on Monday evening, January 12. There is exceptional interest in Pieire Monteux the famous new conductor who has made the concerts of this season the most brilliant in years, according to general opinion and crowded attendance. He will direct on this occasion Beethoven's ever popular Fifth symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "The Wild Huntsman," Wagner's prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Lsolde." As soloist, Leo Ornstein, the noted composer-pianist will play MacDowell's second concerto with the great orchestra.

ORNSTEIN WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to Hartford after a season's absence, playing in Parsons Theatre on Monday evening, January 12,

music lovers will have the opportunity of hearing the famous organization Pierre Monteaux, the new conductor will open his concert with Beethoven's dramatic Fifth Symphony in C minor —the most popular and enduring of all symphonies. Rossini's overture to "William Tell," equally famous in its kind, will be the closing number. This concert will bear further interest in having Leo Ornstein, the brilliant composer-pianist, as soloist. The concerto of his choice will be MacDowell's Second in D minor.

Hall Courant Jan 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE MONDAY

Celebrated Orchestra with Leo Ornstein Comes to Parsons's.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its sole appearance of the season in Hartford at Parsons's Theater tomorrow evening, there will be the opportunity of hearing the famous orchestra in the state of illustrious brilliance which it has reached under the inspired guidance of Pierre Monteux, the new conductor.

A season more crowded than the present one, and more successful from every point of view, the orchestra has never enjoyed. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the most enduringly popular of them all, will head a program further notable for Cesar's Franck's pictorial and exciting Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from the music drama "Tristan and Isolde."

As soloist, Leo Ornstein, who has come to be one of the most highly admired pianists of our day, will play MacDowell's Second Concerto with the orchestra—music which should set off to fine advantage the artist's light and brilliant dexterity, his infectious rhythmic instinct, and the lyrical beauty of his tone. The coming together of such an orchestra and such a pianist is the musical event of the Hartford season.

From
Courant
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM AT PARSONS'S TONIGHT

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons's Theater at 8:15 tonight, when Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the great orchestra, will present the following program:—

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Leo Ornstein, the much discussed pianist-composer, will be the soloist

JAN 12 '20

From Post
Hartford, Conn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its only appearance of the season here in Parsons Theatre at 8:15 tonight, when Pierre Monteux, the eminent new conductor of the great Orchestra, will present the following eventful programme— Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Wagner's Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Leo Ornstein the highly admired and much discussed pianist-composer, will be the soloist of the evening. He

"Jeux"—The Type Kiss

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Ballet as Tone-Poem for the First Times in America—The Fracas Over It Six Years Ago in Paris—The Composer's Music Versus Nijinsky's Action—A Delicate, Subtle, Fluid Score in His Super-Sensitive Manner

[illegible]uck, [illegible]city [illegible]usi[illegible] [illegible]hav[illegible] [illegible]me[illegible] [illegible]s [illegible]r [illegible]n[illegible]

No sooner had Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet gained a footing in Paris, say ten years ago, than he proposed to various French composers that they undertake pieces for one and another—Ravel, Dukas, Hahn, Debussy—accepted the invitation. It opened new field to them; it tempted their imaginations, alike with the prospect of composition and of performance; while, for the time, no form of music was so much the fashion, so much "in the air." So much acclaimed in present estate and future promise as the ballet, the mimo-drama, the "poème danse." Receiving their commissions, Ravel set to "Daphnis and Chloe"; Dukas to "The Peri"; Hahn to "The Blue God," and Debussy to "Jeux," officially translated "Playtime." In due course, the Russian Ballet produced "Daphnis and Chloe" whereupon Ravel and Diaghilev quarrelled bitterly over the score or the disuse of an invisible chorus. Dukas, quarrelling likewise with the director, repented his bargain and other hands ultimately set "The Peri" on the stage. "The Blue God" was mimed and danced and Hahn and Diaghilev kept the peace. "Jeux" was tranquilly produced; but forthwith a furious hubbub arose over a "choreography" devised and enforced by Nijinsky, but declared by the partisans of Debussy to be wholly at odds with the music. To the discordant tune of this controversy, "Jeux" was represented for a few times in Paris and in London in the summer of 1913 and thereafter quietly dropped from the repertory of the ballet.

None of these pieces has yet been set on the stage in the United States, though the Russians at their second visit promised "Daphnis and Chloe" and "The Blue God." Hahn's music, such as it is, remains unknown to American ears; but at the Symphony Concerts, here in Boston, Dr. Muck played in two suites substantially the whole of Ravel's setting of "Daphnis and Chloe"; while in the autumn of 1918 Mr. Monteux played in toto and as a symphonic piece, Dukas's "Peri." At the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday next he will do likewise by Debussy's "Jeux," for the first hearings of the "poème danse" on this side of the Atlantic.

When the fracas over it was at height, the defenders of the music against the "choreography" declared that it would readily gain and maintain place as a tone-poem for the concert-hall. In fact, it has seldom been heard anywhere since the summer of 1913, in which Mr. Monteux, with Debussy at hand for suggestion and also approval, first produced it.

The Original Fracas

After the first performance of "Jeux" in Paris, Monsieur Lalo, reviewer for Le Temps, returned to his desk in a fury and wrote: "The action of 'Jeux' is altogether simple. By night into a garden lighted by electric lamps, come a youth and two maidens dressed for tennis. The youth flirts with one of the girls, while the other looks on pouting. He then flirts with the second damsel, while the first pouts in her turn. Finally he flirts with them both, and all three, stretched on the turf, exchange a sort of triple kiss. Of a sudden in bounds a tennis ball that scares them away. . . . Of Debussy's music I regret that I can tell you next to nothing. It is difficult to hear it; it is well-nigh impossible to heed it. In itself, it is economical, adroit, elastic, flowing, evanescent, fine-fibred, discreetly woven. It has, however, pressed the Russian Ballet to join it to a heavy and freakish background and to clothe it in a rude 'choreography.' Under this double burden Debussy lies stricken and suffocated. The setting and the action are so exasperating, so brutally freakish that they overwhelm the attention and the music passes almost unnoted.

"'Choreography by Monsieur Nijinsky, setting by Monsieur Bakst'—and both are in shrieking discord with Debussy's clear intent. Following the precedent of his version of 'The Afternoon of a Faun,' Nijinsky imposes on the three youngsters—himself and Mmes. Karsavina and Schollar—stiff and mechanical poses, angular and wizened gestures, geometrical of line, rude, jerky, wilfully begun, as arbitrarily checked or broken, derived obviously from primitive Grecian vase-painting. In 'The Afternoon of a Faun' such miming was far enough from Debussy's music and Mallarmé's verse; but it had a measure of justification in the archaic suggestion of faun and nymphs. In 'Jeux' it is without excuse. What have these rigid posturings, these sharpened silhouettes, this mincing play of arm and hand to do with the flirtation which is the beginning and the end of Nijinsky's action? In spite of his partisans, he 'stylizes' nothing; he merely exacts an arbitrary system of his own. Wilfully he chooses ugliness and freakishness instead of the demanded, the desired, beauty. Why, in Heaven's name, has he been permitted to impose on Debussy's subtle, delicate, fluid music this geometrical, stifling, heavy-handed 'choreography'? At moments, by sheer instinct, he and Miss Karsavina and Miss Schollar escape their 'system' and dance charmingly, but few in a short piece are these returns to common sense."

A month later in London, the reviewer for The Times was only a little less severe:

Every one knows by now that Debussy and Nijinsky between them have concocted a "tennis ballet." There was little need in reality to be so precise about the game, for the tennis (such as it is) is entirely irrelevant. It has not even conditioned the convention in which the movements are conceived and carried out. They seem rather to be designed by a freshly invented convention which aims at expression neither by naturalistic movements nor by movements based on pictorial symbols. Some of the symbolism is plastic and here and there are some beautiful poses—notably one of Nijinsky when he turns his head on one side and tightens the muscles of the neck—but it is confused through being broken into by leaps and bounds and certain swirling movements which seem to have been transferred from the old familiar ballets in the repertory. Some of the new language in which the ideas are expressed is beautiful and eloquent and is really expressive, but it covers only a very small field. It expresses timidity and virgin coyness, for instance, and bashful joy and in the very last moment fear at some unexpected and inexplicable intrusion (when the second tennis ball is thrown over the hedge), but it is like a language in which the speaker is restricted to a portion of the alphabet. Many ideas cannot be properly expressed at all from the want of letters to form the words in the speaker's mind, or else old letters have to be used in new senses and the result is confusion.

Perhaps Nijinsky will some day discover and learn the whole alphabet of which at present he has acquired only the partial use; at present his results are too tentative, and, though we may admire him for attempting to strike out into new paths by inventing fresh conventions, we cannot be insensible to the ludicrousness and the ugliness of much of what he has designed. . . . One longed to be able to unbuckle the limbs of the dancers and set them free from the rigid ties by which they were bound. Their faces, too, were rigid, for it is part of the convention that they should express no emotion, and this made one want to have them covered with masks. It was tantalizing to see the faces of Nijinsky, Karsavina, and Schollar with all the humanity drawn out of them. The whole thing, in fact, was unsatisfactory æsthetically because hampering restrictions were placed by an arbitrary convention without bringing any compensating powers of expression.

Nijinsky's Action

Perhaps by intention of Debussy, the orchestral score of "Jeux" gives no hint of the action devised by Nijinsky. It is in fact, as straightforwardly engraved as though it were a tone-poem self-contained. The reduction for piano, however, specifies the "choreography in recurring annotation above the staves. It follows herewith, printed continuously as an "argument":

The curtain rises on the empty garden. . . . A tennis-ball falls on the stage. . . . A youth in tennis-clothes, racquet in hand, crosses the stage with a spring and vanishes. . . . At the back, on the left, appear two girls, inquiringly, apprehensively. For a moment they seem to be seeking no more than a secluded spot for confidences. . . . One dances by herself. . . . In turn the other dances. . . . The girls stop, perturbed by the rustle of leaves pushed aside. . . . The youth is seen at the back trying to screen himself. He watches the movements of the girls. He draws near and stands in front of them. . . . They are ready to run away, but he detains and invites them. . . . He begins to dance. The first girl runs toward him. They dance together. . . . He asks a kiss. She eludes him. He asks again; once more she turns away . . . then rejoins him consenting. . . . Pettishly, jealously, the second girl watches these amorous ecstasies and mocks them in ironic dance.

The youth begins to heed the girl's dance inquiringly, interestedly. . . . Soon he forsakes the first girl, unable to resist the desire to dance with the second. . . . "It is thus we dance." [The first figure of the much-applauded waltz.] The second girl repeats the figure. "Don't make fun of us." . . . And they dance together. . . . The dance becomes more caressing. The girl runs away and hides in the shrubbery. The youth follows her. In a moment they return with the boy in chase of the girl. Again they dance together. . . . In their excitement and preoccupation with each other they have not noticed the mood of the other girl. She has hidden her face in her hands and is ready to run away. Her friend tries vainly to detain her. She will not hear a word. The second girl finally takes her in her arms. . . . Presently the youth intervenes, gently parting them. "Look around. The beauty of the night, the joy of the light bid us yield to our fancies." Forthwith all three dance together. . . . With an eager movement the boy draws their heads together and a triple kiss fuses their amorous intoxication. . . . A tennis ball falls at their feet. Surprised, alarmed, they spring away and vanish into the depths of the garden. . . .

There remains a word about the music as the orchestral score discloses it. Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has written it as hereunder:

And Last the Music

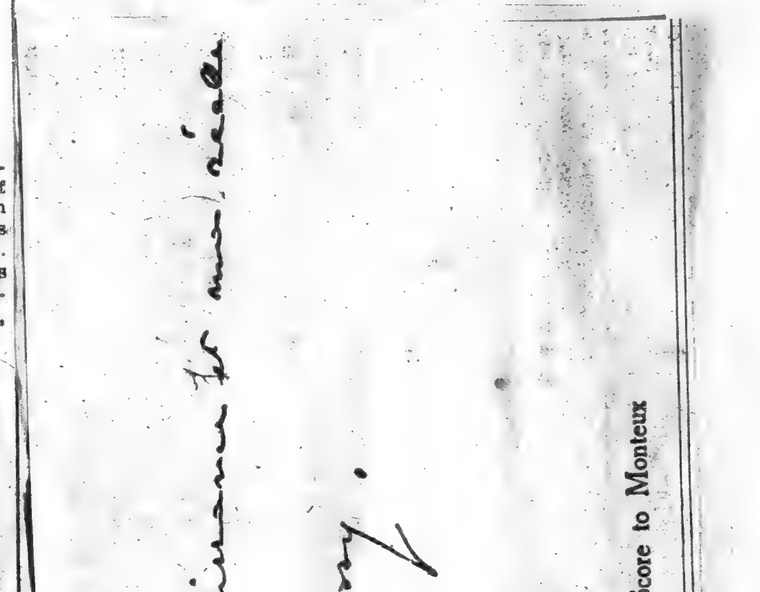
Debussy, an innovator in musical and harmonic inventions, shows a corresponding faculty for clothing his ideas in new orchestral garb. Whether, as in other respects, he was quick to fertilize a hint from he Neo-Russians or from his French contemporaries, notably the "Monsieur" Massenet of irreverent Parisian youth, his orchestral works show a progressive mastery in subtilizing the resources of the orchestra. From "The Afternoon of a Faun" through the "Nocturnes," "Pélleas and Mélisande," "The Sea" and finally the "Images," he was continually exploring new tonal synonyms for delicacy, fresh shadings of evanescent poetry, and impalpable suggestions of "atmosphere." There are numerous anecdotes of his tireless experiments in orchestration after music was in rehearsal, to the annoyance of conductors and the [illegible] lists. Often apparently satisfied, he would meditate re-scorings up to the last possible moment. Thus Mr. Rabaud introduced into his performances of the "Nocturnes" in Boston last season revisions which materially improved the effect of many details to the sensitive ear.

"Jeux," irrespective of its musical charm, is one of the most felicitous, if possibly the latest, instance of Debussy's orchestral finesse. Studied in a piano version, the music comes upon occasion perilously near to slightness, to use no more derogatory an epithet. But ballet-masters require a "practical" version for rehearsal, and thus it is only from the orchestral score that one can gain an adequate idea of the musical as well as the orchestral value of this piece. For Debussy has added innumerable arabesques and counter-melodies of expressive importance. He has clarified "voice-leadings" which are at best only barely indicated, and sometimes are hardly sketched. He has intensified the rhythms through the judicious employment of instruments of percussion, and furthermore has often continued and coördinated them in a manner that adds immeasurably to the architectural "lines" of the piece itself. Thus the piano version is perforce the sketch, and the orchestral score the finished picture.

To the well-nigh conventional list of instruments which the modernist French composer deems essential to obtain variety and refinement of orchestral color, Debussy only adds a second piccolo, which, with the first, can obtain soft, acute effects impossible to the flutes, and a third clarinet. The more tractable sarrusophone replaces the more cumbersome contra-bassoon. The half-dozen instruments of percussion, used deftly, though with economy, are all as familiar as the two harps and celesta. But the strings are subdivided to an unwonted extent, sometimes merely in the interests of delicacy, sometimes to secure sensitive complexities, which would otherwise be too concrete and baffling for dramatic illusion.

But against this background of normal equipment Debussy has made excursions into novelty which are unusual even in his career of exploration, and patient experiment. If the scenario of "Jeux" comes dangerously near the ridiculous, and if the material of the music comes close to Debussy's limit as concerns exiguousness, the disposition of his orchestral resources helps to heighten poetic and dramatic illusion to an extraordinary degree. After the tennis ball bounds on the stage, the gestures of the apprehensive and curious young girls is mirrored in the light and ethereal strings, with the background of wind chords. When the young man who sought the tennis ball, curious in his turn, parts the branches of the bushes to watch the young girls' dance, the shimmer of highly sub-divided strings brings a graphic illusion in orchestral tone. The embrace of the young man and a girl brings a moment of intensity and coloristic sonority, only equalled by the graphic irony of the choice of instruments in the following passage in which the second girl exhibits jealousy and mocks the dance of the others. Again when the first girl hurt in turn, tries to flee, her chagrin and injured vanity find subtle equivalent in the shrinking music given to a few desks of violins, violas and violoncellos in alternation with wind instruments. These are only a few tangible episodes in a work replete with imaginative touches in coloristic detail.

The mutual reconciliation of the two girls and the young man and their final dance brings a gradual increasing massing of instruments still relatively subtle, but so adroitly handled that the final climax gains additional force. To point this out in detail would necessitate a departure into technical explanation which would inevitably be tedious and possibly fruitless. After the flight of all his characters, Debussy rings down his dramatic and orchestral curtain by recalling the misty and vague prelude with which he began, embellished with some appropriately impressionistic figures in the strings against wood-wind chords. Whatever discussion may arise as to the music, there can hardly be two opinions as to the supremely successful manner in which Debussy has set his music in the orchestra. Color, poetry, subtilized emotion and rhythm are there with a mastery which he has never exceeded.

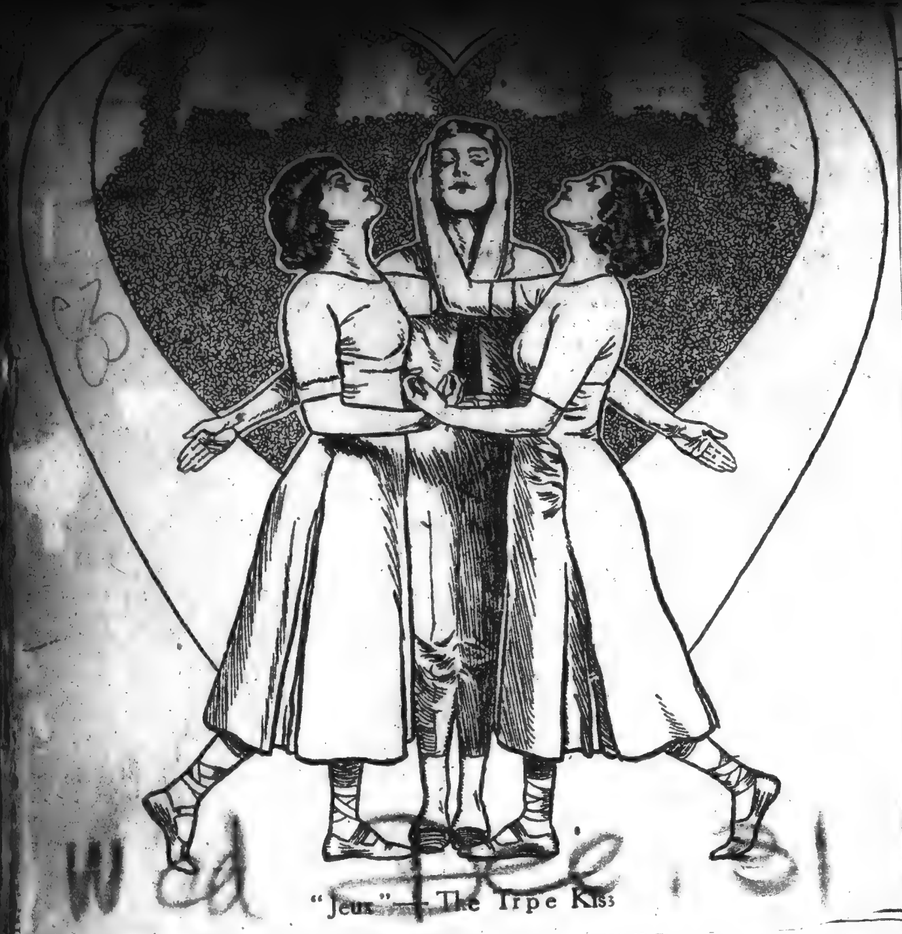


"Jeux"—Debussy Inscribes a Piano-Score to Monteux

From Brooklyn Life
New York City
JAN 3 1920

Next Boston Symphony Concert.

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January ninth, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude are unrivaled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."



"Jeux"—The Irpe Kiss

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

MR. MONTEUX PROPOSES ANOTHER NOVEL PIECE

The Ballet as Tone-Poem for the First Times in America—The Fracas Over It Six Years Ago in Paris—The Composer's Music Versus Nijinsky's Action—A Delicate, Subtle, Fluid Score in His Super-Sensitive Manner

Muck, leity, nusi nav me

No sooner had Mr. Diaghilev's Russian Ballet gained a footing in Paris, say ten years ago, than he proposed to various French osers that they undertake pieces for ne and another—Ravel, Dukas, Hahn, ssy—accepted the invitation. It opened w field to them; it tempted their nations alike with the prospect of osition and of performance; while, the time, no form of music was so uch the fashion, so much "in the air." much acclaimed in present estate and ture promise as the ballet, the mimo-rama, the "poème dansé." Receiving eir commissions, Ravel set to "Daphnis d Chloe"; Dukas to "The Peri"; Hahn "The Blue God," and Debussy to eux," officially translated "Playtime." due course, the Russian Ballet produced aphnis and Chloe" whereupon Ravel d Diaghilev quarrelled bitterly over the e or the disuse of an invisible chorus. ukas, quarrelling likewise with the direc-r, repented his bargain and other hands timately set "The Peri" on the stage. The Blue God" was mimed and danced and Hahn and Diaghilev kept the peace. eux" was tranquilly produced; but forth-ith a furious hubbub arose over a horeography" devised and enforced by ijinsky, but declared by the partisans Debussy to be wholly at odds with e music. To the discordant tune of this ntroversy, "Jeux" was represented for few times in Paris and in London in e summer of 1913 and thereafter quietly opped from the repertory of the ballet.

None of these pieces has yet been set the stage in the United States, though e Russians at their second visit promised aphnia and Chloe" and "The Blue God." ahn's music, such as it is, remains un-own to American ears; but at the Sym-ny Concerts, here in Boston, Dr. Muck ayed in two suites substantially the hole of Ravel's setting of "Daphnis d Chloe"; while in the autumn of 1918 r. Monteux played in toto and as a mphonic piece, Dukas's "Peri." At the phony Concerts of Friday and Satur-next he will do likewise by Debussy's eux," for the first hearings of the "po-e dansé" on this side of the Atlantic.

When the fracas over it was at height, the defenders of the music against the "choreography" declared that it would readily gain and maintain place as a tone-poem for the concert-hall. In fact, it has seldom been heard anywhere since the summer of 1913, in which Mr. Monteux, with Debussy at hand for suggestion and also approval, first produced it.

The Original Fracas

After the first performance of "Jeux" in Paris, Monsieur Lalo, reviewer for Le Temps, returned to his desk in a fury and wrote: "The action of 'Jeux' is altogether simple. By night into a garden lighted by electric lamps, come a youth and two maidens dressed for tennis. The youth flirts with one of the girls, while the other looks on pouting. He then flirts with the second damsel, while the first pouts in her turn. Finally he flirts with them both, and all three, stretched on the turf, exchange a sort of triple kiss. Of a sudden in bounds a tennis ball that scares them away. . . . Of Debussy's music I regret that I can tell you next to nothing. It is difficult to hear it; it is well-nigh impossible to heed it. In itself, it is economical, adroit, elastic, flowing, evanescent, fine-fibred, discreetly woven. It has, however, pleased the Russian Ballet to join it to a heavy and freakish background and to clothe it in a rude 'choreography.' Under this double burden Debussy lies stricken and suffocated. The setting and the action are so exasperating, so brutally freakish that they overwhelm the attention and the music passes almost unnoted.

"'Choreography by Monsieur Nijinsky, setting by Monsieur Bakst'—and both are in shrieking discord with Debussy's clear intent. Following the precedent of his version of 'The Afternoon of a Faun,' Nijinsky imposes on the three youngsters—himself and Mmes. Karsavina and Schollar—stiff and mechanical poses, angular and wizened gestures, geometrical of line, rude, jerky, wilfully begun, as arbitrarily checked or broken, derived obviously from primitive Grecian vase-painting. In 'The Afternoon of a Faun' such miming was far enough from Debussy's music and Mallarmé's verse; but it had a measure of justification in the archaic suggestion of faun and nymphs. In 'Jeux' it is without excuse. What have these rigid posturings, these sharpened silhouettes, this mincing play of arm and hand to do with the flirtation which is the beginning and the end of Nijinsky's action? In spite of his partisans, he 'stylizes' nothing; he merely exacts an arbitrary system of his own. Wilfully he chooses ugliness and freakishness instead of the demanded, the desired, beauty. Why, in Heaven's name, has he been permitted to impose on Debussy's subtle, delicate, fluid music this geometrical, stifling, heavy-handed 'choreography'? At moments, by sheer instinct, he and Miss Karsavina and Miss Schollar escape their 'system' and dance charmingly, but few in a short piece are these returns to common sense."

A month later in London, the reviewer for The Times was only a little less severe:

Every one knows by now that Debussy and Nijinsky between them have concocted a "tennis ballet." There was little need in reality to be so precise about the game, for the tennis (such as it is) is entirely irrelevant. It has not even conditioned the convention in which the movements are conceived and carried out. They seem rather to be designed by a freshly invented convention which aims at expression neither by naturalistic movements nor by movements based on pictorial symbols. Some of the symbolism is plastic and here and there are some beautiful poses—notably one of Nijinsky when he turns his head on one side and tightens the muscles of the neck—but it is confused through being broken into by leaps and bounds and certain swirling movements which seem to have been transferred from the old familiar ballets in the repertory. Some of the new language in which the ideas are expressed is beautiful and eloquent and is really expressive, but it covers only a very small field. It expresses timidity and virgin coyness, for instance, and bashful joy and in the very last moment fear at some unexpected and inexplicable intrusion (when the second tennis ball is thrown over the hedge), but it is like a language in which the speaker is restricted to a portion of the alphabet. Many ideas cannot be properly expressed at all from the want of letters to form the words in the speaker's mind, or else old letters have to be used in new senses and the result is confusion.

Perhaps Nijinsky will some day discover and learn the whole alphabet of which at present he has acquired only the partial use; at present his results are too tentative, and, though we may admire him for attempting to strike out into new paths by inventing fresh conventions, we cannot be insensible to the ludicrousness and the ugliness of much of what he has designed. . . . One longed to be able to unbuckle the limbs of the dancers and set them free from the rigid ties by which they were bound. Their faces, too, were rigid, for it is part of the convention that they should express no emotion, and this made one want to have them covered with masks. It was tantalizing to see the faces of Nijinsky, Karsavina, and Schollar with all the humanity drawn out of them. The whole thing, in fact, was unsatisfactory æsthetically because hampering restrictions were placed by an arbitrary convention without bringing any compensating powers of expression.

Nijinsky's Action

Perhaps by intention of Debussy, the orchestral score of "Jeux" gives no hint of the action devised by Nijinsky. It is in fact, as straightforwardly engraved as though it were a tone-poem self-contained. The reduction for piano, however, specifies the "choreography in recurring annotation above the staves. It follows herewith, printed continuously as an "argument":

The curtain rises on the empty garden. . . . A tennis-ball falls on the stage. . . . A youth in tennis-clothes, racquet in hand, crosses the stage with a spring and vanishes. . . . At the back, on the left, appear two girls, inquiringly, apprehensively. For a moment they seem to be seeking no more than a secluded spot for confidences. . . . One dances by herself. . . . In turn the other dances. . . . The girls stop, perturbed by the rustle of leaves pushed aside. . . . The youth is seen at the back trying to screen himself. He watches the movements of the girls. He draws near and stands in front of them. . . . They are ready to run away, but he detains and invites them. . . . He begins to dance. The first girl runs toward him. They dance together. . . . He asks a kiss. She eludes him. He asks again; once more she turns away . . . then rejoins him consenting. . . . Pettishly, jealously, the second girl watches these amorous ecstasies and mocks them in ironic dance.

The youth begins to heed the girl's dance inquiringly, interestedly. . . . Soon he forsakes the first girl, unable to resist the desire to dance with the second. . . . "It is thus we dance." [The first figure of the much-applauded waltz.] The second girl repeats the figure. "Don't make fun of us." . . . And they dance together. . . . The dance becomes more caressing. The girl runs away and hides in the shrubbery. The youth follows her. In a moment they return with the boy in chase of the girl. Again they dance together. . . . In their excitement and preoccupation with each other they have not noticed the mood of the other girl. She has hidden her face in her hands and is ready to run away. Her friend tries vainly to detain her. She will not hear a word. The second girl finally takes her in her arms. . . . Presently the youth intervenes, gently parting them. "Look around. The beauty of the night, the joy of the light bid us yield to our fancies." Forthwith all three dance together. . . . With an eager movement the boy draws their heads together and a triple kiss fuses their amorous intoxication. . . . A tennis ball falls at their feet. Surprised, alarmed, they spring away and vanish into the depths of the garden. . . .

There remains a word about the music, as the orchestral score discloses it. Mr. Edward Burlingame Hill has written it as hereunder:

And Last the Music

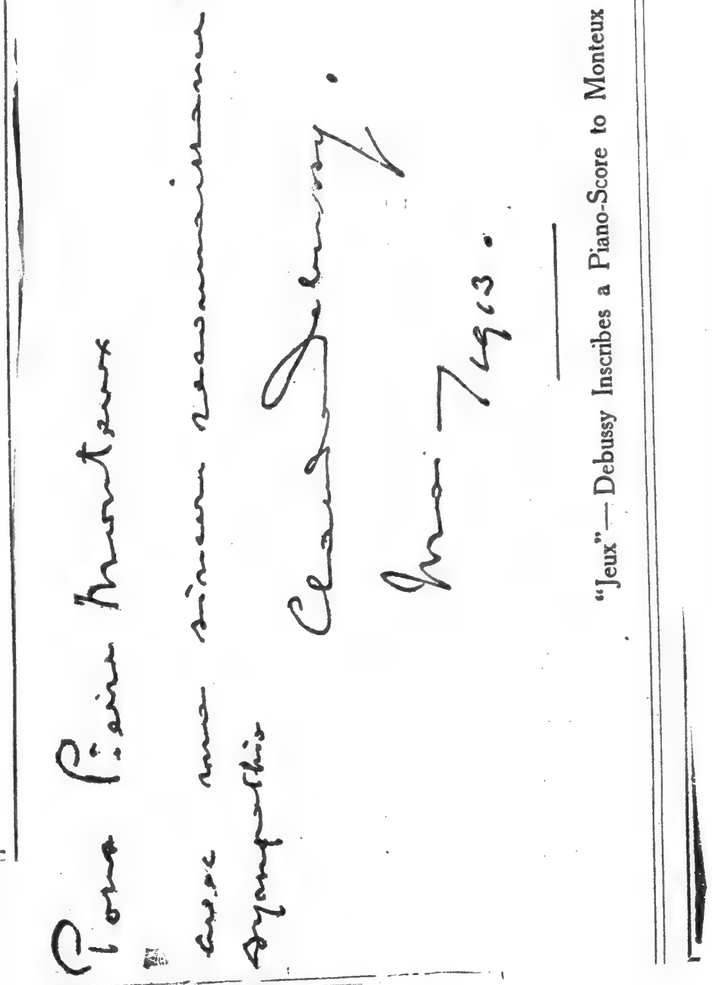
Debussy, an innovator in musical and harmonic inventions, shows a corresponding faculty for clothing his ideas in new orchestral garb. Whether, as in other respects, he was quick to fertilize a hint from he Neo-Russians or from his French contemporaries, notably the "Monsieur" Massenet of irreverent Parisian youth, his orchestral works show a progressive mastery in subtilizing the resources of the orchestra. From "The Afternoon of a Faun" through the "Nocturnes," "Pélleas and Mélisande," "The Sea" and finally the "Images," he was continually exploring new tonal synonyms for delicacy, fresh shadings of evanescent poetry, and impalpable suggestions of "atmosphere." There are numerous anecdotes of his tireless experiments in orchestration after music was in rehearsal, to the annoyance of conductors and the confusion of musicians. Often apparently satisfied, he would meditate re-scorings up to the last possible moment. Thus Mr. Rabaud introduced into his performances of the "Nocturnes" in Boston last season revisions which materially improved the effect of many details to the sensitive ear.

"Jeux," irrespective of its musical charm, is one of the most felicitous, if possibly the latest, instance of Debussy's orchestral finesse. Studied in a piano version, the music comes upon occasion perilously near to slightness, to use no more derogatory an epithet. But ballet-masters require a "practical" version for rehearsal, and thus it is only from the orchestral score that one can gain an adequate idea of the musical as well as the orchestral value of this piece. For Debussy has added innumerable arabesques and counter-melodies of expressive importance. He has clarified "voice-leadings" which are at best only barely indicated, and sometimes are hardly sketched. He has intensified the rhythms, through the judicious employment of instruments of percussion, and furthermore has often continued and coördinated them in a manner that adds immeasurably to the architectural "lines" of the piece itself. Thus the piano version is perforce the sketch, and the orchestral score the finished picture.

To the well-nigh conventional list of instruments which the modernist French composer deems essential to obtain variety and refinement of orchestral color, Debussy only adds a second piccolo, which, with the first, can obtain soft, acute effects impossible to the flutes, and a third clarinet. The more tractable sarrusophone replaces the more cumbersome contra-bassoon. The half-dozen instruments of percussion, used deftly, though with economy, are all as familiar as the two harps and celesta. But the strings are subdivided to an unwonted extent, sometimes merely in the interests of delicacy, sometimes to secure sensitive complexities, which would otherwise be too concrete and baffling for dramatic illusion.

But against this background of normal equipment Debussy has made excursions into novelty which are unusual even in his career of exploration, and patient experiment. If the scenario of "Jeux" comes dangerously near the ridiculous, and if the material of the music comes close to Debussy's limit as concerns exiguousness, the disposition of his orchestral resources helps to heighten poetic and dramatic illusion to an extraordinary degree. After the tennis ball bounds on the stage, the gestures of the apprehensive and curious young girls is mirrored in the light and ethereal strings, with the background of wind chords. When the young man who sought the tennis ball, curious in his turn, parts the branches of the bushes to watch the young girls' dance, the shimmer of highly sub-divided strings brings a graphic illusion in orchestral tone. The embrace of the young man and a girl brings a moment of intensity and coloristic sonority, only equalled by the graphic irony of the choice of instruments in the following passage in which the second girl exhibits jealousy and mocks the dance of the others. Again when the first girl hurt in turn, tries to flee, her chagrin and injured vanity find subtle equivalent in the shrinking music given to a few desks of violins, violas and violoncellos in alternation with wind instruments. These are only a few tangible episodes in a work replete with imaginative touches in coloristic detail.

The mutual reconciliation of the two girls and the young man and their final dance brings a gradual increasing massing of instruments still relatively subtle, but so adroitly handled that the final climax gains additional force. To point this out in detail would necessitate a departure into technical explanation which would inevitably be tedious and possibly fruitless. After the flight of all his characters, Debussy rings down his dramatic and orchestral curtain by recalling the misty and vague prelude with which he began, embellished with some appropriately impressionistic figures in the strings against wood-wind chords. Whatever discussion may arise as to the music, there can hardly be two opinions as to the supremely successful manner in which Debussy has set his music in the orchestra. Color, poetry, subtlized emotion and rhythm are there with a mastery which he has never exceeded.



"Jeux"—Debussy Inscribes a Piano-Score to Monteux

ESTABLISHED 1881
JAN 3
From
Brooklyn Life
New York City

Next Boston Symphony Concert.

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January ninth, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude are unrivaled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

WORLD,
New York City
DEC 28 1919

GOSSIP

By James Gibbons Huneker

HENRY EDWARD KREHBIEL is not a date-hound. This may sound paradoxical, for the veteran music-critic has just published his "More Chapters of Opera," the pages of which are fairly studded with figures, facts and horrid statistics. Nevertheless, Dean Krehbiel is not a date-hound. What is a date-hound? Philip Hale of Boston-Town—Philip the word-painter not Philip L. Hale the virtuoso of the paint-brush—forever penned to paper in his memorable phrase, the "passionate pressagent." Who, then, coined that cunning combination, date-hound? Rumhounds we have, like the Prohibitionists, always with us. A college professor is of necessity a date-hound, for he is the Eternal Sophomore, and the sophomoric mind is elementary inasmuch as it believes that anything or everything can be proved by figures. I should say, off-hand, that a datehound is one who delights in the proposition that two and two make four. In music he thinks more highly of a composer's birth or death years than he does of his music. Sometimes "he" is a "she." In that case imagination can go hang.

The truth is that Mr. Krehbiel is the original date tree in the garden of music. Around this tree we, the little date-hounds, gather begging for the tiniest morsel of its fruit. And like the good-hearted giant he is, he shakes his branches and the promised shower falls. He mixes his facts with his lovable personality, and what would be a page of arid statistics in the book of another writer is made attractive by the style of the man. I read from Sunday to Sunday in the Tribune newspaper the various chapters of his new work—in length almost 500 pages—and I glanced through the chapter headings of the printed book to refresh my memory, but I am more interested in the author's Introductory Observations. I loathe history—which is never historical, only a group of carefully selected fictions, more or less illuminated by the historians' preferences and prejudices—but I like the note personal. Krehbiel is attractively personal. His introductory chapter is his Apologia and his artistic Credo, a sound defense of his beliefs and disbeliefs in musical matters.

Let's talk about the man, who is bigger than his book, as is any writer worth his salt. Krehbiel is certainly bigger than any of his books. And he is a large man physically. He is fully qualified to talk about opera. Forty years he has been a faithful laborer in the vineyard of musical criticism; just that and thirty-five of those years he has occupied the same orchestra stall at the opera, nothing more. Most of the slaves rowing in the same ink-pot galley with him make, from time to time, an effort to escape their cramping toil. They write books about cookery or the reduction of fat—witness Vanca Thompson's witty, brilliant "Eat and Grow Thin"—or as in the case of Henry Theophilus Finck, they emulate Metchnikoff and attack the intestines as the seat of all mundane unhappiness. Good old Dr. Finck! He ought to be called the Christopher Colon of music-critics; or, perhaps, the semi-colon.

Oblivion the Critic's Reward.

But Father Krehbiel refused the temptation of extra critical work. In the columns of the Tribune newspaper he distilled his intellectual energy four decades. Well done thou good and faithful servant! should be the applauding verdict of every music lover in the land. But it isn't. On the contrary, the younger generation of operagoers which no longer knocks at the door, instead kicks in the panels thereof, hustles the oldsters from the "seats of the mighty." The reward of virtue is the consciousness of virtue. The reward of a critic, musical or dramatic, is oblivion, and he is lucky if it isn't obloquy. A music critic is a parasite among herd animals. Every musician's hand is against him, save those he overpraises. If he tells the truth! When he flatters—i. e., lies—he is a hero, temporarily. But always the despised and rejected. I took the ox by the tail thirty years ago when I christened the members of the press room at the Metropolitan Opera House the "Chain Gang." I have ever felt as would a convict, humble, handcuffed, dragging a ball and chain through a dreary, sunless landscape. Wherefore music criticism is the gentle art of praising mediocrity; it is a waste of time listening to other people's music making. Second, every man believes he has picked out the wrong trade or profession, even if he be a money-getter. The music critic knows he has. He makes no money, notwithstanding the vulgar belief that he revels in bribes, that he drinks champagne with singers in that No Man's Land "behind the scenes," that he also likes to give pain to rotten bad singers and players! Bribes, prett singers, champagne? O Jeremy! where are these things? Lead me to them sister! I've been at the game almost for the same period as Krehbiel an I've never been "approached;" no, not even by that most insidious form o bribery, Little Bright Eyes. My experience is that the wolf is never fa from the door. The truth is unpalatable. When a critic writes down th account of what he has heard he summons up a cloud of enemies. And while there is no Absolute in music criticism more than there is an Abso lute in the universe—there is one critical certitude, as the Dean long ag pointed out: A critic may err as to the relative value—all is relative!—of a new composition, for he isn't necessarily a prophet; but as to a performance, vocal or instrumental, there is no excuse for not knowing whether it is good, bad or indifferent. That is a "constant;" as the chemists have it, in music criticism.

If I seem pessimistic about my chosen profession just read William James Henderson in last Sunday's Sun newspaper. In reviewing his colleague's book he doesn't hesitate to spill the salt into the soup, as the Cambodians say. He smashes the illusion that a critic leads the life of a sybarite, of "shame," of inglorious ease. Again, the truth. Enemies, hatred, abuse are the rewards of a man of Krehbiel's splendid intellectual attainments—(but they read him)—a man of more versatility than people are aware of, for he has elected to sail his ship in one sea, seeking no escape. With his mental equipment and general culture he might easily have been a political leader. For Philip Hale the programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is his "escape," also his literary monument—this is anticipating Death, but Mr. Hale will grasp my friendly intention. Mr. Henderson is an authority on ships. He is a sailing master. His "escape." Mine used to be piano playing, French art and literature. Now I walk about Flatbush and wonder why so many babies are born down there. Richard Aldrich of the Times newspaper doesn't attempt to escape. He is in for life. He knows it. He philosophically accepts the sentence, though he is not happy. As for Dr. Finck of the Evening Post newspaper, he is the only critic who possesses a pair of ear-muffs that quite extinguish sounds. He is the one member of our miserable guild who is care-free. No wonder!

His Meeting With Mr. Krehbiel.

Mr. Krehbiel is my senior by a few years, but in 1885 his seniority seemed appalling. I was a youngster; he the critical monarch of all he surveyed. I first met him at the old Academy on Irving Place, in July, 1885, and at the festival of the Music Teachers' National Association, of which Albert Ross Parsons, the distinguished piano pedagogue, was President or President-elect. "Harry" Krehbiel, as he is known to his intimates, was a young giant, a critical Lochinvar out of the West, blond as a sun-god and as genial as man could be. Lilli Lehmann named him the "Young Siegfried," for he was of that type; dignified, handsome, as he is to-day. I at once addressed him as Jupiter Tonans, thereby winning exemption from his more deadly thunderbolts. The truth is that of all his choir I have given him more bother, with my waywardness, my vagaries and my numerous excursions into the limbo of things futile. But he always welcomed home the prodigal son. The ninety and nine he had with him; it was his solicitude for the one strayed sheep that demonstrated his personal affection. Well, it has been heartily returned, this affection, and is still entertained by the entire fold. After all, Krehbiel is Krehbiel. Let him be not forgetting it, as they say in Ireland.

But it must not be imagined that he is a pessimist. Far from it. He is a merciful man, and only when aroused by some particularly vicious act—artistically, rather inartistically vicious—is he aroused to indignation. Then, please, stand from under! Yet, in his righteous wrath, he never throws down the various Temples of Caza. It suffices that he shakes their pillars. He is always on the side of the angels. We all recognize that, even when we can't subscribe to his point of view. He knows opera in New York as no one else; indeed, the history of music criticism in America radiates from Henry Edward Krehbiel. He is its hub. There were critics before him, there will be, there are, critics to follow him, yet none will fill his seven-league boots. He is our biggest product thus far in this particular field over here.

Opera Habit Like Gum-Chewing.

Going to opera, that mishmash of styles, that most depressing of all forms of entertainment, camp-meetings not excluded, is not unlike gum-chewing. The more you chew the more it is the same. Always rechewing the stale end of tunes. There are a few exceptions to the rule, that of all the intellect-stultifying "diversions" grand opera is the chiefest. A half dozen names beginning with Mozart and ending with Wagner and Verdi come to my memory; otherwise, I have never spent an evening at the opera—I began sinning in 1869—without praying for a speedy release from this terrestial purgatory. Nunc dimittis! I pray, but my supplication is unheeded. Like the parrot pawned at Carver Reed's old pawnshop on Market Street, Philadelphia—this was in the late seventies—I could cry out: "I'm in for life, Paul, I'm in for life. Take me out of hock, Paul, I'm in for life." This sensitive bird resented the publicity of a cage hanging outside of the shop. The Paul referred to was my brother—God rest his soul! I think that the bird belonged to a maiden aunt of a friend. Critics are sacrificial goats. I'm the caged parrot. Hocked by Destiny, and not as Ben da Casseres asserts, "the Janitor of the Pantheon," I'm in for life! I'm in for life! Thereby hangs my tale.

Why in the world, grumbles a reader, do you cling to such a job if you so hate it? The world is wide, there are other avocations. Plumbing is profitable. Why not apprentice yourself to a politician and accomplish something useful in the world, if nothing else but to relieve the plethora of marks in the possession of congested multi-millionaires? These queries are well grounded. Let me whisper in your ear our secret. Sufferance is the badge of our tribe, but our fundamental failing is hold on to your chair!—our passion for music. Once attained there is no escape. You are become fanatical. A false note from a singer and your sole revolte (you may sing false yourself). Qui a bu, boira! sings the poet. The fatal philtre of the music Circe turns us into opium fiends, the opium being sound. Through our ears the citadels of our souls are invaded. No escape? None. We hug our chains. Krehbiel has been listening to music more than a half-century—he has graciously instructed us "How to Listen to Music"—and he still yearns for more, for he has retained his early enthusiasm. His taste is impeccable. So does Master Bill Henderson. So do we all. Ned Ziegler made his "escape" from criticism, but he jumped from the frying pan into the fire of operatic management. Toujours de la musique! Music critics are, in the last analysis, only Oliver Twists begging for more—more music and better. And, after a fashion, this attitude reveals a certain temperamental idealism.

"More Chapters of Opera" Invaluable.

Krehbiel's "More Chapters of Opera" is an invaluable record of New York history during the past ten years. It may give pain to some, but it will please the judicious. It is a work of reference for which we should be grateful to the Hercules who has attempted to cleanse the Augean stables. Tolla lege! Harry Krehbiel is a bully old musical scout.

"The Complete Opera Book," by the late Gustave Kobbe, a mourned colleague, is truly the most "comprehensive handbook" I have ever seen. It is, literally, "first aid to the critics," as well as others. The task of completion has been admirably accomplished by Katharine Wright, herself another "professional."

Robert Cortes Holliday is an essayist who has strayed in from the eighteenth century. He has charm, a shrewd, kindly wit, and his prose is leisurely-paced. In his newly-born "Broome Street Straws"—an alluring title, by the way—I chanced upon a chapter entitled "The Pub," and after I finished there were tears in my eyes. I was like the peri without the barred gates of a vanished paradise. Whosoever has drunk of the English nectar, known as "bitters"—"please, a n and puts hair on your chest. Mr. Hollida 'pubs," or public houses, in London, a ci personal rights. No, I shan't be wishing n unhappy New Year is coming. An renchermen and valiant tosspots. Orem

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

WE HAVE now heard the P Symphony of Beethoven twic past two weeks, once by our o chestra and once by the Boston phony. It is too bad that these cations cannot be avoided when such an exhaustive list of wo might be performed. Of cours impossible, for the two orchestr not make public their program in advance, if, indeed, they ar up for so long a time ahead, w very unlikely.

It must be admitted that the P Symphony is one that does not w well as some of the other symp of Beethoven. Despite its man vious beauties and its lovely mel it is not Beethoven at his best, a only goes to show that descriptive sic, or even music written to a gram without being actually desc tive, is not the highest form of the Beethoven himself had very defi ideas on the subject of descriptive m sic and how far it could be used, f in a note on one of the sketches for th very symphony he had written: "Car ried too far, all delineation in music loses in efficiency." Which goes to show among other things that even Beethoven knew the much-abused word with which he closed the sentence.

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 1920

EMILIO DE GOGORZA
The Famous Barytone, Will Be Heard Here With The Boston Symphony Orchestra

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.
DEC 4 - 1919

MONTEUX'S PLANS

Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Discusses Programs—Favors American Music

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, went to France last summer to see his mother and father, his country and his countrymen for the first time since his military service in the first two years of the war. He brought back with him a great quantity of music that he might have a wide choice and be sure of the best that is new for his future programs.

Praises American Music

American music will not be slighted in his programs, and he has consulted a number of composers since his return late in August. "We may in time develop a true 'American music,'" he told an interviewer, "but that time has not arrived yet. At present American music is impregnated with the influence of old-world music, of the Italian and the German, and the Russian composer.

"Unlike the music of these nations, you cannot recognize American music at once as typically characteristic. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American comes, there will be no doubt of the nationality. It will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—but with a different style—an American style. I think it will come. It will be very original, very American.

The Conductor's War Experiences

Mr Monteux strongly believes that the public wants the music of Wagner, and he intends to give Wagner a due place on his programs, which is not large in symphony concerts. "I think the time has come to regard music and war as two different things," he said, and he wants to forget the war and his part in it. It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr Monteux lived with the soldiers of France as one of them in the trenches.

"To me the war is now very far off, and very unhappy. Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow musicians from Paris, met in the thick of an engagement. I fired. Oh yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck in loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind his rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy."

"Hardly a Sunday passed when I did not furnish the music for the rough and ready religious service. Sometimes I played a harmonium, sometimes, when fortune smiled a real organ in a ruined church. Sometimes I had only my violin."

Strauss in Abeyance

"Wagner is dead, but Strauss is living," he said, when questioned about the latter composer. "Still, I would very much like to play his music. During the conflict it seemed to me entirely wrong. But Strauss's music was not due to the war, and the war is over. People's feelings are sensitive, and their feelings, I wish above all, to respect.

"Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but fair to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programs. Not to play his music is a definite loss because even Strauss's poorer music is extremely effective, and brilliant in orchestration. But one must have considera- on for that which is a fact and not theory; the state, following the taclysm of the nerves of the orld."

Wants to Please the Public

Mr Monteux is always eager to lease his public, and he is not shamed of the fact. "I would far ather conduct a popular concert than formal one. I much prefer the opular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for one who presen's the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the all is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners."

Despite his interest in the popular oncert, he is not a "gallery" conuctor. According to the Frenchman, here are two kinds of conductors, allery" and "orchestra." The "gal- ry conductor" is concerned with aking "catchy" effects; the other nd is concerned first and last with e men before him, and he is much occupied with the music to try superficialities.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

With his seeming fondness for music hat echoes Parisian opera stages, Emi- de Gorgorza, one of the greatest ritones of the times, will sing at the oston Symphony concert in the cademy of Music tomorrow evening luck's dramatic aria, "Pitiless iana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," nd Massenet's Love Song from "The ing of Lahore." Beethoven's immorl "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert under the direction of Pierre Monteaux. For the rest, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," a musical portrayal of the ravera episode from Lenau's "Faust."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

WORLD,
New York City
DEC 28 1919

GOSSIP

By James Gibbons Huneker

HENRY EDWARD KREHBIEL is not a date-hound. This may sound paradoxical, for the veteran music-critic has just published his "More Chapters of Opera," the pages of which are fairly studded with figures, facts and horrid statistics. Nevertheless, Dean Krehbiel is not a date-hound. What is a date-hound? Philip Hale of Boston-Town—Philip the word-painter not Philip L. Hale the virtuoso of the paint-brush—forever penned to paper in his memorable phrase, the "passionate press-agent." Who, then, coined that cunning combination, date-hound? Rumhounds we have, like the Prohibitionists, always with us. A college professor is of necessity a date-hound, for he is the Eternal Sophomore, and the sophomoric mind is elementary inasmuch as it believes that anything or everything can be proved by figures. I should say, off-hand, that a date-hound is one who delights in the proposition that two and two make four. In music he thinks more highly of a composer's birth or death years than he does of his music. Sometimes "he" is a "she." In that case imagination can go hang.

The truth is that Mr. Krehbiel is the original date tree in the garden of music. Around this tree we, the little date-hounds, gather begging for the tiniest morsel of its fruit. And like the good-hearted giant he is, he shakes his branches and the promised shower falls. He mixes his facts with his lovable personality, and what would be a page of arid statistics in the book of another writer is made attractive by the style of the man. I read from Sunday to Sunday in the Tribune newspaper the various chapters of his new work—in length almost 500 pages—and I glanced through the chapter headings of the printed book to refresh my memory, but I am more interested in the author's Introductory Observations. I loathe history—which is never historical, only a group of carefully selected fictions, more or less illuminated by the historians' preferences and prejudices—but I like the note personal. Krehbiel is attractively personal. His introductory chapter is his Apologia and his artistic Credo, a sound defense of his beliefs and disbeliefs in musical matters.

Let's talk about the man, who is bigger than his book, as is any writer worth his salt. Krehbiel is certainly bigger than any of his books. And he is a large man physically. He is fully qualified to talk about opera. Forty years he has been a faithful laborer in the vineyard of musical criticism; just that and thirty-five of those years he has occupied the same orchestra stall at the opera, nothing more. Most of the slaves rowing in the same ink-pot galley with him make, from time to time, an effort to escape their cramping toil. They write books about cookery or the reduction of fat—witness Vanca Thompson's witty, brilliant "Eat and Grow Thin"—or as in the case of Henry Theophilus Finck, they emulate Metchnikoff and attack the intestines as the seat of all mundane unhappiness. Good old Dr. Finck! He ought to be called the Christopher Colon of music-critics; or, perhaps, the semi-colon.

Oblivion the Critic's Reward.

But Father Krehbiel refused the temptation of extra critical work. In the columns of the Tribune newspaper he distilled his intellectual energy four decades. Well done thou good and faithful servant! should be the applauding verdict of every music lover in the land. But it isn't. On the contrary, the younger generation of operagoers which no longer knocks at the door, instead kicks in the panels thereof, hustles the oldsters from the "seats of the mighty." The reward of virtue is the consciousness of virtue. The reward of a critic, musical or dramatic, is oblivion, and he is lucky if it isn't obloquy. A music critic is a parasite among herd animals. Every musician's hand is against him, save those he overpraises. If he tells the truth! When he flatters—i. e., lies—he is a hero, temporarily. But always the despised and rejected. I took the ox by the tail thirty years ago when I christened the members of the press room at the Metropolitan Opera House the "Chain Gang." I have ever felt as would a convict, humble, handcuffed, dragging a ball and chain through a dreary, sunless landscape. Wherefore music criticism is the gentle art of praising mediocrity; it is a waste of time listening to other people's music making. Second, every man believes he has picked out the wrong trade or profession, even if he be a money-getter. The music critic knows he has. He makes no money, notwithstanding the vulgar belief that he revels in bribes, that he drinks champagne with singers in that No Man's Land "behind the scenes," that he also likes to give pain to rotten bad singers and players! Bribes, prett singers, champagne? O Jeremy! where are these things? Lead me to them sister! I've been at the game almost for the same period as Krehbiel an I've never been "approached;" no, not even by that most insidious form o bribery, Little Bright Eyes. My experience is that the wolf is never fa from the door. The truth is unpalatable. When a critic writes down th account of what he has heard he summons up a cloud of enemies. And while there is no Absolute in music criticism more than there is an Abso lute in the universe—there is one critical certitude, as the Dean long ago pointed out: A critic may err as to the relative value—all is relative!—o a new composition, for he isn't necessarily a prophet; but as to a performance, vocal or instrumental, there is no excuse for not knowing whether it is good, bad or indifferent. That is a "constant;" as the chemists have it, in music criticism.

If I seem pessimistic about my chosen profession just read William James Henderson in last Sunday's Sun newspaper. In reviewing his colleague's book he doesn't hesitate to spill the salt into the soup, as the Cambodians say. He smashes the illusion that a critic leads the life of a sybarite, of "shame," of inglorious ease. Again, the truth. Enemies, hatred, abuse are the rewards of a man of Krehbiel's splendid intellectual attainments—(but they read him)—a man of more versatility than people are aware of, for he has elected to sail his ship in one sea, seeking no escape. With his mental equipment and general culture he might easily have been a political leader. For Philip Hale the programme book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is his "escape," also his literary monument—this is anticipating Death, but Mr. Hale will grasp my friendly intention. Mr. Henderson is an authority on ships. He is a sailing master. His "escape." Mine used to be piano playing, French art and literature. Now I walk about Flatbush and wonder why so many babies are born down there. Richard Aldrich of the Times newspaper doesn't attempt to escape. He is in for life. He knows it. He philosophically accepts the sentence, though he is not happy. As for Dr. Finck of the Evening Post newspaper, he is the only critic who possesses a pair of ear-muffs that quite extinguish sounds. He is the one member of our miserable guild who is care-free. No wonder!

His Meeting With Mr. Krehbiel.

Mr. Krehbiel is my senior by a few years, but in 1885 his seniority seemed appalling. I was a youngster; he the critical monarch of all he surveyed. I first met him at the old Academy on Irving Place, in July, 1885, and at the festival of the Music Teachers' National Association, of which Albert Ross Parsons, the distinguished piano pedagogue, was President or President-elect. "Harry" Krehbiel, as he is known to his intimates, was a young giant, a critical Lochinvar out of the West, blond as a sun-god and as genial as man could be. Lilli Lehmann named him the "Young Siegfried," for he was of that type; dignified, handsome, as he is to-day. I at once addressed him as Jupiter Tonans, thereby winning exemption from his more deadly thunderbolts. The truth is that of all his choir I have given him more bother, with my waywardness, my vagaries and my numerous excursions into the limbo of things futile. But he always welcomed home the prodigal son. The ninety and nine he had with him; it was his solicitude for the one strayed sheep that demonstrated his personal affection. Well, it has been heartily returned, this affection, and is still entertained by the entire fold. After all, Krehbiel is Krehbiel. Let him be not forgetting it, as they say in Ireland.

But it must not be imagined that he is a pessimist. Far from it. He is a merciful man, and only when aroused by some particularly vicious act—artistically, rather inartistically vicious—is he aroused to indignation. Then, please, stand from under! Yet, in his righteous wrath, he never throws down the various Temples of Caza. It suffices that he shakes their pillars. He is always on the side of the angels. We all recognize that, even when we can't subscribe to his point of view. He knows opera in New York as no one else; indeed, the history of music criticism in America radiates from Henry Edward Krehbiel. He is its hub. There were critics before him, there will be, there are, critics to follow him, yet none will fill his seven-league boots. He is our biggest product thus far in this particular field over here.

Opera Habit Like Gum-Chewing.

Going to opera, that mishmash of styles, that most depressing of all forms of entertainment, camp-meetings not excluded, is not unlike gum-chewing. The more you chew the more it is the same. Always rechewing the stale end of tunes. There are a few exceptions to the rule, that of all the intellect-stultifying "diversions" grand opera is the chiefest. A half dozen names beginning with Mozart and ending with Wagner and Verdi come to my memory; otherwise, I have never spent an evening at the opera—I began sinning in 1869—without praying for a speedy release from this terrestial purgatory. Nunc dimittis! I pray, but my supplication is unheeded. Like the parrot pawned at Carver Reed's old pawnshop on Market Street, Philadelphia—this was in the late seventies—I could cry out: "I'm in for life, Paul, I'm in for life. Take me out of hock, Paul, I'm in for life." This sensitive bird resented the publicity of a cage hanging outside of the shop. The Paul referred to was my brother—God rest his soul! I think that the bird belonged to a maiden aunt of a friend. Critics are sacrificial goats. I'm the caged parrot. Hocked by Destiny, and not as Ben da Casseres asserts, "the Janitor of the Pantheon," I'm in for life! I'm in for life! Thereby hangs my tale.

Why in the world, grumbles a reader, do you cling to such a job if you so hate it? The world is wide, there are other avocations. Plumbing is profitable. Why not apprentice yourself to a politician and accomplish something useful in the world, if nothing else but to relieve the plethora of marks in the possession of congested multi-millionaires? These queries are well grounded. Let me whisper in your ear our secret. Sufferance is the badge of our tribe, but our fundamental failing is hold on to your chair!—our passion for music. Once attained there is no escape. You are become fanatical. A false note from a singer and your sole revolte (you may sing false yourself). Qui a bu, boira! sings the poet. The fatal philtre of the music Circe turns us into opium fiends, the opium being sound. Through our ears the citadels of our souls are invaded. No escape? None. We hug our chains. Krehbiel has been listening to music more than a half-century—he has graciously instructed us "How to Listen to Music"—and he still yearns for more, for he has retained his early enthusiasm. His taste is impeccable. So does Master Bill Henderson. So do we all. Ned Ziegler made his "escape" from criticism, but he jumped from the frying pan into the fire of operatic management. Toujours de la musique! Music critics are, in the last analysis, only Oliver Twists begging for more—more music and better. And, after a fashion, this attitude reveals a certain temperamental idealism.

"More Chapters of Opera" Invaluable.

Krehbiel's "More Chapters of Opera" is an invaluable record of New York history during the past ten years. It may give pain to some, but it will please the judicious. It is a work of reference for which we should be grateful to the Hercules who has attempted to cleanse the Augean stables. Tolla lege! Harry Krehbiel is a bully old musical scout.

"The Complete Opera Book," by the late Gustave Kobbe, a mourned colleague, is truly the most "comprehensive handbook" I have ever seen. It is, literally, "first aid to the critics," as well as others. The task of completion has been admirably accomplished by Katharine Wright, herself another "professional."

Robert Cortes Holliday is an essayist who has strayed in from the eighteenth century. He has charm, a shrewd, kindly wit, and his prose is leisurely-paced. In his newly-born "Broome Street Straws"—an alluring title, by the way—I chanced upon a chapter entitled "The Pub," and after I finished there were tears in my eyes. I was like the peri without the barred gates of a vanished paradise. Whosoever has drunk of the English nectar, known as "bitters"—"please, a n agreeable barmaid, and behold! you are and puts hair on your chest. Mr. Hollida "pubs," or public houses, in London, a ci personal rights. No, I shan't be wishing an unhappy New Year is coming. An renchermen and valiant tosspots. Orem

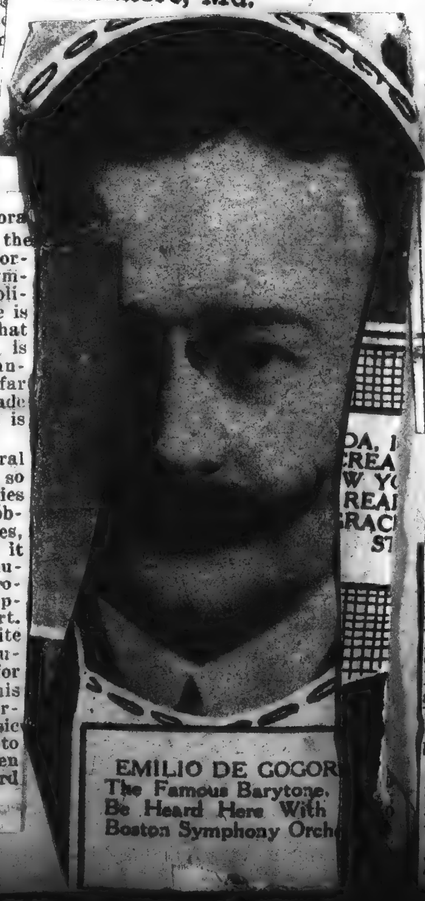
From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 10 1920

WE HAVE now heard the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven twice in the past two weeks, once by our own orchestra and once by the Boston Symphony. It is too bad that these duplications cannot be avoided when there is such an exhaustive list of works that might be performed. Of course, it is impossible, for the two orchestras cannot make public their programs so far in advance, if, indeed, they are made up for so long a time ahead, which is very unlikely.

It must be admitted that the Pastoral Symphony is one that does not wear so well as some of the other symphonies of Beethoven. Despite its many obvious beauties and its lovely melodies, it is not Beethoven at his best, and it only goes to show that descriptive music, or even music written to a program without being actually descriptive, is not the highest form of the art.

Beethoven himself had very definite ideas on the subject of descriptive music and how far it could be used, for in a note on one of the sketches for this very symphony he had written: "Carried too far, all delineation in music loses in efficiency." Which goes to show among other things that even Beethoven knew the much-abused word with which he closed the sentence.

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 1920



EMILIO DE GOGOR
The Famous Barytone,
Be Heard Here With
Boston Symphony Orch

From Republican
Springfield, Mass.
DEC 4 - 1919

MONTEUX'S PLANS

Director of Boston Symphony Orchestra Discusses Programs—Favors American Music

Pierre Monteux, the new conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, went to France last summer to see his mother and father, his country and his countrymen for the first time since his military service in the first two years of the war. He brought back with him a great quantity of music that he might have a wide choice and be sure of the best that is new for his future programs.

Praises American Music

American music will not be slighted in his programs, and he has consulted a number of composers since his return late in August. "We may in time develop a true 'American music,'" he told an interviewer, "but that time has not arrived yet. At present American music is impregnated with the influence of old-world music, of the Italian and the German, and the Russian composer.

"Unlike the music of these nations, you cannot recognize American music at once as typically characteristic. Something as yet is lacking. The time may be near when all this will be changed. When the true American comes, there will be no doubt of the nationality. It will possess the 'dance spirit' which characterizes Russian music—but with a different style—an American style. I think it will come. It will be very original, very American.

The Conductor's War Experiences

Mr Monteux strongly believes that the public wants the music of Wagner, and he intends to give Wagner a due place on his programs, which is not large in symphony concerts. "I think the time has come to regard music and war as two different things," he said, and he wants to forget the war and his part in it. It must be borne in mind that for 25 months Mr Monteux lived with the soldiers of France as one of them in the trenches.

"To me the war is now very far off, and very unhappy. Did I kill a German? I think not one, though Hasselmans and I, fellow musicians from Paris, met in the thick of an engagement. I fired. Oh yes! There were rifles on supports, stuck in loopholes in the trenches. One stepped up quickly behind his rifle and pulled the trigger. But I am quite sure I hit no one during my service in the trenches, and for that I am not unhappy."

"Hardly a Sunday passed when I did not furnish the music for the rough and ready religious service. Sometimes I played a harmonium, sometimes, when fortune smiled a real organ in a ruined church. Sometimes I had only my violin."

Strauss in Abeyance

"Wagner is dead, but Strauss is living," he said, when questioned about the latter composer. "Still, I would very much like to play his music. During the conflict it seemed to me entirely wrong. But Strauss's music was not due to the war, and the war is over. People's feelings are sensitive, and their feelings, I wish above all, to respect.

"Therefore, I think it not only sensible, but fair to find out how my audiences feel about Strauss before I decide how soon I shall put his name on my programs. Not to play his music is a definite loss because even Strauss's poorer music is extremely effective, and brilliant in orchestration. But one must have consideration for that which is a fact and not a theory; the state, following the cataclysm of the nerves of the world."

Wants to Please the Public

Mr Monteux is always eager to please his public, and he is not ashamed of the fact. "I would far rather conduct a popular concert than a formal one. I much prefer the popular nights to the fashionable subscription nights. That is because the people are enthusiastic. They applaud. It is good for one who presents the music. An enthusiastic audience which doesn't quite fill the hall is better than an overflow attendance of cold, dignified listeners."

Despite his interest in the popular concert, he is not a "gallery" conductor. According to the Frenchman, there are two kinds of conductors, "gallery" and "orchestra." The "gallery conductor" is concerned with making "catchy" effects; the other kind is concerned first and last with the [illegible] and he is much too occupied with the music to try for superficialities.

From
[illegible] Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN - 4 1920

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gorgorza, one of the greatest baritones of the times, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening Gluck's dramatic aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's immortal "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert under the direction of Pierre Monteaux. For the rest, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," a musical portrayal of the ravera episode [illegible] Lenau's "Faust."

Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play for the third time this season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Emilio Gogorza, baritone, as the assisting soloist. The program, conducted by Pierre Monteux, will include Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the "Pastoral," the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." Mr. de Gogorza is to sing an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the Love Song from Massenet's "The King of Lahore."

From JAN 3 1920
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, Emilio de Gogorza will be heard in Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The orchestral part of the program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From E DEC 27 1919
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. He will sing Gluck's aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" will be the orchestra numbers.

From JAN 4 - 1920 K
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of the times, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, Gluck's dramatic aria "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song from "The King of Lahore."

Beethoven's immortal "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz" brilliant in scoring and thrilling in description of the Tavern Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 28 1919

—The fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, is one of the most admired baritones of our concert stage, may be in part attributed to his Spanish aristocratic descent. His American birth and affiliations bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity must surely lie in the richness and lustre of his voice. He will sing on this occasion the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the rest, Pierre Monteux will provide music of the highest beauty in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature in the well-known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm. Also Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" waltz, wherein, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abandon.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 4 - 1920 K

De Gogorza Boston Symphony Soloist

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of the times, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening Gluck's dramatic aria "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's immortal "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Other numbers are the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 28 1919

Emilio de Gogorza, soloist for the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, is of Spanish aristocratic descent, though of American birth and affiliations. He will sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the rest, Pierre Monteux will provide music of the highest beauty in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature in the well-known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm; also Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" waltz, wherein, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abandon.

Press, DEC 28
Philadelphia, Pa.

The fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5th, is the most admired baritone of our concert stage, may be in part attributed to his Spanish aristocratic descent, which lends a peculiar charm to his interpretations, and in part to his American birth and affiliations which bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity must surely lie in the exampled richness and lustre of his voice. He will sing on this occasion the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

For the rest, Pierre Monteau will provide music of the highest beauty in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature in the well known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm; also Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" Waltz, where, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abandon.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 4 1920

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone solo-[ist] at the Boston Symphony concert [in] the Academy of Music tomorrow [even]ing, will sing Gluck's dramatic [aria] "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia [in] Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song, [from] the "King of Lahore." Beet-[hoven's] "Pastoral" symphony No. 6 [will] be heard at this concert, [under] direction of Pierre Mon-[teux]. For the rest, the program in-[cludes] Wagner's "Par-[sifal]" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 4 - 1920

—Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening Gluck's dramatic aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 will be heard at this concert, which will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and

EMILIO DE GOGORZA.

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," brilliant in scoring and thrilling in description of the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust" will be offered.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Leo Ornstein Takes Place of De Gogorza as Concert Soloist.

Once again Philadelphia was treated to a performance of Beethoven's pastoral symphonw, the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last night, having this work for the principal offering. Leaders of orchestras should have some system by which they would be enabled to keep in touch with the music given in the cities they visit. If a little judgment were exercised in this direction the repetition of symphonies by one orchestra after the other could be avoided and great variety and interest would attach to programs. Beethoven's one program work, the Pastoral Symphony, seems so weak and insipid compared to the majority of the other symphonies that it should be a warning to composers who discount inspiration and cultivate the "program" idea in music. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, gave to the symphony all the tonal beauty and polish possible and aroused, through his skillful leadership, a great deal of enthusiasm.

Owing to the illness of Emilio De Gogorza, Leo Ornstein, pianist, stepped into the breach and made a fine impression by his playing and interpretation of the MacDowell concerto in D minor. Ornstein played under many difficulties, his piano not reaching the Academy until after 6 o'clock and having then to be tuned and warmed up. His magnificent playing, however, proved that real genius always triumphs, his performance of the MacDowell concerto being one of the big outstanding features of the musical season. The rest of the orchestral program comprised the overture to Wagner's "Parsifal" and the "Mephisto" waltz from "Faust."

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 192[0]

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Concert at the Academy With L[eo] Ornstein as Soloist

The most interesting and notewor[thy] feature of the concert given by the B[os]ton Symphony Orchestra, under the [di]rection of Mr. Pierre Monteux, at [the] Academy of Music last evening, was [the] appearance in the place of Mr. Emilio Gogorza, whom sickness prevented from fulfilling his engagement, of Mr. Leo Ornstein, who played Edward MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23. As a composer in the general view Ornstein is a good deal of a joke, but there is not much room for any material differences of opinion as to his pianistic abilities, and his well-developed technique and high musical intelligence were pleasingly and impressively exhibited in a lucid, brilliant and masterly exposition of MacDowell's soulful, melodious and poetically imaginative music.

The other things on the list were the demode "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, which by one of those strange coincidences which are so frequent and so regrettable, was done by our own orchestra only ten days ago; the Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz. It were idle to pretend that the Boston Orchestra is yet all that it used to be, but in the quality of its tone, in the unanimity of its movement and in its ready responsiveness to the guidance of its director, it made a much nearer approach to its old form last night than it has done upon any recent previous occasion, and should it continue to improve as rapidly as it has been doing in smoothness and precision and mobility and refinement it may be expected before very long to regain the prestige and distinction which its unfortunate vicissitudes have naturally and unavoidably impaired. The audience in attendance was large and friendly.

From JAN 6 - 192[0]
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN THIRD CONCERT

Leo Ornstein Soloist in the MacDowell Concerto—Pastoral Symphony Performed

THE PROGRAM

Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral).....Beethoven
Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra.....MacDowell
Leo Ornstein
Mephisto Waltz from "Faust".....Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its Philadelphia season last evening at the Academy of Music before a large audience, and again the organization showed that under the leadership of Mr. Monteux it is rapidly taking the position among the great orchestras that its history and its personnel warrant. The orchestra last evening did the best playing that it has done here for two seasons at least, and the tone quality and the routine of playing, such as attacks, releases, et cetera, were far better than at any time since the series of events of nearly three years ago, which left the great orchestra in so perilous an artistic position.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, the "Pastoral," a composition which was played by our own orchestra only a little more than a week ago. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was less impassioned than that of Mr. Stokowski, but was a clear and dignified conception. It was performed with great attention to beauty of tone and without dynamic extremes. His tempos were moderate throughout and the whole work was played without exaggeration either of time or tone.

The same characteristics were noticeable in the prelude to "Parsifal," which followed the symphony. This, however, in spite of its almost religious quality, is more impassioned music than the symphony and perhaps a little greater graduation of pianissimo and fortissimo would have added to the reading.

The sudden illness of Emilio de Gogorza, who was to have been the soloist, necessitated the substitution of Leo Ornstein in the MacDowell Concerto in D minor No. 2 at the last moment. Mr. Ornstein played the same concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season but his performance last evening was about the best he has yet given in Philadelphia. He played the beautiful work with great sympathy and excellent tone quality. The accompaniment of the orchestra, however, might have been better. Mr. Ornstein's tone, while fine in quality, is not large, and it would have added to the effectiveness of the performance had only a part of the strings of the orchestra been used instead of the full body. There were many places where the soloist could be heard with difficulty, and Mr. Monteux did not always keep exact pace with the piano. The program ended with the "Mephisto Waltz" of Liszt.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 192[0]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT PLEASES

Ornstein Delights in Unexpected Appearance; De Gogorza Ill

A last minute change in program brought Leo Ornstein as soloist of the Boston orchestra's concert last evening at the academy in place of Emilio de Gogorza, who had been suddenly taken ill. Ornstein played MacDowell's second piano concerto in D minor and the program gained considerably in balance and beauty thereby.

This particular number deserves to be heard oftener. It has not been heard here since the late Teresa Carreno's last appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra at least five years ago. In melody, poetry and fine spirit certainly it is excelled by but few modern works of its kind. And it is a most grateful work for both orchestra and soloist.

Mr. Ornstein's not overly mighty gifts showed to excellent advantage and his efforts won him the warmest applause of the evening. However the orchestra's work in this number surpassed in feeling and artistry the soloist's performance.

In each successive concert of this orchestra there have been revealed new sides of Conductor Monteux's thoroly cosmopolitan gifts. The Beethovan "Pastoral" symphony opened the program and was given a reading marked by lusty exuberance and freedom from all taint of salon subleties; in contrast to most interpretations, the thunderstorm become really exciting. In the second movement, programed as the "scene by the brook" these players achieved some lovely pianissimos.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was the first Wagnerian number to appear in this series of concerts. It was played in an intense mood of spiritual ecstasy. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" closed the program. It has been many seasons since Philadelphia concertgoers have heard this prescient music, and it was a memorably thrilling performance.

The work of the Boston Orchestra has not yet regained its old standard of flawless performance, but in thrilling effects it is rapidly striding back to the position it once held.

From E JAN 6 - 1920
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of Season, With Ornstein as Piano Soloist

THE usual large audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season, in the Academy of Music last evening, when, owing to the illness of Emilio de Gogorza, who was unable to appear, Leo Ornstein, pianist, was substituted for the celebrated baritone, as soloist.

The feature of the orchestra's program, however, was Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which symbolizes in four parts the great master's communing with nature. The scene at the brookside was beautifully interpreted by the visiting musicians, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, and the thunder storm and tempest were given a most vivid presentation, full of tonal beauty.

Mr. Ornstein played MacDowell's Concerto in D. minor and his excellent performance won him half a dozen calls from an enthusiastic audience.

Other features of the program were the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," which was rendered with true Wagnerian understanding and made a great impression, and Liszt's music for the second episode from Lenau's "Faust"—the dances in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz)—which concluded a fine program.

began an extensive campaign to rai[se]

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH ORNSTEIN

LEDGER 1/6/20

It was a concert of uneven merit that the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered to a large and cordial patronage in the Academy last evening. It began with Beethoven's Sixth Symphony. Comparisons in music are odious—musicians are artists, not rivals—but coming only nine days after the Philadelphia Orchestra played the work, one cannot help finding and saying that our own great organization played it better, with more of the happy spontaneity and the flavor of pastoral innocence that the author took directly from his communion with Nature and all outdoors.

The first movement did not flow with the limpid and liquid placidity that our instruments conveyed to the ear. To say it was rough would be to overshoot the mark, as it is so easy to do when saying anything at all about music. But the golden glory of the tone of the violins of the Boston Symphony seems to have been interned, or banished somewhere, with whatever mischievous or malevolent influences produced it. One must give the devil his due.

Redeeming features of the reading of the symphony were the distinguished work of the oboe and flute (Longy is a superman with the oboe, and the flute was so warm and sweet that one remembered how Mole long ago used to play it), and the eager, suave and gentlemanly conducting of Pierre Monteux, whose reconstructive problem, involving the revival of a tradition, is so difficult that it should win—as indeed it does—the general sympathy.

Leo Ornstein played the MacDowell D minor piano concerto (the second by the composer). Like the concert at large, the performance was uneven.

AIM AT PAR BONDS

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
JAN 4 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Emilio de Gorgorza will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis" will reveal to advantage his dramatic, and Massenet's love song from the "King of Lahore," his lyric powers. Pierre Monteux will also revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5; Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the third of its Washington series of concerts Tuesday afternoon at the National.

ess EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.
DEC 2[8]

Gogorza Boston Orchestra.

Emilio de Gogorza will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert this season at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 6. He will sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5 and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's mephisto waltz, one of two episodes from Lenau's "Faust," will complete the program.

om HERALD
ddress Washington, D. C.
ate DEC 28 1919

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 6, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5; Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

HERALD
ess Washington, D. C.
DEC 31 19[19]

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Paris, April 4, 1875, and studied at the Conservatoire of that city, winning, in 1891, the first prize for violin. His musical activities have been constant and varied, both at home and abroad.

He was a member of the orchestra of the Opera-Comique and helped to found the Societe de Musique Moderne, and figured prominently in the concerts of the Societe Nationale and the Societe de Musique Francaise. In 1911 he was made director of the Russian ballet, in which capacity he came to America in 1916. In the summer of 1917 he became director of the Civic Orchestra of New York and later was appointed French director for the Metropolitan.

From JAN 3 1920
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to play for the third time this season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, with Emilio Gogorza, baritone, as the assisting soloist. The program, conducted by Pierre Monteux, will include Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the "Pastoral," the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." Mr. de Gogorza is to sing an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the Love Song from Massenet's "The King of Lahore."

From E DEC 27
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. He will sing Gluck's aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" will be the orchestra numbers.

RECORD
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
DEC 28 1919

—The fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, is one of the most admired baritones of our concert stage, may be in part attributed to his Spanish aristocratic descent. His American birth and affiliations bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity must surely lie in the richness and lustre of his voice. He will sing on this occasion the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the rest, Pierre Monteux will provide music of the highest beauty n Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature in the well-known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm. Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" waltz, wherein, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abandon, are on the program.

* * *

From Public Ledger
Philadelphia, P
DEC 28 1919

Emilio de Gogorza, soloist for the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5, is of Spanish aristocratic descent, though of American birth and affiliations. He will sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the rest, Pierre Monteux will provide music of the highest beauty in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which b[illegible] the spirit of nature in the well-known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm; also Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" waltz, wherein, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abandon.

Press, DEC 28
Philadelphia, Pa.

The fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the season's third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 5th, is the most admired baritone of our concert stage, may be n part attributed to his Spanish aristocratic descent, which lends a peculiar charm to his interpretations, and in part to his American birth and affiliations which bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity must surely lie in the exampled richness and lustre of his voice. He will sing on this occasion the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

For the rest, Pierre Monteau will provide music of the highest beauty in Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature in the well known episodes of the brook, the birds, the peasant gathering, followed by the storm; also Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's so-called "Mephisto" Waltz, where, according to Lenau's "Faust," the Devil fiddles in a village tavern and excites Faust and his partner to passionate abando

JAN 4 1920
rom North American
Philadelphia, Pa

Emilio de Gogorza, barytone soloist, at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, will sing Gluck's dramatic aria "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song, from the "King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6 will also be heard at this concert, under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest, the program includes the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From JAN 3 1920
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music, Monday evening, Emilio de Gogorza will be heard in Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The orchestral part of the program will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

Florence Easton, of the Metropolitan Op

From JAN 4 - 1920
Press,
Philadelphia, Pa.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of the times, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening, Gluck's dramatic aria "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's Love Song from "The King of Lahore."

Beethoven's immortal "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz" brilliant in scoring and thrilling in description of the Tavern Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 4 - 1920

De Gogorza Boston Symphony Soloist

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of the times, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, Gluck's dramatic aria "Pitiless Diana" from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony No. 6, which breathes the spirit of nature as no other music before or since, will also be heard at this concert, which will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

m RECORD
lress Philadelphia, Pa.
e JAN 4 - 1920

—Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening Gluck's dramatic aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore." Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony No. 6 will be heard at this concert, which will be under the direction of Pierre Monteux. For the rest the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and

EMILIO DE GOGORZA.

Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," brilliant in scoring and thrilling in description of the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust" will be offered.

* * *

ECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Leo Ornstein Takes Place of De Gogorza as Concert Soloist.

Once again Philadelphia was treated to a performance of Beethoven's pastoral symphonw, the Boston Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last night, having this work for the principal offering. Leaders of orchestras should have some system by which they would be enabled to keep in touch with the music given in the cities they visit. If a little judgment were exercised in this direction the repetition of symphonies by one orchestra after the other could be avoided and great variety and interest would attach to programs. Beethoven's one program work, the Pastoral Symphony, seems so weak and insipid compared to the majority of the other symphonies that it should be a warning to composers who discount inspiration and cultivate the "program" idea in music. Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, gave to the symphony all the tonal beauty and polish possible and aroused, through his skilful leadership, a great deal of enthusiasm.

Owing to the illness of Emilio De Gogorza, Leo Ornstein, pianist, stepped into the breach and made a fine impression by his playing and interpretation of the MacDowell concerto in D minor. Ornstein played under many difficulties, his piano not reaching the Academy until after 6 o'clock and having then to be tuned and warmed up. His magnificent playing, however, proved that real genius always triumphs, his performance of the MacDowell concerto being one of the big outstanding features of the musical season. The rest of the orchestral program comprised the overture to Wagner's "Parsifal" and the "Mephisto" vake from "Faust."

INQUIRER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 1920

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Concert at the Academy With L Ornstein as Soloist

The most interesting and notewort feature of the concert given by the B ton Symphony Orchestra, under the rection of Mr. Pierre Monteux, at Academy of Music last evening, was appearance in the place of Mr. Emilio Gogorza, whom sickness prevented from fulfilling his engagement, of Mr. Leo Ornstein, who played Edward MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23. As a composer in the general view Ornstein is a good deal of a joke, but there is not much room for any material differences of opinion as to his pianistic abilities, and his well-developed technique and high musical intelligence were pleasingly and impressively exhibited in a lucid, brilliant and masterly exposition of MacDowell's soulful, melodious and poetically imaginative music.

The other things on the list were the demode "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, which by one of those strange coincidences which are so frequent and so regrettable, was done by our own orchestra only ten days ago; the Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz. It were idle to pretend that the Boston Orchestra is yet all that it used to be, but in the quality of its tone, in the unanimity of its movement and in its ready responsiveness to the guidance of its director, it made a much nearer approach to its old form last night than it has done upon any recent previous occasion, and should it continue to improve as rapidly as it has been doing in smoothness and precision and mobility and refinement it may be expected before very long to regain the prestige and distinction which its unfortunate vicissitudes have naturally and unavoidably impaired. The audience in attendance was large and friendly.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN THIRD CONCERT

Leo Ornstein Soloist in the MacDowell Concerto—Pastoral Symphony Performed

THE PROGRAM

Symphony No. 6 (Pastoral).....Beethoven
Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra.....MacDowell
Leo Ornstein
Mephisto Waltz from "Faust".....Liszt

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the third concert of its Philadelphia season last evening at the Academy of Music before a large audience, and again the organization showed that under the leadership of Mr. Monteux it is rapidly taking the position among the great orchestras that its history and its personnel warrant. The orchestra last evening did the best playing that it has done here for two seasons at least, and the tone quality and the routine of playing, such as attacks, releases, et cetera, were far better than at any time since the series of events of nearly three years ago, which left the great orchestra in so perilous an artistic position.

Mr. Monteux opened his program with the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, the "Pastoral," a composition which was played by our own orchestra only a little more than a week ago. Mr. Monteux's reading of the symphony was less impassioned than that of Mr. Stokowski, but was a clear and dignified conception. It was performed with great attention to beauty of tone and without dynamic extremes. His tempos were moderate throughout and the whole work was played without exaggeration either of time or tone.

The same characteristics were noticeable in the prelude to "Parsifal," which followed the symphony. This, however, in spite of its almost religious quality, is more impassioned music than the symphony and perhaps a little greater graduation of pianissimo and fortissimo would have added to the reading.

The sudden illness of Emilio de Gogorza, who was to have been the soloist, necessitated the substitution of L. Ornstein in the MacDowell Concerto D minor No. 2 at the last moment. Mr Ornstein played the same concerto with the Philadelphia Orchestra last season but his performance last evening was about the best he has yet given in Philadelphia. He played the beautiful work with great sympathy and excellent tone quality. The accompaniment of the orchestra, however, might have been better. Mr. Ornstein's tone, while fine in quality, is not large, and it would have added to the effectiveness of the performance had only a part of the strings of the orchestra been used instead of the full body. There were many places where the soloist could be heard with difficulty, and Mr. Monteux did not always keep exact pace with the piano. The program ended with the "Mephisto Waltz" of Liszt.

From North American
Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT PLEASES

Ornstein Delights in Unexpected Appearance; De Gogorza Ill

A last minute change in program brought Leo Ornstein as soloist of the Boston orchestra's concert last evening at the academy in place of Emilio de Gogorza, who had been suddenly taken ill. Ornstein played MacDowell's second piano concerto in D minor and the program gained considerably in balance and beauty thereby.

This particular number deserves to be heard oftener. It has not been heard here since the late Teresa Carreno's last appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra at least five years ago. In melody, poetry and fine spirit certainly it is excelled by but few modern works of its kind. And it is a most grateful work for both orchestra and soloist.

Mr. Ornstein's not overly mighty gifts showed to excellent advantage and his efforts won him the warmest applause of the evening. However the orchestra's work in this number surpassed in feeling and artistry the soloist's performance.

In each successive concert of this orchestra there have been revealed new sides of Conductor Monteux's thoroly cosmopolitan gifts. The Beethovan "Pastoral" symphony opened the program and was given a reading marked by lusty exuberance and freedom from all taint of salon subleties; in contrast to most interpretations, the thunderstorm become really exciting. In the second movement, programed as the "scene by the brook" these players achieved some lovely pianissimos.

The prelude to "Parsifal" was the first Wagnerian number to appear in this series of concerts. It was played in an intense mood of spiritual ecstasy. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" closed the program. It has been many seasons since Philadelphia concertgoers have heard this prescient music, and it was a memorably thrilling performance.

The work of the Boston Orchestra has not yet regained its old standard of flawless performance, but in thrilling effects it is rapidly striding back to the position it once held.

From E JAN 6 1920
Bulletin
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of Season, With Ornstein as Piano Soloist

THE usual large audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert of the season, in the Academy of Music last evening, when, owing to the illness of Emilio de Gogorza, who was unable to appear, Leo Ornstein, pianist, was substituted for the celebrated baritone, as soloist.

The feature of the orchestra's program, however, was Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which symbolizes in four parts the great master's communing with nature. The scene at the brookside was beautifully interpreted by the visiting musicians, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, and the thunder storm and tempest were given a most vivid presentation, full of tonal beauty.

Mr. Ornstein played MacDowell's Concerto in D. minor and his excellent performance won him half a dozen calls from an enthusiastic audience.

Other features of the program were the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," which was rendered with true Wagnerian understanding and made a great impression, and Liszt's music for the second episode from Lenau's "Faust"—the dances in the village tavern (Mephisto Waltz)—which concluded a fine program.

began an extensive campaign to rai

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH ORNSTEIN

LEDGER 1/6/20

It was a concert of uneven merit that the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered to a large and cordial patronage in the Academy last evening. It began with Beethoven's Sixth Symphony. Comparisons in music are odious—musicians are artists, not rivals—but coming only nine days after the Philadelphia Orchestra played the work, one cannot help finding and saying that our own great organization played it better, with more of the happy spontaneity and the flavor of pastoral innocence that the author took directly from his communion with Nature and all outdoors.

The first movement did not flow with the limpid and liquid placidity that our instruments conveyed to the ear. To say it was rough would be to overshoot the mark, as it is so easy to do when saying anything at all about music. But the golden glory of the tone of the violins of the Boston Symphony seems to have been interned, or banished somewhere, with whatever mischievous or malevolent influences produced it. One must give the devil his due.

Redeeming features of the reading of the symphony were the distinguished work of the oboe and flute (Longy is a superman with the oboe, and the flute was so warm and sweet that one remembered how Mole long ago used to play it), and the eager, suave and gentlemanly conducting of Pierre Monteux, whose reconstructive problem, involving the revival of a tradition, is so difficult that it should win—as indeed it does—the general sympathy.

Leo Ornstein played the MacDowell D minor piano concerto (the second by the composer). Like the concert at large, the performance was uneven.

AIM AT PAR BONDS

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Emilio de Gorgorza will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon. Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis" will reveal to advantage his dramatic, and Massenet's love song from the "King of Lahore," his lyric powers. Pierre Monteux will also revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony N

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the third of its Washington series of concerts Tuesday afternoon at the National.

ess EVENING STAR
Washington, D. C.

Gogorza Boston Orchestra.

Emilio de Gogorza will be the soloist at the third Boston Symphony concert this season at the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, January 6. He will sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will revive Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5 and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's mephisto waltz, one of two episodes from Lenau's "Faust," will complete the program.

om HERALD
ddress Washington, D. C.
ate

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 6, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony N 5; Glazounoff's Symphonic Poe "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's M phisto Waltz.

HERALD
ess Washington, D. C.

PIERRE MONTEUX.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born in Paris, April 4, 1875, and studied at the Conservatoire of that city, winning, in 1891, the first prize for violin. His musical activities have been constant and varied, both at home and abroad.

He was a member of the orchestra of the Opera-Comique and helped to found the Societe de Musique Moderne, and figured prominently in the concerts of the Societe Nationale and the Societe de Musique Francaise. In 1911 he was made director of the Russian ballet, in which capacity he came to America in 1916. In the summer of 1917 he became director of the Civic Orchestra of New York and later was appointed French director for the Metropolitan.

Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 6 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BEETHOVEN'S PASTORAL

Interpreted With More Spirit and Skill Than Were Either Wagner's 'Prelude to Parsifal' or Portion of Lenau's 'Faust,' Which Completed Program.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

Why, O why, when there are so many delectable symphonies, must we sit through the Beethoven "Pastoral" twice within ten days? A week from last Saturday the Philadelphia Orchestra ambled through the five movements of Beethoven's lesser symphony, and then, to prove that "it never rains but it pours," the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it again last night. Again we ask—Why? Does Mr. Monteux want to outshine Mr. Stokowski in interpretation, or the Boston men outplay our own—then let them choose some more interesting medium for the purpose of comparison. But then again, we do not need to make comparisons between the two organizations; we grant them both their points of excellence, both orchestras occupy high places in the list of symphony organizations—perhaps they occupy the highest.

But to hark back to the subject of programs, it is probably several seasons since Philadelphia has heard a Mendelssohn symphony, many more seasons since a presentation of Sain-Saens or Berlioz best symphony, and dear knows how long since a playing of such an important work as the Liszt "Divina Comedia." In fact, I do not believe that the young musician of our city—the boy or girl still in the 'teens—has never had the opportunity of hearing the latter valuable work. The cited compositions I have thought of at random—were I to search through symphonic literature there could be named a formidable list of neglected works, things that leave an indelible impression upon the future of those who drink in their philosophy.

No one holds Beethoven in greater reverence than the writer of this comment, no one has gleaned from him more inspiration or passed happier hours with his immortal works; so should the youthful musician of today delve into the treasure field of the better piano sonatas, the violin sonatas, the string quartets, the trios, the songs and the orchestral works of the master. But for the symphonic enlightenment of this same budding musician it is possible to serve up something more potent than consecutive performances of what is probably Beethoven's dullest Symphony.

Now that we have preached our sermon, let us see what else was on the Boston Orchestra's program last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Beethoven—
Symphony in F Major, "Pastoral," Op. 68
Wagner.....Prelude to "Parsifal"
MacDowell—
Concerto in D Minor, No. 2, Op. 23
For Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Liszt—
Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust":
The Dance in the Village Tavern
(Mephisto Waltz)

The previously announced soloist, Emilio De Gogorza, was unable to appear, owing to illness, his place being taken by Leo Ornstein, pianist, who played the MacDowall Concerto in D minor for piano and Orchestra. Mr. Ornstein is fortunately discarding some of the mannerisms that detracted from his performances of a year or so ago; his ability to play the piano is sufficient to award him the palm of commendation, and it is a pleasure to notice that he is concentrating upon his phase of popular appeal.

His work in the beautiful MacDowell Concerto was indeed excellent and, while the accompaniment of Mr. Monteux's men was admirable as regards keeping with the soloist, there might have been a slight improvement if the volume of orchestral tone had been kept down somewhat. However, it was a fine performance of the premier American piano concerto.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony, the Richard Wagner "Prelude to Parsifal" and Liszt's "Memphisto Waltz," the latter intended as a musical protrayal of the Tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." The symphony was played in better fashion than either the "Parsifal" or the "Faust;" Mr. Monteux evidently had worked hard to prepare an interesting reading of the Beethoven score. The Wagner music was given a sober reading, quite impressive but slightly marred by some ragged flutes in the opening sestion. Liszt's erratic "Memphisto Waltz," with its typically effective instrumentation, brought the concert to a conclusion.

News JAN 4 1920
Baltimore, Md.

Gogorza As Soloist.

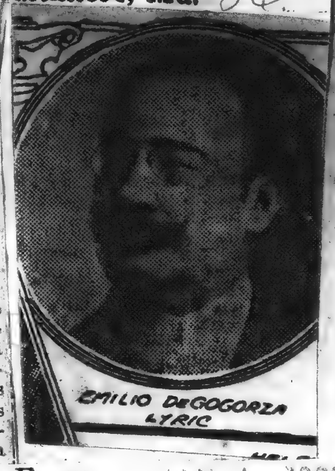
Emilio de Gogorza, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night, has frequently appeared in this city and is a prime favorite. His numbers will be arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massanet's "Roi de Lahore."

M. Monteux, the director, will give us another taste of novelty — three tastes, in fact. He is obviously very fond of selecting works that are unfamiliar, and his programs, consequently, are always unusually interesting and stimulating. This time he has chosen Chausson's B flat Symphony as the principal number, and in addition he will also present Debussy's "Jeux," which is receiving its first American performances this winter under his baton, and Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," whatever that may mean. Sounds piquant, at any rate.

Emilio De Gogorza

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish concert barytone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

om Sun altimore, Md. JAN 4 - 1920



From Sun Baltimore, Md. JAN 4 - 1920

AT THE LYRIC

WITH his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest barytones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening Gluck's dramatic "Fitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song, "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from "The King of Lahore."

For the symphony of this concert Pierre Monteux has chosen the eloquent and nobly exalted masterpiece of Ernest Chausson in B flat. Many admirers consider this work unexcelled in all French music before or since. Another notable event will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece, under the personal supervision of the composer, his interpretation should be authoritative. On that occasion Nijinsky staged the danced version of love and tennis balls in a garden. The final number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," in which the noted Volga Bargemen's song is a principal theme.

From Sun Baltimore, Md.

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Leo Ornstein.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, the assisting artist being Leon Ornstein, who replaced Emilio de Gogorza, whose appearance was prevented through illness.

Mr. Ornstein, who is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the younger piano virtuosi, played the second MacDowell concerto, the one in D minor, Op. 23. This rarely heard work is extremely interesting from certain points of view, broadly conceived and richly orchestral, a composition that is often very modern in feeling in that the piano part is so frequently merely obligato, a mere golden thread in the richly woven instrumental fabric. So while it offers the soloist fine opportunities for the display of his virtuosity, it has few deeply poetic or introspective values. It was extremely interesting to hear Mr. Ornstein last evening, and it may be said at once that his performance made a very profound impression on the big audience, for he attacked this American concerto with a fine expansive style and a rich dynamic appreciation, playing throughout the work with great brilliance, poise and intellectual appreciation. The amazingly difficult Presto he gave with remarkable suavity, coloring it with fine discretion and giving interesting accent to its many graceful phrases. Listening to this youth play with still vivid recollections of the curiously interpretative recital he gave here some seasons ago, one sensed immediately a somewhat different phase of th player's artistry, because the MacDowell concerto gave him no special opportunity for the display of his interpretative genius for individuality of reading. His performance was just a straightforward, beautiful piece of piano playing that won for him a real and hearty ovation.

It is to be noted in reviewing this concert that the concerto was the one purely "conventional" piece of music on a program which was otherwise inherently modern in feeling. The symphony was the one in B-flat major by the late Ernest Chausson, a dignified, rather sumptuous, but somewhat sombre work in the French idiom, a composition having certain spiritual, idealistic qualities that gave it extraordinary distinction, in spite of the fact that, like most modern French works, its greater glory was attained through its intricate instrumentation rather than from any particular suggestion of sustained melody. Richly endowed with colorful phrases, it was rather operatic in quality, the kind of music that might have made an exquisite background for some vivid dramatic instances.

After a fine performance of this work the orchestra played a peculiarly "difficult" bit of Debussy called "Jeux." This is music for one of Nijinski's "danced poems" and it is supposed to picture the varying moods of three young people who are looking for a tennis ball in a park at night. Strangely episodic, melodically speaking, its harmonies are as elusive as the flash

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
E DEC 29 1919

EVENING SUN, 1920 E
Baltimore, Md.

z Kreisler will be the soloist of the fo Boston Orchestra concert at the Lyon the evening of February 4. He wi so give a recital at the Lyric on M 24.

From DEC 31 1919 E
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INSURED

Board of Trustees Takes Out Policies to Value of $100,000 on Musicians.

Group insurance has been taken out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a series of concerts in Baltimore each year, according to official announcement made today.

The announcement says:

"Acting on a recent decision, the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for all the musicians to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member.

"This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which is as firm as it is of long standing."

From News Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THE third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening offered the audience, among other things, a disappointment and a surprise; the former being the absence, through illness, of Emilio de Gogorza, the well-known barytone, and the latter being the substitution of Leo Ornstein, pianist, as soloist. The change necessitated an alteration in the program, and in its revised form it consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B flat; A Danced Poem, "Jeux," by Debussy; McDowell's Concerto in D minor and the Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine" of Glazounoff.

The symphony is a beautiful example of the modern French school of composition in its highest form. Melodious to a degree, treated with all modern harmonic elaboration, gorgeously colored by means of all modern orchestral devices, replete with interesting and beautiful effects which are attained in a natural and spontaneous manner without having to resort to "freakishness," and always perfectly sane, the composer proved that he had a message of high musical import to deliver. The first movement is built upon strikingly effective melodic material most interestingly developed. The second movement is full of intense sadness, while the finale is again a triumph of melodic and harmonic beauty gloriously depicted in glowing orchestral tone coloring. And to Mr. Monteux, the conductor, belongs the credit for the splendid production. Plentifully endowed with temperament, he radiates strength and authority.

The Debussy composition was a somewhat disconcerting contrast. An aimless wandering without any definite end, disconnected passages formlessly strung together, and without any apparent melody, one was tempted to ask what it all meant. Shakespeare could have supplied the answer, "Much Ado About Nothing."

The playing of Leo Ornstein came in the nature of a distinct surprise and revelation. The only standard by which his musicianship has hitherto been gauged is by his noisy, tuneless effusions which he has called compositions. He has, however, taken a more real and serious

His work was forceful where strength was needed and delicate and graceful when such were necessary. His gradation of dynamic effects was the work of an accomplished artist. And the concerto was so beautiful that one wonders why MacDowell, the king of American composers, is not more often represented on modern programs.

W. G. O.

From News Baltimore, Md. DEC 28 1919 E

Melodies From Music's Spi

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

One piece of good news "broke" recently, circumstances concerning which Musical America (N. Y.) outlined editorially as follows:

"The consummation for which the ages have been waiting has come at last—or, to speak by the card, has begun to come. Having obtained an initial momentum it will undoubtedly sweep on and its benefits presently extend themselves in all directions. Not to reach Hecuba by a circuitous route it is thus: Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has begun an interchange of programs with Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whereof the round, unvarnished meaning is that if Mr. Damrosch plans to give a certain symphony or suite or overture, or tone poem or whatever it may be Mr. Monteux will studiously refrain from giving the same thing if his New York excursion from Huntington avenue treads close upon the heels of one of the Damrosch functions. Thereby the security of certain feelings will remain unruffled and the critics will not fall into a distemper and abuse the second man who played the particular symphony, or overture, or tone poem.

"It is a good precedent that these two conductors propose to initiate. One does not entertain any question that its influential vibrations will be felt in other orchestra circles. The uniformity of mental processes to which symphony conductors, along with pianists, are subject is a phenomenon confirmed by years of tiresome demonstration. Every concert-giver knows how certain compositions become epidemic in certain seasons. We have recently had a plague of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Damrosch men would play it, the Stransky men would play it, the Altschuler men would play it, the Muck-Rabaud-Monteux men would play it, and when one finally breathed a prayer of gratitude after hearing the "Fate" theme for apparently the last time, the Stokowski cohorts would emerge from their barrier behind the Delaware and begin it all over again. Nobody doubted that they could do it well. But everyone—or almost everyone—would have rejoiced and been exceeding glad to have had them exercise their virtues beyond compare on something else. And as it has been with Tschaikowsky, so has it been at one time or another with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Schubert, and the gods themselves only know how many others. If now the other supermen who shake the little stick will only see fit to cooperate in the spirit exhibited by Damrosch and Monteux, we may look forward with angelic beatitude to something with a millenial savor.

"Of course, to draw upon the profound wisdom of Sir Roger de Coverly: 'Much may be said on both sides.' It is also true that every one who goes to the Boston concerts doesn't always go to the Damrosch," etc.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
E DEC 27

EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place at the Lyric on the evening of January 7, when the symphony will be the one in B flat, of Ernest Chausson. The assisting artist will be Emilio de Gogorza, barytone.

From AN 3 - 1920 E
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Famous Barytone Symphony Soloist

Emilo de Gogorza Will Si With Boston Orchestra At L ric Wednesday—Muri Silt Pianist, Coming In Recital Albaugh's Tuesday Evening Peabody Recital Friday.

s soloist at the Boston Symphe cert to be given at the Lyric n dnesday evening, Emilio de Gogor famous barytone, will sing ar n Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" s ssenet's "King of Lahore." Pie nteux will conduct at this conc usson's powerful and eloquent sy ny in B flat, considered one of st achievements of the French sch usic. Notable also will be Debuss eux," which Mr. Monteux is int ducing to America. Since he also c nducted the first public performance this so-called "danced poem" under personal guidance of Debussy hims an authoritative reading may be pected. There will be still further terest in the final number, Glazounc symphonic poem, "Stenka Razi which uses noted Russian folk-songs s themes.

His work was forceful where strength was needed and delicate and graceful when such were necessary. His gradation of dynamic effects was the work of an accomplished artist. And the concerto was so beautiful that one wonders why MacDowell, the king of American composers, is not more often represented on modern programs.

W. G. O.

From News Baltimore, Md. DEC 28 1919 E

Music

Gogorza With Boston Symphony.

Emilio de Gogorza will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on January 7. He is of the Spanish aristocracy and for a number of years he has been conspicuous on the concert stage, his interpretations of songs by his countrymen having in particular become noted. His numbers here will be an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the love song from Massanet's "King of Lahore."

Pierre Monteux will continue the policy of introducing novelties that has made the Boston Symphony concerts here this winter events of quite uncommon niterest.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night.

Mr. DeGogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D Minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Debussey's A Dance Poem "Jeux," MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, the most admired baritone of the concert stage. His Spanish aristocratic descent colors his interpretations of songs with an individual charm, and his American birth and affiliations make him a favorite with his audiences. However, his splendid voice is his fortune. He will sing Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore

Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BEETHOVEN'S PASTORAL

Interpreted With More Spirit and Skill Than Were Either Wagner's 'Prelude to Parsifal' or Portion of Lenau's 'Faust,' Which Completed Program.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

Why, O why, when there are so many delectable symphonies, must we sit through the Beethoven "Pastoral" twice within ten days? A week from last Saturday the Philadelphia Orchestra ambled through the five movements of Beethoven's lesser symphony, and then, to prove that "it never rains but it pours," the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it again last night. Again we ask—Why? Does Mr. Monteux want to outshine Mr. Stokowski in interpretation, or the Boston men outplay our own—then let them choose some more interesting medium for the purpose of comparison. But then again, we do not need to make comparisons between the two organizations; we grant them both their points of excellence, both orchestras occupy high places in the list of symphony organizations—perhaps they occupy the highest.

But to hark back to the subject of programs, it is probably several seasons since Philadelphia has heard a Mendelssohn symphony, many more seasons since a presentation of Sain-Saens or Berlioz best symphony, and dear knows how long since a playing of such an important work as the Liszt "Divina Comedia." In fact, I do not believe that the young musician of our city—the boy or girl still in the 'teens—has never had the opportunity of hearing the latter valuable work. The cited compositions I have thought of at random—were I to search through symphonic literature there could be named a formidable list of neglected works, things that leave an indelible impression upon the future of those who drink in their philosophy.

No one holds Beethoven in greater reverence than the writer of this comment, no one has gleaned from him more inspiration or passed happier hours with his immortal works; so should the youthful musician of today delve into the treasure field of the better piano sonatas, the violin sonatas, the string quartets, the trios, the songs and the orchestral works of the master. But for the symphonic enlightenment of this same budding musician it is possible to serve up something more potent than consecutive performances of what is probably Beethoven's dullest Symphony.

Now that we have preached our sermon, let us see what else was on the Boston Orchestra's program last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Beethoven—
Symphony in F Major, "Pastoral," Op. 68

Wagner.....Prelude to "Parsifal"

MacDowell—
Concerto in D Minor, No. 2, Op. 23
For Pianoforte and Orchestra.

Liszt—
Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust":
The Dance in the Village Tavern
(Mephisto Waltz)

The previously announced soloist, Emilio De Gogorza, was unable to appear, owing to illness, his place being taken by Leo Ornstein, pianist, who played the MacDowall Concerto in D minor for piano and Orchestra. Mr. Ornstein is fortunately discarding some of the mannerisms that detracted from his performances of a year or so ago; his ability to play the piano is sufficient to award him the palm of commendation, and it is a pleasure to notice that he is concentrating upon his phase of popular appeal.

His work in the beautiful MacDoweil Concerto was indeed excellent and, while the accompaniment of Mr. Monteux's men was admirable as regards keeping with the soloist, there might have been a slight improvement if the volume of orchestral tone had been kept down somewhat. However, it was a fine performance of the premier American piano concerto.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony, the Richard Wagner "Prelude to Parsifal" and Liszt's "Memphisto Waltz," the latter intended as a musical protrayal of the Tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." The symphony was played in better fashion than either the "Parsifal" or the "Faust;" Mr. Monteux evidently had worked hard to prepare an interesting reading of the Beethoven score. The Wagner music was given a sober reading, quite impressive but slightly marred by some ragged flutes in the opening sestion. Liszt's erratic "Memphisto Waltz," with its typically effective instrumentation, brought the concert to a conclusion.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 28 1919

EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

tz Kreisler will be the soloist of the fo Boston Orchestra concert at the Lyon the evening of February 4. He wilso give a recital at the Lyric on M 24.

Melodies From Music's Spi...

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

One piece of good news "broke" recently, circumstances concerning which Musical America (N. Y.) outlined editorially as follows:

"The consummation for which the ages have been waiting has come at last—or, to speak by the card, has begun to come. Having obtained an initial momentum it will undoubtedly sweep on and its benefits presently extend themselves in all directions. Not to reach Hecuba by a circuitous route it is thus: Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has begun an interchange of programs with Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whereof the round, unvarnished meaning is that if Mr. Damrosch plans to give a certain symphony or suite or overture, or tone poem or whatever it may be Mr. Monteux will studiously refrain from giving the same thing if his New York excursion from Huntington avenue treads close upon the heels of one of the Damrosch functions. Thereby the security of certain feelings will remain unruffled and the critics will not fall into a distemper and abuse the second man who played the particular symphony, or overture, or tone poem.

"It is a good precedent that these two conductors propose to initiate. One does not entertain any question that its influential vibrations will be felt in other orchestra circles. The uniformity of mental processes to which symphony conductors, along with pianists, are subject is a phenomenon confirmed by years of tiresome demonstration. Every concert-giver knows how certain compositions become epidemic in certain seasons. We have recently had a plague of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Damrosch men would play it, the Stransky men would play it, the Altschuler men would play it, the Muck-Rabaud-Monteux men would play it, and when one finally breathed a prayer of gratitude after hearing the "Fate" theme for apparently the last time, the Stokowski cohorts would emerge from their barrier behind the Delaware and begin it all over again. Nobody doubted that they could do it well. But everyone—or almost everyone—would have rejoiced and been exceeding glad to have had them exercise their virtues beyond compare on something else. And as it has been with Tschaikowsky, so has it been at one time or another with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Schubert, and the gods themselves only know how many others. If now the other supermen who shake the little stick will only see fit to cooperate in the spirit exhibited by Damrosch and Monteux, we may look forward with angelic beatitude to something with a millenial savor.

"Of course, to draw upon the profound wisdom of Sir Roger de Coverly: 'Much may be said on both sides.' It is also true that every one who goes to the Boston concerts doesn't always go to the Da... rosch," etc.

P. M., and on December ... both in Western High School

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, the most admired baritone of the concert stage. His Spanish aristocratic descent colors his interpretations of songs with an individual charm, and his American birth and affiliations make him a favorite with his audiences. However, his superb voice is his fortune. He will sing Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore."

News
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 1920

Gogorza As Soloist.

Emilio de Gogorza, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night, has frequently appeared in this city and is a prime favorite. His numbers will be arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massanet's "Roi de Lahore."

M. Monteux, the director, will give us another taste of novelty — three tastes, in fact. He is obviously very fond of selecting works that are unfamiliar, and his programs, consequently, are always unusually interesting and stimulating. This time he has chosen Chausson's B flat Symphony as the principal number, and in addition he will also present Debussy's "Jeux," which is receiving its first American performances this winter under his baton, and Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," whatever that may mean. Sounds piquant, at any rate.

Emilio De Gogorza

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish concert barytone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 31 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INSURED

Board of Trustees Takes Out Policies to Value of $100,000 on Musicians.

Group insurance has been taken out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a series of concerts in Baltimore each year, according to official announcement made today.

The announcement says:

"Acting on a recent decision, the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for all the musicians to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member.

"This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which is as firm as it is of long standing."

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 3 - 1920

Famous Barytone Symphony Solois...

Emilo de Gogorza Will Si... With Boston Orchestra At L... ric Wednesday—Muri Silb... Pianist, Coming In Recital ... Albaugh's Tuesday Evening ... Peabody Recital Friday.

...s soloist at the Boston Symph... cert to be given at the Lyric n... dnesday evening, Emilio de Gogor... famous barytone, will sing ar... n Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" ... ssenet's "King of Lahore." Pie... nteux will conduct at this conc... usson's powerful and eloquent sy... ny in B flat, considered one of ... st achievements of the French sch... usic. Notable also will be Debuss... Jeux," which Mr. Monteux is int... ducing to America. Since he also c... ducted the first public performance ... this so-called "danced poem" under ... personal guidance of Debussy hims... an authoritative reading may be ... pected. There will be still further ... terest in the final number, Glazounc... symphonic poem, "Stenka Razi... which uses noted Russian folk-songs ... its themes.

om
Sun
altimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 1920
84

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 1920

AT THE LYRIC

WITH his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest barytones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening Gluck's dramatic "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song, "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from "The King of Lahore."

For the symphony of this concert Pierre Monteux has chosen the eloquent and nobly exalted masterpiece of Ernest Chausson in B flat. Many admirers consider this work unexcelled in all French music before or since. Another notable event will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece, under the personal supervision of the composer, his interpretation should be authoritative. On that occasion Nijinsky staged the danced version of love and tennis balls in a garden. The final number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," in which the noted Volga Bargemen's song is a principal theme.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place on the evening of January 7 at the Lyric, when the symphony will be the one in B flat, of Ernest Chausson. The assisting artist will be Emilio de Gogorza, barytone.

From
News
Baltimore, Md.

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Leo Ornstein.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, the assisting artist being Leon Ornstein, who replaced Emilio de Gogorza, whose appearance was prevented through illness.

Mr. Ornstein, who is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the younger piano virtuosi, played the second MacDowell concerto, the one in D minor, Op. 23. This rarely heard work is extremely interesting from certain points of view, broadly conceived and richly orchestral, a composition that is often very modern in feeling in that the piano part is so frequently merely obligato, a mere golden thread in the richly woven instrumental fabric. So while it offers the soloist fine opportunities for the display of his virtuosity, it has few deeply poetic or introspective values. It was extremely interesting to hear Mr. Ornstein last evening, and it may be said at once that his performance made a very profound impression on the big audience, for he attacked this American concerto with a fine expansive style and a rich dynamic appreciation, playing throughout the work with great brilliance, poise and intellectual appreciation. The amazingly difficult Presto he gave with remarkable suavity, coloring it with fine discretion and giving interesting accent to its many graceful phrases. Listening to this youth play with still vivid recollections of the curiously interpretative recital he gave here some seasons ago, one sensed immediately a somewhat different phase of th player's artistry, because the MacDowell concerto gave him no special opportunity for the display of his interpretative genius for individuality of reading. His performance was just a straightforward, beautiful piece of piano playing that won for him a real and hearty ovation.

It is to be noted in reviewing this concert that the concerto was the one purely "conventional" piece of music on a program which was otherwise inherently modern in feeling. The symphony was the one in B-flat major by the late Ernest Chausson, a dignified, rather sumptuous, but somewhat sombre work in the French idiom, a composition having certain spiritual, idealistic qualities that gave it extraordinary distinction, in spite of the fact that, like most modern French works, its greater glory was attained through its intricate instrumentation rather than from any particular suggestion of sustained melody. Richly endowed with colorful phrases, it was rather operatic in quality, the kind of music that might have made an exquisite background for some vivid dramatic instances.

After a fine performance of this work the orchestra played a peculiarly "difficult" bit of Debussy called "Jeux." This is music for one of Nijinski's "danced poems" and it is supposed to picture the varying moods of three young people who are looking for a tennis ball in a park at night. Strangely episodic, melodically speaking, its harmonies are as elusive as the flash

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THE third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening offered the audience, among other things, a disappointment and a surprise: the former being the absence, through illness, of Emilio de Gogorza, the well-known barytone, and the latter being the substitution of Leo Ornstein, pianist, as soloist. The change necessitated an alteration in the program, and in its revised form it consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B flat; A Danced Poem, "Jeux," by Debussy; McDowell's Concerto in D minor and the Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine" of Glazounoff.

The symphony is a beautiful example of the modern French school of composition in its highest form. Melodious to a degree, treated with all modern harmonic elaboration, gorgeously colored by means of all modern orchestral devices, replete with interesting and beautiful effects which are attained in a natural and spontaneous manner without having to resort to "freakishness," and always perfectly sane, the composer proved that he had a message of high musical import to deliver. The first movement is built upon strikingly effective melodic material most interestingly developed. The second movement is full of intense sadness, while the finale is again a triumph of melodic and harmonic beauty gloriously depicted in glowing orchestral tone coloring. And to Mr. Monteux, the conductor, belongs the credit for the splendid production. Plentifully endowed with temperament, he radiates strength and authority.

The Debussy composition was a somewhat disconcerting contrast. An aimless wandering without any definite end, disconnected passages formlessly strung together, and without any apparent melody, one was tempted to ask what it all meant. Shakespeare could have supplied the answer, "Much Ado About Nothing."

The playing of Leo Ornstein came in the nature of a distinct surprise and revelation. The only standard by which his musicianship has hitherto been gauged is by his noisy, tuneless effusions which he has called compositions. He has, however, taken a more real and serious

His work was forceful where strength was needed and delicate and graceful when such were necessary. His gradation of dynamic effects was the work of an accomplished artist. And the concerto was so beautiful that one wonders why MacDowell, the king of American composers, is not more often represented on modern programs.

W. G. O.

...as for its basic theme the famous song of the Volga boatmen, a rather splendid, barbaric work depicting with rich tonal device certain emotional incidents in the life of one of Russia's national heroes.

J. O. L.

From
News
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 28 1919

Music

Gogorza With Boston Symphony.

Emilio de Gogorza will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on January 7. He is of the Spanish aristocracy and for a number of years he has been conspicuous on the concert stage, his interpretations of songs by his countrymen having in particular become noted. His numbers here will be an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the love song from Massanet's "King of Lahore."

Pierre Monteux will continue the policy of introducing novelties that has made the Boston Symphony concerts here this winter events of quite uncommon niterest.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night.

Mr. DeGogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D Minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Debussey's A Dance Poem "Jeux," MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Philadelphia, Pa. JAN 6 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BEETHOVEN'S PASTORAL

Interpreted With More Spirit and Skill Than Were Either Wagner's 'Prelude to Parsifal' or Portion of Lenau's 'Faust,' Which Completed Program.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

Why, O why, when there are so many delectable symphonies, must we sit through the Beethoven "Pastoral" twice within ten days? A week from last Saturday the Philadelphia Orchestra ambled through the five movements of Beethoven's lesser symphony, and then, to prove that "it never rains but it pours," the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it again last night. Again we ask—Why? Does Mr. Monteux want to outshine Mr. Stokowski in interpretation, or the Boston men outplay our own—then let them choose some more interesting medium for the purpose of comparison. But then again, we do not need to make comparisons between the two organizations; we grant them both their points of excellence, both orchestras occupy high places in the list of symphony organizations—perhaps they occupy the highest.

But to hark back to the subject of programs, it is probably several seasons since Philadelphia has heard a Mendelssohn symphony, many more seasons since a presentation of Sain-Saens or Berlioz best symphony, and dear knows how long since a playing of such an important work as the Liszt "Divina Comedia." In fact, I do not believe that the young musician of our city—the boy or girl still in the 'teens—has never had the opportunity of hearing the latter valuable work. The cited compositions I have thought of at random—were I to search through symphonic literature there could be named a formidable list of neglected works, things that leave an indelible impression upon the future of those who drink in their philosophy.

No one holds Beethoven in greater reverence than the writer of this comment, no one has gleaned from him more inspiration or passed happier hours with his immortal works; so should the youthful musician of today delve into the treasure field of the better piano sonatas, the violin sonatas, the string quartets, the trios, the songs and the orchestral works of the master. But for the symphonic enlightenment of this same budding musician it is possible to serve up something more potent than consecutive performances of what is probably Beethoven's dullest Symphony.

Now that we have preached our sermon, let us see what else was on the Boston Orchestra's program last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Beethoven—
Symphony in F Major, "Pastoral," Op. 68
Wagner.....Prelude to "Parsifal"
MacDowell—
Concerto in D Minor, No. 2, Op. 23
For Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Liszt—
Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust":
The Dance in the Village Tavern
(Mephisto Waltz)

The previously announced soloist, Emilio De Gogorza, was unable to appear, owing to illness, his place being taken by Leo Ornstein, pianist, who played the MacDowall Concerto in D minor for piano and Orchestra. Mr. Ornstein is fortunately discarding some of the mannerisms that detracted from his performances of a year or so ago; his ability to play the piano is sufficient to award him the palm of commendation, and it is a pleasure to notice that he is concentrating upon his phase of popular appeal.

His work in the beautiful MacDowell Concerto was indeed excellent and, while the accompaniment of Mr. Monteux's men was admirable as regards keeping with the soloist, there might have been a slight improvement if the volume of orchestral tone had been kept down somewhat. However, it was a fine performance of the premier American piano concerto.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony, the Richard Wagner "Prelude to Parsifal" and Liszt's "Memphisto Waltz," the latter intended as a musical protrayal of the Tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." The symphony was played in better fashion than either the "Parsifal" or the "Faust;" Mr. Monteux evidently had worked hard to prepare an interesting reading of the Beethoven score. The Wagner music was given a sober reading, quite impressive but slightly marred by some ragged flutes in the opening sestion. Liszt's erratic "Memphisto Waltz," with its typically effective instrumentation, brought the concert to a conclusion.

News JAN 4 1920
Baltimore, Md.

Gogorza As Soloist.

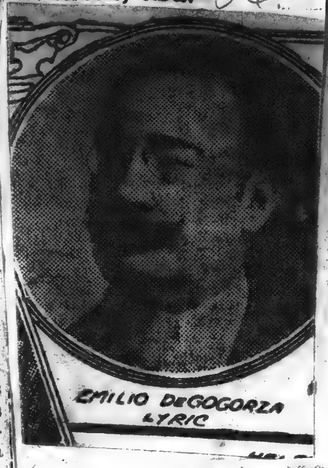
Emilio de Gogorza, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night, has frequently appeared in this city and is a prime favorite. His numbers will be arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massanet's "Roi de Lahore."

M. Monteux, the director, will give us another taste of novelty — three tastes, in fact. He is obviously very fond of selecting works that are unfamiliar, and his programs, consequently, are always unusually interesting and stimulating. This time he has chosen Chausson's B flat Symphony as the principal number, and in addition he will also present Debussy's "Jeux," which is receiving its first American performances this winter under his baton, and Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," whatever that may mean. Sounds piquant, at any rate.

Emilio De Gogorza

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish concert barytone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

pm JAN 4 - 1920
Sun
Baltimore, Md. 86



pm JAN 4 - 1920
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

AT THE LYRIC

WITH his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest barytones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening Gluck's dramatic "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song, "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from "The King of Lahore."

For the symphony of this concert Pierre Monteux has chosen the eloquent and nobly exalted masterpiece of Ernest Chausson in B flat. Many admirers consider this work unexcelled in all French music before or since. Another notable event will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece, under the personal supervision of the composer, his interpretation should be authoritative. On that occasion Nijinsky staged the danced version of love and tennis balls in a garden. The final number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," in which the noted Volga Bargemen's song is a principal theme.

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Leo Ornstein.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, the assisting artist being Leon Ornstein, who replaced Emilio de Gogorza, whose appearance was prevented through illness.

Mr. Ornstein, who is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the younger piano virtuosi, played the second MacDowell concerto, the one in D minor, Op. 23. This rarely heard work is extremely interesting from certain points of view, broadly conceived and richly orchestral, a composition that is often very modern in feeling in that the piano part is so frequently merely obligato, a mere golden thread in the richly woven instrumental fabric. So while it offers the soloist fine opportunities for the display of his virtuosity, it has few deeply poetic or introspective values. It was extremely interesting to hear Mr. Ornstein last evening, and it may be said at once that his performance made a very profound impression on the big audience, for he attacked this American concerto with a fine expansive style and a rich dynamic appreciation, playing throughout the work with great brilliance, poise and intellectual appreciation. The amazingly difficult Presto he gave with remarkable suavity, coloring it with fine discretion and giving interesting accent to its many graceful phrases. Listening to this youth play with still vivid recollections of the curiously interpretative recital he gave here some seasons ago, one sensed immediately a somewhat different phase of th player's artistry, because the MacDowell concerto gave him no special opportunity for the display of his interpretative genius for individuality of reading. His performance was just a straightforward, beautiful piece of piano playing that won for him a real and hearty ovation.

It is to be noted in reviewing this concert that the concerto was the one purely "conventional" piece of music on a program which was otherwise inherently modern in feeling. The symphony was the one in B-flat major by the late Ernest Chausson, a dignified, rather sumptuous, but somewhat sombre work in the French idiom, a composition having certain spiritual, idealistic qualities that gave it extraordinary distinction, in spite of the fact that, like most modern French works, its greater glory was attained through its intricate instrumentation rather than from any particular suggestion of sustained melody. Richly endowed with colorful phrases, it was rather operatic in quality, the kind of music that might have made an exquisite background for some vivid dramatic instances.

After a fine performance of this work the orchestra played a peculiarly "difficult" bit of Debussy called "Jeux." This is music for one of Nijinski's "danced poems" and it is supposed to picture the varying moods of three young people who are looking for a tennis ball in a park at night. Strangely episodic, melodically speaking, its harmonies are as elusive as the dash

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
E DEC 29 1919

EVENING SUN, JAN 5 1920 E
Baltimore, Md.

From DEC 31 1919 E
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INSURED

Board of Trustees Takes Out Policies to Value of $100,000 on Musicians.

Group insurance has been taken out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a series of concerts in Baltimore each year, according to official announcement made today.

The announcement says:

"Acting on a recent decision, the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for all the musicians to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member.

"This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which is as firm as it is of long standing."

From JAN 3 - 1920 E
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

Famous Barytone Symphony Solois

Emilo de Gogorza Will Si With Boston Orchestra At L ric Wednesday—Muri Sill Pianist, Coming In Recital Albaugh's Tuesday Evening Peabody Recital Friday.

As soloist at the Boston Symphe concert to be given at the Lyric n Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gogor the famous barytone, will sing ar from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" s Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pie Monteux will conduct at this conc Chausson's powerful and eloquent sy phony in B flat, considered one of finest achievements of the French sch of music. Notable also will be Debuss "Jeux," which Mr. Monteux is in ducing to America. Since he also c ducted the first public performance this so-called "danced poem" under personal guidance of Debussy hims an authoritative reading may be pected. There will be still further terest in the final number, Glazounc symphonic poem, "Stenka Razi which uses noted Russian folk-songs its themes.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

The next Boston Symp will take place at the Ly ning of January 7, when will be the one in B fl Chausson. The assisting Emilio de Gogorza, baryto

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

From AT THE LYRIC

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place on the evening of January 7 at the Lyric, when the soloist

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THE third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening offered the audience, among other things, a disappointment and a surprise; the former being the absence, through illness, of Emilio de Gogorza, the well-known barytone, and the latter being the substitution of Leo Ornstein, pianist, as soloist. The change necessitated an alteration in the program, and in its revised form it consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B flat; A Danced Poem, "Jeux," by Debussy; McDowell's Concerto in D minor and the Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine" of Glazounoff.

The symphony is a beautiful example of the modern French school of composition in its highest form. Melodious to a degree, treated with all modern harmonic elaborations, gorgeously colored by means of all modern orchestral devices, replete with interesting and beautiful effects which are attained in a natural and spontaneous manner without having to resort to "freakishness," and always perfectly sane, the composer proved that he had a message of high musical import to deliver. The first movement is built upon strikingly effective melodic material most interestingly developed. The second movement is full of intense sadness, while the finale is again a triumph of melodic and harmonic beauty gloriously depicted in glowing orchestral tone coloring. And to Mr. Monteux, the conductor, belongs the credit for the splendid production. Plentifully endowed with temperament, he radiates strength and authority.

The Debussy composition was a somewhat disconcerting contrast. An aimless wandering without any definite end, disconnected passages formlessly strung together, and without any apparent melody, one was tempted to ask what it all meant. Shakespeare could have supplied the answer, "Much Ado About Nothing."

The playing of Leo Ornstein came in the nature of a distinct surprise and revelation. The only standard by which his musicianship has hitherto been gauged is by his noisy, tuneless effusions which he has called compositions. He has, however, taken a more real and serious

His work was forceful where strength was needed and delicate and graceful when such were necessary. His gradation of dynamic effects was the work of an accomplished artist. And the concerto was so beautiful that one wonders why MacDowell, the king of American composers, is not more often represented on modern programs.

W. G. O.

has for its basic theme the famous song of the Volga boatmen, a rather splendid, barbaric work depicting with rich tonal device certain emotional incidents in the life of one of Russia's national heroes.

J. O. L.

From DEC 28 1919 E
News
Baltimore, Md.

Music

...orza With Boston Symphony.

...de Gogorza will be the ...t the Boston Symphony Or...ra's concert on January 7. He ...of the Spanish aristocracy and for ...a number of years he has been conspicuous on the concert stage, his interpretations of songs by his countrymen having in particular become noted. His numbers here will be an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the love song from Massanet's "King of Lahore."

Pierre Monteux will continue the policy of introducing novelties that has made the Boston Symphony concerts here this winter events of quite uncommon niterest.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night.

Mr. DeGogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D Minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Debussey's A Dance Poem "Jeux," MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
E DEC 27

...P. M., and on December ... both in Western High School

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, the most admired baritone ... the concert stage. His Spanish aristocratic descent colors his interpretations of songs with an individual charm, and his American birth and affiliations make him a favorite with his audiences. However, his splendid voice is his fortune. He will sing Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore."

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

One piece of good news "broke" recently, circumstances concerning which Musical America (N. Y.) outlined editorially as follows:

"The consummation for which the ages have been waiting has come at last—or, to speak by the card, has begun to come. Having obtained an initial momentum it will undoubtedly sweep on and its benefits presently extend themselves in all directions. Not to reach Hecuba by a circuitous route it is thus: Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has begun an interchange of programs with Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whereof the round, unvarnished meaning is that if Mr. Damrosch plans to give a certain symphony or suite or overture, or tone poem or whatever it may be Mr. Monteux will studiously refrain from giving the same thing if his New York excursion from Huntington avenue treads close upon the heels of one of the Damrosch functions. Thereby the security of certain feelings will remain unruffled and the critics will not fall into a distemper and abuse the second man who played the particular symphony, or overture, or tone poem.

"It is a good precedent that these two conductors propose to initiate. One does not entertain any question that its influential vibrations will be felt in other orchestra circles. The uniformity of mental processes to which symphony conductors, along with pianists, are subject is a phenomenon confirmed by years of tiresome demonstration. Every concert-giver knows how certain compositions become epidemic in certain seasons. We have recently had a plague of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Damrosch men would play it, the Stransky men would play it, the Altschuler men would play it, the Muck-Rabaud-Monteux men would play it, and when one finally breathed a prayer of gratitude after hearing the "Fate" theme for apparently the last time, the Stokowski cohorts would emerge from their barrier behind the Delaware and begin it all over again. Nobody doubted that they could do it well. But everyone—or almost everyone—would have rejoiced and been exceeding glad to have had them exercise their virtues beyond compare on something else. And as it has been with Tschaikowsky, so has it been at one time or another with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Schubert, and the gods themselves only know how many others. If now the other supermen who shake the little stick will only see fit to cooperate in the spirit exhibited by Damrosch and Monteux, we may look forward with angelic beatitude to something with a millenial savor.

"Of course, to draw upon the profound wisdom of Sir Roger de Coverly: 'Much may be said on both sides.' It is also true that every one who goes to the Boston concerts doesn't always go to the Dr... resh," etc.

Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BEETHOVEN'S PASTORAL

Interpreted With More Spirit and Skill Than Were Either Wagner's 'Prelude to Parsifal' or Portion of Lenau's 'Faust,' Which Completed Program.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

Why, O why, when there are so many delectable symphonies, must we sit through the Beethoven "Pastoral" twice within ten days? A week from last Saturday the Philadelphia Orchestra ambled through the five movements of Beethoven's lesser symphony, and then, to prove that "it never rains but it pours," the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it again last night. Again we ask—Why? Does Mr. Monteux want to outshine Mr. Stokowski in interpretation, or the Boston men outplay their own—then let them choose some more interesting medium for the purpose of comparison. But then again, we do not need to make comparisons between the two organizations; we grant them both their points of excellence, both orchestras occupy high places in the list of symphony organizations—perhaps they occupy the highest.

But to hark back to the subject of programs, it is probably several seasons since Philadelphia has heard a Mendelssohn symphony, many more seasons since a presentation of Sain-Saens or Berlioz best symphony, and dear knows how long since a playing of such an important work as the Liszt "Divina Comedia." In fact, I do not believe that the young musician of our city—the boy or girl still in the 'teens—has never had the opportunity of hearing the latter valuable work. The cited compositions I have thought of at random—were I to search through symphonic literature there could be named a formidable list of neglected works, things that leave an indelible impression upon the future of those who drink in their philosophy.

No one holds Beethoven in greater reverence than the writer of this comment, no one has gleaned from him more inspiration or passed happier hours with his immortal works; so should the youthful musician of today delve into the treasure field of the better piano sonatas, the violin sonatas, the string quartets, the trios, the songs and the orchestral works of the master. But for the symphonic enlightenment of this same budding musician it is possible to serve up something more potent than consecutive performances of what is probably Beethoven's dullest Symphony.

Now that we have preached our sermon, let us see what else was on the Boston Orchestra's program last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Beethoven—
Symphony in F Major, "Pastoral," Op. 68
Wagner.....Prelude to "Parsifal"
MacDowell—
Concerto in D Minor, No. 2, Op. 23
For Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Liszt—
Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust":
The Dance in the Village Tavern
(Mephisto Waltz)

The previously announced soloist, Emilio De Gogorza, was unable to appear, owing to illness, his place being taken by Leo Ornstein, pianist, who played the MacDowall Concerto in D minor for piano and Orchestra. Mr. Ornstein is fortunately discarding some of the mannerisms that detracted from his performances of a year or so ago; his ability to play the piano is sufficient to award him the palm of commendation, and it is a pleasure to notice that he is concentrating upon his phase of popular appeal.

His work in the beautiful MacDoweil Concerto was indeed excellent and, while the accompaniment of Mr. Monteux's men was admirable as regards keeping with the soloist, there might have been a slight improvement if the volume of orchestral tone had been kept down somewhat. However, it was a fine performance of the premier American piano concerto.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony, the Richard Wagner "Prelude to Parsifal" and Liszt's "Memphisto Waltz," the latter intended as a musical protrayal of the Tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." The symphony was played in better fashion than either the "Parsifal" or the "Faust;" Mr. Monteux evidently had worked hard to prepare an interesting reading of the Beethoven score. The Wagner music was given a sober reading, quite impressive but slightly marred by some ragged flutes in the opening sestion. Liszt's erratic "Memphisto Waltz," with its typically effective instrumentation, brought the concert to a conclusion.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 29 1919

EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

News
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 1920

Gogorza As Soloist.

Emilio de Gogorza, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night, has frequently appeared in this city and is a prime favorite. His numbers will be arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massanet's "Roi de Lahore."

M. Monteux, the director, will give us another taste of novelty — three tastes, in fact. He is obviously very fond of selecting works that are unfamiliar, and his programs, consequently, are always unusually interesting and stimulating. This time he has chosen Chausson's B flat Symphony as the principal number, and in addition he will also present Debussy's "Jeux," which is receiving its first American performances this winter under his baton, and Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," whatever that may mean. Sounds piquant, at any rate.

Emilio De Gogorza

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish concert barytone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 31 1919

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INSURED

Board of Trustees Takes Out Policies to Value of $100,000 on Musicians.

Group insurance has been taken out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a series of concerts in Baltimore each year, according to official announcement made today.

The announcement says:

"Acting on a recent decision, the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for all the musicians to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member.

"This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which is as firm as it is of long standing."

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 2 1920

om
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 1920

om
Sun
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 1920

AT THE LYRIC

WITH his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest barytones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening Gluck's dramatic "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song, "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from "The King of Lahore."

For the symphony of this concert Pierre Monteux has chosen the eloquent and nobly exalted masterpiece of Ernest Chausson in B flat. Many admirers consider this work unexcelled in all French music before or since. Another notable event will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece, under the personal supervision of the composer, his interpretation should be authoritative. On that occasion Nijinsky staged the danced version of love and tennis balls in a garden. The final number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," in which the noted Volga Bargemen's song is a principal theme.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place on the evening of January 7, when the symphony will be the one in B flat, of Ernest Chausson. The assisting artist will be Emilio de Gogorza, barytone.

From
News
Baltimore, Md.

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Leo Ornstein.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, the assisting artist being Leon Ornstein, who replaced Emilio de Gogorza, whose appearance was prevented through illness.

Mr. Ornstein, who is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the younger piano virtuosi, played the second MacDowell concerto, the one in D minor, Op. 23. This rarely heard work is extremely interesting from certain points of view, broadly conceived and richly orchestral, a composition that is often very modern in feeling in that the piano part is so frequently merely obligato, a mere golden thread in the richly woven instrumental fabric. So while it offers the soloist fine opportunities for the display of his virtuosity, it has few deeply poetic or introspective values. It was extremely interesting to hear Mr. Ornstein last evening, and it may be said at once that his performance made a very profound impression on the big audience, for he attacked this American concerto with a fine expansive style and a rich dynamic appreciation, playing throughout the work with great brilliance, poise and intellectual appreciation. The amazingly difficult Presto he gave with remarkable suavity, coloring it with fine discretion and giving interesting accent to its many graceful phrases. Listening to this youth play with still vivid recollections of the curiously interpretative recital he gave here some seasons ago, one sensed immediately a somewhat different phase of th player's artistry, because the MacDowell concerto gave him no special opportunity for the display of his interpretative genius for individuality of reading. His performance was just a straightforward, beautiful piece of piano playing that won for him a real and hearty ovation.

It is to be noted in reviewing this concert that the concerto was the one purely "conventional" piece of music on a program which was otherwise inherently modern in feeling. The symphony was the one in B-flat major by the late Ernest Chausson, a dignified, rather sumptuous, but somewhat sombre work in the French idiom, a composition having certain spiritual, idealistic qualities that gave it extraordinary distinction, in spite of the fact that, like most modern French works, its greater glory was attained through its intricate instrumentation rather than from any particular suggestion of sustained melody. Richly endowed with colorful phrases, it was rather operatic in quality, the kind of music that might have made an exquisite background for some vivid dramatic instances.

After a fine performance of this work the orchestra played a peculiarly "difficult" bit of Debussy called "Jeux." This is music for one of Nijinski's "danced poems" and it is supposed to picture the varying moods of three young people who are looking for a tennis ball in a park at night. Strangely episodic, melodically speaking, its harmonies are as elusive as the flash

Melodies From Music's Sphere

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

One piece of good news "broke" recently, circumstances concerning which Musical America (N. Y.) outlined editorially as follows:

"The consummation for which the ages have been waiting has come at last—or, to speak by the card, has begun to come. Having obtained an initial momentum it will undoubtedly sweep on and its benefits presently extend themselves in all directions. Not to reach Hecuba by a circuitous route it is thus: Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has begun an interchange of programs with Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whereof the round, unvarnished meaning is that if Mr. Damrosch plans to give a certain symphony or suite or overture, or tone poem or whatever it may be Mr. Monteux will studiously refrain from giving the same thing if his New York excursion from Huntington avenue treads close upon the heels of one of the Damrosch functions. Thereby the security of certain feelings will remain unruffled and the critics will not fall into a distemper and abuse the second man who played the particular symphony, or overture, or tone poem.

"It is a good precedent that these two conductors propose to initiate. One does not entertain any question that its influential vibrations will be felt in other orchestra circles. The uniformity of mental processes to which symphony conductors, along with pianists, are subject is a phenomenon confirmed by years of tiresome demonstration. Every concert-giver knows how certain compositions become epidemic in certain seasons. We have recently had a plague of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Damrosch men would play it, the Stransky men would play it, the Altschuler men would play it, the Muck-Rabaud-Monteux men would play it, and when one finally breathed a prayer of gratitude after hearing the "Fate" theme for apparently the last time, the Stokowski cohorts would emerge from their barrier behind the Delaware and begin it all over again. Nobody doubted that they could do it well. But everyone—or almost everyone—would have rejoiced and been exceeding glad to have had them exercise their virtues beyond compare on something else. And as it has been with Tschaikowsky, so has it been at one time or another with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Schubert, and the gods themselves only know how many others. If now the other supermen who shake the little stick will only see fit to cooperate in the spirit exhibited by Damrosch and Monteux, we may look forward with angelic beatitude to something with a millenial savor.

"Of course, to draw upon the profound wisdom of Sir Roger de Coverly: 'Much may be said on both sides.' It is also true that every one who goes to the Boston concerts doesn't always go to the Damrosch," etc.

P. M., and on December ... both in Western High School

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 27

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 27 1919

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place at the Lyric on the evening of January 7, when the symphony will be the one in B flat, of Ernest Chausson. The assisting artist will be Emilio de Gogorza, barytone.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, the most admired baritone of the concert stage. His Spanish aristocratic descent colors his interpretations of songs with an individual charm, and his American birth and affiliations make him a favorite with his audiences. However, his superb voice is his fortune. He will sing Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore."

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

THE third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric last evening offered the audience, among other things, a disappointment and a surprise: the former being the absence, through illness, of Emilio de Gogorza, the well-known barytone, and the latter being the substitution of Leo Ornstein, pianist, as soloist. The change necessitated an alteration in the program, and in its revised form it consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B flat; A Danced Poem, "Jeux," by Debussy; McDowell's Concerto in D minor and the Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine" of Glazounoff.

The symphony is a beautiful example of the modern French school of composition in its highest form. Melodious to a degree, treated with all modern harmonic elaborations gorgeously colored by means of all modern orchestral devices, replete with interesting and beautiful effects which are attained in a natural and spontaneous manner without having to resort to "freakishness," and always perfectly sane, the composer proved that he had a message of high musical import to deliver. The first movement is built upon strikingly effective melodic material most interestingly developed. The second movement is full of intense sadness, while the finale is again a triumph of melodic and harmonic beauty gloriously depicted in glowing orchestral tone coloring. And to Mr. Monteux, the conductor, belongs the credit for the splendid production. Plentifully endowed with temperament, he radiates strength and authority.

The Debussy composition was a somewhat disconcerting contrast. An aimless wandering without any definite end, disconnected passages formlessly strung together, and without any apparent melody, one was tempted to ask what it all meant. Shakespeare could have supplied the answer, "Much Ado About Nothing."

The playing of Leo Ornstein came in the nature of a distinct surprise and revelation. The only standard by which his musicianship has hitherto been gauged is by his noisy, tuneless effusions which he has called compositions. He has, however, taken a more real and serious

His work was forceful where strength was needed and delicate and graceful when such were necessary. His gradation of dynamic effects was the work of an accomplished artist. And the concerto was so beautiful that one wonders why MacDowell, the king of American composers, is not more often represented on modern programs.

W. G. O.

... has for its basic theme the famous song of the Volga boatmen, a rather splendid, barbaric work depicting with rich tonal device certain emotional incidents in the life of one of Russia's national heroes.

J. O. L.

From
News
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 28 1919

SUNDAY, JA...

Famous Barytone Symphony Solois

Emilo de Gogorza Will Si... With Boston Orchestra At L... ric Wednesday—Muri Silb... Pianist, Coming In Recital ... Albaugh's Tuesday Evening ... Peabody Recital Friday.

...s soloist at the Boston Symphon... ...ert to be given at the Lyric n... ...nesday evening, Emilio de Gogor... ...famous barytone, will sing ar... ...Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" a... ...senet's "King of Lahore." Pie... ...reux will conduct ac this conc... ...asson's powerful and eloquent sy... ...y in B flat, considered one of ... ...t achievements of the French sch... ...usic. Notable also will be Debuss... ...Monteux is int... ...Since he also c... ...lic performance ... ...d poem" under ... ...f Debussy hims... ...ading may be ... ...be still further ... ...umber, Glazound... ..."Stenka Razi... ...ussian folk-songs

Music

...zorza With Boston Symphony.

...o de Gogorza will be the ... at the Boston Symphony Or... ...ra's concert on January 7. He ... of the Spanish aristocracy and for ... a number of years he has been conspicuous on the concert stage, his interpretations of songs by his countrymen having in particular become noted. His numbers here will be an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the love song from Massanet's "King of Lahore."

Pierre Monteux will continue the policy of introducing novelties that has made the Boston Symphony concerts here this winter events of quite uncommon niterest.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night.

Mr. DeGogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D Minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Debussey's A Dance Poem "Jeux," MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine."

adelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES BEETHOVEN'S PASTORAL

Interpreted With More Spirit and Skill Than Were Either Wagner's 'Prelude to Parsifal' or Portion of Lenau's 'Faust,' Which Completed Program.

BY CLARENCE K. BAWDEN.

Why, O why, when there are so many delectable symphonies, must we sit through the Beethoven "Pastoral" twice within ten days? A week from last Saturday the Philadelphia Orchestra ambled through the five movements of Beethoven's lesser symphony, and then, to prove that "it never rains but it pours," the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it again last night. Again we ask—Why? Does Mr. Monteux want to outshine Mr. Stokowski in interpretation, or the Boston men outplay our own—then let them choose some more interesting medium for the purpose of comparison. But then again, we do not need to make comparisons between the two organizations; we grant them both their points of excellence, both orchestras occupy high places in the list of symphony organizations—perhaps they occupy the highest.

But to hark back to the subject of programs, it is probably several seasons since Philadelphia has heard a Mendelssohn symphony, many more seasons since a presentation of Sain-Saens or Berlioz best symphony, and dear knows how long since a playing of such an important work as the Liszt "Divina Comedia." In fact, I do not believe that the young musician of our city—the boy or girl still in the 'teens—has never had the opportunity of hearing the latter valuable work. The cited compositions I have thought of at random—were I to search through symphonic literature there could be named a formidable list of neglected works, things that leave an indelible impression upon the future of those who drink in their philosophy.

No one holds Beethoven in greater reverence than the writer of this comment, no one has gleaned from him more inspiration or passed happier hours with his immortal works; so should the youthful musician of today delve into the treasure field of the better piano sonatas, the violin sonatas, the string quartets, the trios, the songs and the orchestral works of the master. But for the symphonic enlightenment of this same budding musician it is possible to serve up something more potent than consecutive performances of what is probably Beethoven's dullest Symphony.

Now that we have preached our sermon, let us see what else was on the Boston Orchestra's program last night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Pierre Monteux, Conductor.
PROGRAM.

Beethoven—
Symphony in F Major, "Pastoral," Op. 68

Wagner.....Prelude to "Parsifal"

MacDowell—
Concerto in D Minor, No. 2, Op. 23
For Pianoforte and Orchestra.

Liszt—
Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust":
The Dance in the Village Tavern
(Mephisto Waltz)

The previously announced soloist, Emilio De Gogorza, was unable to appear, owing to illness, his place being taken by Leo Ornstein, pianist, who played the MacDowall Concerto in D minor for piano and Orchestra. Mr. Ornstein is fortunately discarding some of the mannerisms that detracted from his performances of a year or so ago; his ability to play the piano is sufficient to award him the palm of commendation, and it is a pleasure to notice that he is concentrating upon his phase of popular appeal.

His work in the beautiful MacDoweil Concerto was indeed excellent and, while the accompaniment of Mr. Monteux's men was admirable as regards keeping with the soloist, there might have been a slight improvement if the volume of orchestral tone had been kept down somewhat. However, it was a fine performance of the premier American piano concerto.

The orchestral numbers were the Beethoven Symphony, the Richard Wagner "Prelude to Parsifal" and Liszt's "Memphisto Waltz," the latter intended as a musical protrayal of the Tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." The symphony was played in better fashion than either the "Parsifal" or the "Faust;" Mr. Monteux evidently had worked hard to prepare an interesting reading of the Beethoven score. The Wagner music was given a sober reading, quite impressive but slightly marred by some ragged flutes in the opening sestion. Liszt's erratic "Memphisto Waltz," with its typically effective instrumentation, brought the concert to a conclusion.

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 29 1919

tz Kreisler will be the soloist of the fo Boston Orchestra concert at the Lyon the evening of February 4. He wilso give a recital at the Lyric on M 24.

Melodies From [illegible]

BY J. NORRIS HERING.

One piece of good news "broke" recently, circumstances concerning which Musical America (N. Y.) outlined editorially as follows:

"The consummation for which the ages have been waiting has come at last—or, to speak by the card, has begun to come. Having obtained an initial momentum it will undoubtedly sweep on and its benefits presently extend themselves in all directions. Not to reach Hecuba by a circuitous route it is thus: Walter Damrosch, of the New York Symphony Orchestra, has begun an interchange of programs with Pierre Monteux, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whereof the round, unvarnished meaning is that if Mr. Damrosch plans to give a certain symphony or suite or overture, or tone poem or whatever it may be Mr. Monteux will studiously refrain from giving the same thing if his New York excursion from Huntington avenue treads close upon the heels of one of the Damrosch functions. Thereby the security of certain feelings will remain unruffled and the critics will not fall into a distemper and abuse the second man who played the particular symphony, or overture, or tone poem.

"It is a good precedent that these two conductors propose to initiate. One does not entertain any question that its influential vibrations will be felt in other orchestra circles. The uniformity of mental processes to which symphony conductors, along with pianists, are subject is a phenomenon confirmed by years of tiresome demonstration. Every concert-giver knows how certain compositions become epidemic in certain seasons. We have recently had a plague of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony. The Damrosch men would play it, the Stransky men would play it, the Altschuler men would play it, the Muck-Rabaud-Monteux men would play it, and when one finally breathed a prayer of gratitude after hearing the "Fate" theme for apparently the last time, the Stokowski cohorts would emerge from their barrier behind the Delaware and begin it all over again. Nobody doubted that they could do it well. But everyone—or almost everyone—would have rejoiced and been exceeding glad to have had them exercise their virtues beyond compare on something else. And as it has been with Tschaikowsky, so has it been at one time or another with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Saint-Saens, Schubert, and the gods themselves only know how many others. If now the other supermen who shake the little stick will only see fit to cooperate in the spirit exhibited by Damrosch and Monteux, we may look forward with angelic beatitude to something with a millenial savor. "Of course, to draw upon the profound wisdom of Sir Roger de Coverly: 'Much may be said on both sides.' It is also true that every one who goes to the Boston concerts doesn't always go to the Damrosch," etc.

[illegible] P. M., and on December [illegible] both in Western High School

STAR
Baltimore, Md.
E DEC 27

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

At the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, January 7, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, the most admired baritone of the concert stage. His Spanish aristocratic descent colors his interpretations of songs with an individual charm, and his American birth and affiliations make him a favorite with his audiences. However, his superb voice is his fortune. He will sing Gluck's opening aria from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song from "The King of Lahore."

News
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 4 1920

Gogorza As Soloist.

Emilio de Gogorza, who will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony's concert Wednesday night, has frequently appeared in this city and is a prime favorite. His numbers will be arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massanet's "Roi de Lahore."

M. Monteux, the director, will give us another taste of novelty — three tastes, in fact. He is obviously very fond of selecting works that are unfamiliar, and his programs, consequently, are always unusually interesting and stimulating. This time he has chosen Chausson's B flat Symphony as the principal number, and in addition he will also present Debussy's "Jeux," which is receiving its first American performances this winter under his baton, and Glazounow's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," whatever that may mean. Sounds piquant, at any rate.

Emilio De Gogorza

Emilio de Gogorza, the popular Spanish concert barytone, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric next Wednesday night.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 31 1919

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA INSURED

Board of Trustees Takes Policies to Value of $100,000 on Musicians.

Group insurance has been taken out for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which plays a series of concerts in Baltimore each year, according to official announcement made today.

The announcement says:

"Acting on a recent decision, the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have taken out group insurance for all the musicians to the amount of $100,000, covering the eventual death or total disability of any member.

"This is, of course, entirely distinct from the pension fund, maintained by special concerts and contributions, which is as firm as it is of long standing."

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 2 5 1920

Famous Barytone Symphony Soloist

Emilo de Gogorza Will Sing With Boston Orchestra At Lyric Wednesday—Muri Silberg Pianist, Coming In Recital At Albaugh's Tuesday Evening and Peabody Recital Friday.

[illegible]s soloist at the Boston Symphony concert to be given at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gogorza, famous barytone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert. Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B flat, considered one of the best achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux," which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this so-called "danced poem" under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. There will be still further interest in the final number, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folk-songs for its themes.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 27 1919

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place at the Lyric on the evening of January 7, when the symphony will be the one in B flat, of Ernest Chausson. The assisting artist will be Emilio de Gogorza, barytone.

om
Sun
altimore, Md.
JAN 4 - 1920

From
Sun
Baltimore, Md.

AT THE LYRIC

WITH his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest barytones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert in the Lyric Theatre next Wednesday evening Gluck's dramatic "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's love song, "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from "The King of Lahore."

For the symphony of this concert Pierre Monteux has chosen the eloquent and nobly exalted masterpiece of Ernest Chausson in B flat. Many admirers consider this work unexcelled in all French music before or since. Another notable event will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece, under the personal supervision of the composer, his interpretation should be authoritative. On that occasion Nijinsky staged the danced version of love and tennis balls in a garden. The final number will be Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," in which the noted Volga Bargemen's song is a principal theme.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

The next Boston Symphony concert will take place on the evening of January 7 at the Lyric, when the soloist [illegible] through illness, of Emilio de Gogorza, the well-known barytone, and the latter being the substitution of Leo Ornstein, pianist, as soloist. The change necessitated an alteration in the program, and in its revised form it consisted of Chausson's Symphony in B flat; A Danced Poem, "Jeux," by Debussy; McDowell's Concerto in D minor and the Symphonic Poem "Stenka Razine" of Glazounoff.

The symphony is a beautiful example of the modern French school of composition in its highest form. Melodious to a degree, treated with all modern harmonic elaboration, gorgeously colored by means of a modern orchestral devices, replete with interesting and beautiful effects which are attained in a natural and spontaneous manner without having to resort to "freakishness," and always perfectly sane, the composer proved that he had a message of high musical import to deliver. The first movement is built upon strikingly effective melodic material most interestingly developed. The second movement is full of intense sadness, while the finale is again a triumph of melodic and harmonic beauty gloriously depicted in glowing orchestral tone coloring. And to Mr. Monteux, the conductor, belongs the credit for the splendid production. Plentifully endowed with temperament, he radiates strength and authority.

The Debussy composition was a somewhat disconcerting contrast. An aimless wandering without any definite end, disconnected passages formlessly strung together, and without any apparent melody, one was tempted to ask what it all meant. Shakespeare could have supplied the answer, "Much Ado About Nothing."

The playing of Leo Ornstein came in the nature of a distinct surprise and revelation. The only standard by which his musicianship has hitherto been gauged is by his noisy, tuneless effusions which he has called compositions. He has, however, taken a more real and serious

From
News
Baltimore, Md.

224

Lyric

The Boston Orchestra And Leo Ornstein.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteaux, gave its third concert at the Lyric last evening, the assisting artist being Leon Ornstein, who replaced Emilio de Gogorza, whose appearance was prevented through illness.

Mr. Ornstein, who is unquestionably one of the most interesting of the younger piano virtuosi, played the second MacDowell concerto, the one in D minor, Op. 23. This rarely heard work is extremely interesting from certain points of view, broadly conceived and richly orchestral, a composition that is often very modern in feeling in that the piano part is so frequently merely obligato, a mere golden thread in the richly woven instrumental fabric. So while it offers the soloist fine opportunities for the display of his virtuosity, it has few deeply poetic or introspective values. It was extremely interesting to hear Mr. Ornstein last evening, and it may be said at once that his performance made a very profound impression on the big audience, for he attacked this American concerto with a fine expansive style and a rich dynamic appreciation, playing throughout the work with great brilliance, poise and intellectual appreciation. The amazingly difficult Presto he gave with remarkable suavity, coloring it with fine discretion and giving interesting accent to its many graceful phrases. Listening to this youth play with still vivid recollections of the curiously interpretative recital he gave here some seasons ago, one sensed immediately a somewhat different phase of th player's artistry, because the MacDowell concerto gave him no special opportunity for the display of his interpretative genius for individuality of reading. His performance was just a straightforward, beautiful piece of piano playing that won for him a real and hearty ovation.

It is to be noted in reviewing this concert that the concerto was the one purely "conventional" piece of music on a program which was otherwise inherently modern in feeling. The symphony was the one in B-flat major by the late Ernest Chausson, a dignified, rather sumptuous, but somewhat sombre work in the French idiom, a composition having certain spiritual, idealistic qualities that gave it extraordinary distinction, in spite of the fact that, like most modern French works, its greater glory was attained through its intricate instrumentation rather than from any particular suggestion of sustained melody. Richly endowed with colorful phrases, it was rather operatic in quality, the kind of music that might have made an exquisite background for some vivid dramatic instances.

After a fine performance of this work the orchestra played a peculiarly "difficult" bit of Debussy called "Jeux." This is music for one of Nijinski's "danced poems" and it is supposed to picture the varying moods of three young people who are looking for a tennis ball in a park at night. Strangely episodic, melodically speaking, its harmonies are as elusive as the flashing thoughts of the inconsequential youngsters it is planned to complement, and only in the single incident of the "triple kiss" does it achieve any definite emotional significance. While extraordinarily characteristic, delicate and whimsical, it is scarcely music that has particular values apart from its dancing interpreters because it is so curiously lacking in sustained melodic beauty.

The concert closed with the "Stenka Razine" symphonic poem of Glazounoff, a fine piece of Russian writing that has for its basic theme the famous song of the Volga boatmen, a rather splendid, barbaric work depicting with rich tonal device certain emotional incidents in the life of one of Russia's national heroes.

J. O. L.

From
News
Baltimore, Md.
DEC 2 [illegible] 1919

Music

Gogorza With Boston Symphony.

Emilio de Gogorza will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on January 7. He is of the Spanish aristocracy and for a number of years he has been conspicuous on the concert stage, his interpretations of songs by his countrymen having in particular become noted. His numbers here will be an aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the love song from Massanet's "King of Lahore."

Pierre Monteux will continue the policy of introducing novelties that has made the Boston Symphony concerts here this winter events of quite uncommon niterest.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theater tomorrow night.

Mr. DeGogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D Minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's Symphony in B flat major, Debussey's A Dance Poem "Jeux," MacDowell's Piano Concerto in D minor, and Glazounoff's Symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

10TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Work Has First Place on Program

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" ANOTHER FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." "Jeux" was performed probably for the first time in this country. Glazounoff's tone-poem, first performed here at one of Mr. Lang's "Chickering Production Concerts" in 1904, was heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert.

Mendelssohn's symphony was new to the great majority of the audience. The first performance in America was at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1868, the year that the score was published. Mendelssohn evidently did not think much of his work, for he did not wish it published during his lifetime, nor did he like to hear of performances. The Harvard Musical Association played the Symphony in 1868 and in later years gave three performances of the Scherzo. There were at least two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the last was in 1886, if we are not mistaken. The Scherzo was played here twice by Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The reason for this neglect is not far to seek: The music is for the most part perfunctory and deadly dull. The only measures of interest in the first movement are those of the "Dresden Amen," used years afterward by Wagner in "Parsifal." The Scherzo shines by contrast with the other movements: it is suave, graceful, eminently Mendelssohnian in its scherzo character. The andante is as sentimental as the most sentimental of the "Songs Without Words." The treatment of Luther's choral, "A Safe Stronghold," is not impressive, and the finale with its pedestrian counterpoint might have been written by some English doctor of music for his oratorio "Jeroboam" or "Keren-happuch." Mr. Monteux and his merry men did their best to make the dry bones live, but only the Scherzo gave pleasure. Still it was worth while to revive the symphony, if only to show what arid music could be written by a composer of certain romantic and charming works.

Debussy's music was sadly in need of the stage effects and the miming of the dancers. It was written for a singular ballet. The composer, it is said, was greatly harassed by the demands of Nijinsky. Here again a filmed representation of the ballet displayed yesterday might have "explained" and emphasized the music, but the audience would probably have strained eyes, not ears. As a concert work, "Jeux" interests by its orchestral tints and demi-tints; its instrumental combinations and contrasts; and at times harmonic progressions, unusual even in Debussy's other compositions, arrest attention; but away from the theatre, "Jeux" cannot be ranked with earlier music by Debussy. There is a paucity of ideas; the suggestion that a composer was endeavoring to imitate Debussy and succeeded only in aping certain mannerisms, certain tricks of idiom. Mr. Monteux, who had conducted the ballet in Paris and London, no doubt yesterday again saw the stage, Nijinsky and the two young women. To him this music had significance. The performance was brilliant.

Glazounoff wrote his "Stenka Razin" [illegible] he was 20 years old; when he [illegible]ar[illegible]c; when he was imbued [illegible]ional spirit; when Balakireff [illegible]sky-Korsakoff had hope of him [illegible]essor. Crude as "Stenka Rasin" [illegible]tain respects, it is to be pre[illegible] the academic works of Glazou[illegible]o became Germanized, and [illegible]th fatal fluency and painful [illegible]sm. The wildness and au[illegible] the opening descriptive of [illegible] with the use of the barge[illegible]; the oriental coloring of the [illegible]ortraying the adored but ill[illegible]ncess; these console one for [illegible]es of artless padding, measures which Glazounoff merely treads water (in the marvellous Volga) and for the comparative tameness of Stenka's music, tame in spite of the strenuous endeavor. And so "Stenka Razin" is today a work that gave rich promise not to be fulfilled. It is said that a few years ago this music was used for a ballet in Russia. How was the scenario arranged? Was the dancing all on Stenka's boat?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 16, 17, is as follows: Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, op. 21 (first time in Boston). Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; Schumann, "Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less" and "Leave Me in His Arms Endearing"; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Funeral march and Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." Margaret Matzenauer will be the singer.

TENNIS AS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Debussy's Ballet Is Heard—Three Novelties on List

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should the sporting editor of the Post have attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and reported the matter in his own inimitable style? A leading feature of the programme was Debussy's music for the ballet "Jeux" ("Play"), which was mimed on the stage in Paris, May 15, 1913, by dancers in tennis costume. But Mr. Monteux did not conduct with a racquet, therefore the present scribe takes up his accustomed pen.

FOR FIRST TIME HERE

This music of Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Monteux conducted the premiere of the stage work in Paris, when the famous Nijinsky was the man tennis player and the two girls were Mmes. Karsovina and Schollar. The game as mimed on the Paris stage was a cute if not exactly open-air and sportsmanlike affair, and Mr. Nijinsky is held responsible—he has a waggish disposition—for the statement to the press that "All Sorts (apologies to Mr. Newton Newkirk!) is the ballet—'tis a broad vista, The Dance of Rockefeller at Golf. The mounted ballet in a polo game and the rhythmic swivel, side-step and swat of the 'Ballet du box.' But it would take another Wagner to compose the music for an affair of gorgeous Amazons in the crunch and scrap and rough and tumble of the 'Ballet de Furore du Football.'"

O well! Tennis is not the strangest thing to have inspired musical composers. Richard Strauss wrote of a flock of baa-ing sheep in his "Don Quixote," and in another place in the same work of a windmill, and in "Salome" of the dropping of blood and in "Electrie" of the lashing of whips and other elevating things.

Unlike Debussy

Debussy has lightly suggested the click of the racquets, the soft impact and bounce of the tennis balls, and there are passages of playful fancy and humor in the music. The opening and close are poetic. The situation on the stage was a game of tennis, as evening fell, which developed into a scene of coquetry and love between the man and the two girls. At the last "a tennis ball falls at their feet; surprised and frightened, they go bounding away, and disappear in the depths of the nocturnal park."

First impressions of a first performance may well be discounted, so far as accuracy and conclusiveness are concerned. But first impressions are what a reviewer is expected to write down, and sometimes these first impressions are fully as reliable and much more vivid than later ones. Be it said here, then, that this music of Debussy, as a whole, seems forced, unoriginal, without very much organic quality and about as far-fetched as the artificial and sophisticated scenario of the ballet for which it was written.

Borrows From Stravinsky

And, furthermore, this is no longer the actual Debussy. This is Debussyized Stravinsky. The score is redolent of the Stravinsky of the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Firebird," and the willingness with which Debussy has here helped himself to Stravinsky's instrumental scheme and to a number of the pet harmonic mannerisms of the celebrated Russian appears merely another proof of the waning creative powers of the Frenchman in the last years of his career, when his invention was getting more and more feeble, as his workmanship increased in ingenuity and dexterity. The day may come when a tennis game will appear poetic and legendary and inspire music of like quality. But the impression given by yesterday's performance was that of a composer extremely skilled in orchestral usage desperately in need of new ideas.

Of course there were Debussyites, for whom anything and everything the man wrote is incredibly wonderful, who applauded obstinately.

The "Reformation"

There were two other novelties on the programme. We use the word "novelty" intentionally when speaking of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, not heard in many years in Boston, and composed in 1829. To the generation present yesterday the symphony proved a novelty and a bore. Its points of interest are the execrable facility with which Mendelssohn, a youth of 20, penned this sonorous work, and the use of certain Lutheran themes, as the "Dresden Amen," which Wagner employed so significantly in "Parsifal," written years later than the "Reformation" Symphony, and the theme of the Lutheran choral, "Ein feste Burg." The use of the "Dresden Amen" is striking in this: It recurs three times in the first movement, twice in the introduction and once again toward the end of the movement; it has always the same instrumentation—the violins—and the impression on the ear—we do not know the score—is that it reappears in the same key.

"Ein feste burg," employed by so many composers, is intoned in the last movement as a melodic phrase without harmony, then with more and more of the wind instruments added, as the voices first of a choir, then of a congregation, might take up such a melody. And the rest is glib Mendelssohnism. The scherzo is especially characteristic in the most conventional manner. But it is only just to the composer to say that Mendelssohn himself did not care to have this symphony published nor to discuss it. It was published after his death as a posthumous work.

Interesting Tone Poem

By far the most interesting music on the programme was Glazounoff's early symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," after the story of the dreaded pirate of the 17th century in Russia, a terror to the countryside, who, sailing on the Volga, saw one day that capture by pursuers was inevitable. Seated in splendor on the deck of his vessel was his mistress, a captive Persian princess. She had told her companions of a dream that Stenka was killed, that she was drowned in the Volga.

And this dream came true. The pursuers of the Czar came nearer. The chieftain said to his comrades, "Never during all my 30 years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of earthly treasures." He threw the princess into the Volga, and with his followers rushed on the soldiers of the Czar.

Full of Color and Force

The celebrated folk-song of the Volga boatmen predominates in this work. There is a savage phrase for Stenka Razine, and a seductive melody, gorgeously instrumentated, for the princess. There is the thought of the flowing Volga, of approaching conflict. The princess tells her tale. At the end the Volga theme is chanted wildly by instruments of brass through orchestral tumult.

The music is full of color and force. This is not a mature work. Themes are developed in a fragmentary way, form is none too clear, the musical thought is not enchained. Although themes are repeated they do not lead, inevitably, one into another. And yet the music has real force, imagination, fantasy, and it should be often heard. It has the true creative quality; it is of Russian imagination, and is incomparably superior in these characteristics to later and much more highly polished compositions which Glazounoff turned out in older and more polite days. The reason for this is that even in art, where much attention must be paid to beauty and durability of workmanship, the vision and the intention of a creative nature hold first place, and questions of technic and even of esthetics are secondary.

NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

It seems there are still fine works by great authors to be presented for the first time at Boston Smyphony concerts. Yesterday we heard a tone poem by Glazounoff entitled "Stenka Razine" and Debussy's "Jeux," a ballet written to an idea of Nijinsky's.

There was also the not very familiar "Reformation" symphony by Mendelssohn, a work based on one or two Lutheran hymns and distinguished by the rotund and sonorous treatment to be expected from Mentelssohn.

"Jeux" is Debussy at his least inspiration. Murmurs, twitters, squeaks, frank discords played softly, rare snatches of melody, a general impression of prelude which never resolves into anything substantial. With Nijinsky jumping about on a stage it might be more interesting. There is nothing but praise for the Russian tone poem. It begins with that wonderful song of the Volga boatmen treated in the most imaginative manner and it runs a riot of fire, fury and brilliancy. Not for one second are you bored.

Ballet music is Monteux's special metier. When he plays it he is a very great conductor. I don't recall ever having heard a finer body of tone or more effective work by the orchestra than in the Glazounoff work.

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" AT THE SYMPHONY

Ballet "Poem" Given First American Performance

Orchestral Music by Mendelssohn and Glazounoff Revived

All three numbers of yesterday's Symphony Concert were new to nearly every one in the audience, though Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony is a revival, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" was composed in 1885, and first played in Boston in 1904.

Debussy's "Jeux," which is his arrangement for concert performance of music written for a danced "poem" given by the Russian Ballet in Paris and London in 1913, was first played in Paris in 1914. The audience yesterday found it so very novel that only a few youthful enthusiasts ventured to applaud the first American performance, despite the supposed vogue of Debussy in Boston.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra deserved a round of applause for an unusually brilliant performance of the extremely difficult music even from those who found it only a disagreeable noise. Mr Monteux, who conducted the original performances of the ballet, consulted frequently with the composer and is thus in a position to give an authoritative reading. The vehemence of the "saving remnant," much of it in the second balcony "rush seats," compelled him to bow repeatedly, and possibly persuaded him that the pains spent on preparation were not wasted after all.

Shows Mastery of Technique

It is impossible to judge such music as "Jeux" finally from a single hearing. Debussy here as always uses the orchestra as a single instrument whose technique he has mastered. In "Jeux" it would be as absurd to separate his orchestra into "strings, woodwind, brass and percussion" for purposes of analysis as it would be to divide the keyboard of a modern pianoforte into four sections in order to talk about piano style.

He writes for orchestra as effectively as he writes for piano, always securing precisely the effect he desires with the greatest possible economy of means. He has a similar mastery of the technique of composition. For example, he knows how to weave rhythms into a well developed climax. In "Jeux" he seems to have substituted this rhythmic development for the orthodox thematic development. The themes are fragmentary, and not melodic at all according to received notions of melody, which are, of course, based on precedent rather than on any scientific principle.

Technical skill, however great, will not make a masterpiece, but there is genuine imaginative power and emotional intensity back of the skill displayed in "Jeux." The piece is more daringly dissonant than Stravinsky's "Firebird," played at a recent concert. It proves that Debussy went on developing as a composer up to his very last years. The reputed sterility of his later works may prove, as has been the case with Beethoven, to be in the Debussy's "Jeux" would seem to be a case in point. The scenario which it is designed to accompany is not in itself of striking character, and the music suffers from this lack of definité mood. It is fanciful; it contains many novel effects of color; it bears the imprint of a master of harmonic and orchestral resources and undoubtedly in conjunction with the stage action it elucidates the somewhat slender plot of the ballet. As music pure and simple, however, it is difficult to catch its meaning. Of striking themes there are none, and in it we fail to perceive the Debussy of "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," of the "Sea Pieces."

The performance was a remarkably fine one. Such music must be played with the delicacy and clarity of Mozart. Mr. Monteux undoubtedly excels in such music and is able to impart his enthusiasm for it to the orchestra.

Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" is a welcome addition to the repertory. The orchestration is brilliant and there are several impressive climaxes.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony was heard again after many years of neglect. While it in no way compares with the "Scotch" or "Italian" symphonies, it proved a welcome change. The scherzo still has the power to charm. The finale is sonorous even in these days of imposing orchestral masses. Some speak slightingly of Mendelssohn's music, yet there are few composers who have equaled it in fineness of workmanship, in exquisite sense of proportion, or elegance of style. It was not in Mendelssohn's power to express the deeper emotions, yet in grace and fancy there are few to compare with him.

Although not quite half of the Symphony concerts have as yet been given, and it is as yet too soon to form any just estimate of Mr. Monteux as a conductor, it is yet possible to take note of certain characteristics of his work. When Mr. Monteux came last year to conduct a few concerts at the beginning of the season, he found the orchestra in a low state of efficiency. During those few weeks he succeeded in reorganizing the orchestra and in restoring many of its past virtues. The public immediately realized that he was expert in all matters pertaining to orchestral technic, but it did not have time to judge of his capacities as an interpreter and programmaker.

At the present time, however, it is a pleasure to note the steady progress which the orchestra has made under his skillful leadership and the interesting character and variety of his programs. Mr. Monteux is apparently interested in the music of all schools. In the course of the past 10 programs we have heard music of all styles presented with unfailing care and sympathy. We have heard several novelties, yet the old and tried has not been neglected. Mr. Monteux shuns the spectacular. He is modest and unassuming, yet, as the concerts have succeeded one another, the power of his quiet but whole-hearted devotion to a high artistic ideal is being felt more and more. The remaining concerts of the season will be looked forward to with all the greater pleasure because of the feeling of confidence and respect which his sincerity of purpose has inspired.

MUSIC

Music by the Boston Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its tenth program on January 2. The following pieces were played:

Mendelssohn....."Reformation" Symphony
Debussy....."Jeux" (play) a danced poem
Glazounoff....."Stenka Razine"

Debussy's piece was played for the first time in Boston. Glazounoff's symphonic poem was played for the first time at these concerts.

It is the present fashion to turn symphonic poems into ballets and ballets into symphonic poems. It is a matter of opinion whether or not the music does not suffer in either case. Still, the symphonic work transferred to the theater is the less likely of the two to lose in effectiveness. Designed without thought of pantomime, scenery, or dramatic action, the addition of these elements, while tending to distract the attention from the purely musical side of the composition, never wholly mars its beauty or clouds its meaning. On the contrary, music primarily designed to accompany and comment upon a stage scene or picture tends to lose in effectiveness when transported to the concert room. Phrases and motives which most aptly intensify and illustrate a dramatic situation are not necessarily suitable to stand on their own merits as pure music. Whereas the symphonic poem creates a mood and then allows the listener to supply the detail of the dramatic action according to the dictates of his imagination, the music of the theater is only one of the many elements which unite to produce the effect. Many passages from Wagner operas are an apparent exception and for this reason many have declared that Wagner was greater as a symphonist than as a dramatic composer. It is possible, however, that the situations to which the selections customarily played in our concert rooms serve as a commentary, are so familiar to the average concert goer that he unconsciously supplies the atmosphere of the theater from [illegible] his past impressions to be established for this occupation.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST HEARING DEBUSSY'S 'JEUX'

Pierre Monteux's reading of Debussy's "Jeux" (Play) and the excellent work of the orchestra, being Boston's first hearing of the number, featured the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. It's a question if Debussy himself could he have heard the playing would not have declared that conductor and orchestra are wonderful. Certainly they brought out everything possible in the number, in fact, apparently imparted interest where, a first hearing would seem to indicate, there was too little foundation. It gives the impression of the composer being out of his element, writing of something he lacked sympathy with.

It's safe to predict Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony will be permitted another long slumber after this week's concerts. On the other hand the welcome accorded Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," indicates a frequent hearing.

10TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Work Has First Place on Program

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" ANOTHER FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." "Jeux" was performed probably for the first time in this country. Glazounoff's tone-poem, first performed here at one of Mr. Lang's "Chickering Production Concerts" in 1904, was heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert.

Mendelssohn's symphony was new to the great majority of the audience. The first performance in America was at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1868, the year that the score was published. Mendelssohn evidently did not think much of his work, for he did not wish it published during his lifetime, nor did he like to hear of performances. The Harvard Musical Association played the Symphony in 1868 and in later years gave three performances of the Scherzo. There were at least two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the last was in 1886, if we are not mistaken. The Scherzo was played here twice by Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The reason for this neglect is not far to seek: The music is for the most part perfunctory and deadly dull. The only measures of interest in the first movement are those of the "Dresden Amen," used years afterward by Wagner in "Parsifal." The Scherzo shines by contrast with the other movements; it is suave, graceful, eminently Mendelssohnian in its scherzo character. The andante is as sentimental as the most sentimental of the "Songs Without Words." The treatment of Luther's choral, "A Safe Stronghold," is not impressive, and the finale with its pedestrian counterpoint might have been written by some English doctor of music for his oratorio "Jeroboam" or "Keren-happuch." Mr. Monteux and his merry men did their best to make the dry bones live, but only the Scherzo gave pleasure. Still it was worth while to revive the symphony, if only to show what arid music could be written by a composer of certain romantic and charming works.

Debussy's music was sadly in need of the stage effects and the miming of the dancers. It was written for a singular ballet. The composer, it is said, was greatly harassed by the demands of Nijinsky. Here again a filmed representation of the ballet displayed yesterday might have "explained" and emphasized the music, but the audience would probably have strained eyes, not ears. As a concert work, "Jeux" interests by its orchestral tints and demi-tints; its instrumental combinations and contrasts; and at times harmonic progressions, unusual even in Debussy's other compositions, arrest attention; but away from the theatre, "Jeux" cannot be ranked with earlier music by Debussy. There is a paucity of ideas; the suggestion that a composer was endeavoring to imitate Debussy and succeeded only in aping certain mannerisms, certain tricks of idiom. Mr. Monteux, who had conducted the ballet in Paris and London, no doubt yesterday again saw the stage, Nijinsky and the two young women. To him this music had significance. The performance was brilliant.

Glazounoff wrote his "Stenka Razin" [illegible] he was 20 years old; when he [illegible]ar[illegible]c; when he was imbued [illegible]tional spirit; when Balakireff [illegible]sky-Korsakoff had hope of him [illegible]cessor. Crude as "Stenka Rasin" [illegible]tain respects, it is to be pre[illegible] the academic works of Glazou[illegible]o became Germanized, and [illegible]th fatal fluency and painful [illegible]sm. The wildness and au[illegible] the opening descriptive of [illegible] with the use of the barge[illegible]; the oriental coloring of the [illegible]ortraying the adored but ill[illegible]ncess; these console one for [illegible]es of artless padding, measures [illegible]which Glazounoff merely treads water (in the marvellous Volga) and for the comparative tameness of Stenka's music, tame in spite of the strenuous endeavor. And so "Stenka Razin" is today a work that gave rich promise not to be fulfilled. It is said that a few years ago this music was used for a ballet in Russia. How was the scenario arranged? Was the dancing all on Stenka's boat?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 16, 17, is as follows: Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, op. 21 (first time in Boston), Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; Schumann, "Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less" and "Leave Me in His Arms Endearing"; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Funeral march and Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." Margaret Matzenauer will be the singer.

TENNIS AS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Debussy's Ballet Is Heard—Three Novelties on List

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should the sporting editor of the Post have attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and reported the matter in his own inimitable style? A leading feature of the programme was Debussy's music for the ballet "Jeux" ("Play"), which was mimed on the stage in Paris, May 15, 1913, by dancers in tennis costume. But Mr. Monteux did not conduct with a racquet, therefore the present scribe takes up his accustomed pen.

FOR FIRST TIME HERE

This music of Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Monteux conducted the premiere of the stage work in Paris, when the famous Nijinsky was the man tennis player and the two girls were Mmes. Karsovina and Schollar. The game as mimed on the Paris stage was a cute if not exactly open-air and sportsmanlike affair, and Mr. Nijinsky is held responsible—he has a waggish disposition—for the statement to the press that "All Sorts (apologies to Mr. Newton Newkirk!) is the ballet—'tis a broad vista, The Dance of Rockefeller at Golf." The mounted ballet in a polo game and the rhythmic swivel, side-step and swat of the 'Ballet du box.' But it would take another Wagner to compose the music for an affair of gorgeous Amazons in the crunch and scrap and rough and tumble of the 'Ballet de Furore du Football.'"

O well! Tennis is not the strangest thing to have inspired musical composers. Richard Strauss wrote of a flock of baa-ing sheep in his "Don Quixote," and in another place in the same work of a windmill, and in "Salome" of the dropping of blood and in "Electric" of the lashing of whips and other elevating things.

Unlike Debussy

Debussy has lightly suggested the click of the racquets, the soft impact and bounce of the tennis balls, and there are passages of playful fancy and humor in the music. The opening and close are poetic. The situation on the stage was a game of tennis, as evening fell, which developed into a scene of coquetry and love between the man and the two girls. At the last "a tennis ball falls at their feet; surprised and frightened, they go bounding away, and disappear in the depths of the nocturnal park."

First impressions of a first performance may well be discounted, so far as accuracy and conclusiveness are concerned. But first impressions are what a reviewer is expected to write down, and sometimes these first impressions are fully as reliable and much more vivid than later ones. Be it said here, then, that this music of Debussy, as a whole, seems forced, unoriginal, without very much organic quality and about as far-fetched as the artificial and sophisticated scenario of the ballet for which it was written.

Borrows From Stravinsky

And, furthermore, this is no longer the actual Debussy. This is Debussyized Stravinsky. The score is redolent of the Stravinsky of the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Firebird," and the willingness with which Debussy has here helped himself to Stravinsky's instrumental scheme and to a number of the pet harmonic mannerisms of the celebrated Russian appears merely another proof of the waning creative powers of the Frenchman in the last years of his career, when his invention was getting more and more feeble, as his workmanship increased in ingenuity and dexterity. The day may come when a tennis game will appear poetic and legendary and inspire music of like quality. But the impression given by yesterday's performance was that of a composer extremely skilled in orchestral usage desperately in need of new ideas.

Of course there were Debussyites, for whom anything and everything the man wrote is incredibly wonderful, who applauded obstinately.

The "Reformation"

There were two other novelties on the programme. We use the word "novelty" intentionally when speaking of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, not heard in many years in Boston, and composed in 1829. To the generation present yesterday the symphony proved a novelty and a bore. Its points of interest are the execrable facility with which Mendelssohn, a youth of 20, penned this sonorous work, and the use of certain Lutheran themes, as the "Dresden Amen," which Wagner employed so significantly in "Parsifal," written years later than the "Reformation" symphony, and the theme of the Lutheran choral, "Ein feste Burg." The use of the "Dresden Amen" is striking in this: It recurs three times in the first movement, twice in the introduction and once again toward the end of the movement; it has always the same instrumentation—the violins—and the impression on the ear—we do not know the score—is that it reappears in the same key.

"Ein feste burg," employed by so many composers, is intoned in the last movement as a melodic phrase without harmony, then with more and more of the wind instruments added, as the voices first of a choir, then of a congregation, might take up such a melody. And the rest is glib Mendelssohnism. The scherzo is especially characteristic in the most conventional manner. But it is only just to the composer to say that Mendelssohn himself did not care to have this symphony published nor to discuss it. It was published after his death as a posthumous work.

Interesting Tone Poem

By far the most interesting music on the programme was Glazounoff's early symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," after the story of the dreaded pirate of the 17th century in Russia, a terror to the countryside, who, sailing on the Volga, saw one day that capture by pursuers was inevitable. Seated in splendor on the deck of his vessel was his mistress, a captive Persian princess. She had told her companions of a dream that Stenka was killed, that she was drowned in the Volga.

And this dream came true. The pursuers of the Czar came nearer. The chieftain said to his comrades, "Never during all my 30 years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of earthly treasures." He threw the princess into the Volga, and with his followers rushed on the soldiers of the Czar.

Full of Color and Force

The celebrated folk-song of the Volga boatmen predominates in this work. There is a savage phrase for Stenka Razine, and a seductive melody, gorgeously instrumentated, for the princess. There is the thought of the flowing Volga, of approaching conflict. The princess tells her tale. At the end the Volga theme is chanted wildly by instruments of brass through orchestral tumult.

The music is full of color and force. This is not a mature work. Themes are developed in a fragmentary way, form is none too clear, the musical thought is not enchained. Although themes are repeated they do not lead, inevitably, one into another. And yet the music has real force, imagination, fantasy, and it should be often heard. It has the true creative quality; it is of Russian imagination, and is incomparably superior in these characteristics to later and much more highly polished compositions which Glazounoff turned out in older and more polite days. The reason for this is that even in art, where much attention must be paid to beauty and durability of workmanship, the vision and the intention of a creative nature hold first place, and questions of technic and even of esthetics are secondary.

NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

It seems there are still fine works by great authors to be presented for the first time at Boston Smyphony concerts. Yesterday we heard a tone poem by Glazounoff entitled "Stenka Razine" and Debussy's "Jeux," a ballet written to an idea of Nijinsky's.

There was also the not very familiar "Reformation" symphony by Mendelssohn, a work based on one or two Lutheran hymns and distinguished by the rotund and sonorous treatment to be expected from Mentelssohn.

"Jeux" is Debussy at his least inspiration. Murmurs, twitters, squeaks, frank discords played softly, rare snatches of melody, a general impression of prelude which never resolves into anything substantial. With Nijinsky jumping about on a stage it might be more interesting. There is nothing but praise for the Russian tone poem. It begins with that wonderful song of the Volga boatmen treated in the most imaginative manner and it runs a riot of fire, fury and brilliancy. Not for one second are you bored.

Ballet music is Monteux's special metier. When he plays it he is a very great conductor. I don't recall ever having heard a finer body of tone or more effective work by the orchestra than in the Glazounoff work

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" AT THE SYMPHONY

Ballet "Poem" Given First American Performance

Orchestral Music by Mendelssohn and Glazounoff Revived

All three numbers of yesterday's Symphony Concert were new to nearly every one in the audience, though Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony is a revival, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" was composed in 1885, and first played in Boston in 1904.

Debussy's "Jeux," which is his arrangement for concert performance of music written for a danced "poem" given by the Russian Ballet in Paris and London in 1913, was first played in Paris in 1914. The audience yesterday found it so very novel that only a few youthful enthusiasts ventured to applaud the first American performance, despite the supposed vogue of Debussy in Boston.

Mr Monteux and the orchestra deserved a round of applause for an unusually brilliant performance of the extremely difficult music even from those who found it only a disagreeable noise. Mr Monteux, who conducted the original performances of the ballet, consulted frequently with the composer and is thus in a position to give an authoritative reading. The vehemence of the "saving remnant," much of it in the second balcony "rush seats," compelled him to bow repeatedly, and possibly persuaded him that the pains spent on preparation were not wasted after all.

Shows Mastery of Technique

It is impossible to judge such music as "Jeux" finally from a single hearing. Debussy here as always uses the orchestra as a single instrument whose technique he has mastered. In "Jeux" it would be as absurd to separate his orchestra into "strings, woodwind, brass and percussion" for purposes of analysis as it would be to divide the keyboard of a modern pianoforte into four sections in order to talk about piano style.

He writes for orchestra as effectively as he writes for piano, always securing precisely the effect he desires with the greatest possible economy of means. He has a similar mastery of the technique of composition. For example, he knows how to weave rhythms into a well developed climax. In "Jeux" he seems to have substituted this rhythmic development for the orthodox thematic development. The themes are fragmentary, and not melodic at all according to received notions of melody, which are, of course, based on precedent rather than on any scientific principle.

Technical skill, however great, will not make a masterpiece, but there is genuine imaginative power and emotional intensity back of the skill displayed in "Jeux." The piece is more daringly dissonant than Stravinsky's "Firebird," played at a recent concert. It proves that Debussy went on developing as a composer up to his very last years. The reputed sterility of his later works may prove, as has been the case with Beethoven, to be in the Debussy's "Jeux" would seem to be a case in point. The scenario which it is designed to accompany is not in itself of striking character, and the music suffers from this lack of definite mood. It is fanciful; it contains many novel effects of color; it bears the imprint of a master of harmonic and orchestral resources and undoubtedly in conjunction with the stage action it elucidates the somewhat slender plot of the ballet. As music pure and simple, however, it is difficult to catch its meaning. Of striking themes there are none, and in it we fail to perceive the Debussy of "L'Après-Midi d'un Faune," of the "Sea Pieces."

The performance was a remarkably fine one. Such music must be played with the delicacy and clarity of Mozart. Mr. Monteux undoubtedly excels in such music and is able to impart his enthusiasm for it to the orchestra.

Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" is a welcome addition to the repertory. The orchestration is brilliant and there are several impressive climaxes.

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony was heard again after many years of neglect. While it in no way compares with the "Scotch" or "Italian" symphonies, it proved a welcome change. The scherzo still has the power to charm. The finale is sonorous even in these days of imposing orchestral masses. Some speak slightingly of Mendelssohn's music, yet there are few composers who have equaled it in fineness of workmanship, in exquisite sense of proportion, or elegance of style. It was not in Mendelssohn's power to express the deeper emotions, yet in grace and fancy there are few to compare with him.

Although not quite half of the Symphony concerts have as yet been given, and it is as yet too soon to form any just estimate of Mr. Monteux as a conductor, it is yet possible to take note of certain characteristics of his work. When Mr. Monteux came last year to conduct a few concerts at the beginning of the season, he found the orchestra in a low state of efficiency. During those few weeks he succeeded in reorganizing the orchestra and in restoring many of its past virtues. The public immediately realized that he was expert in all matters pertaining to orchestral technic, but it did not have time to judge of his capacities as an interpreter and programmaker.

At the present time, however, it is a pleasure to note the steady progress which the orchestra has made under his skillful leadership and the interesting character and variety of his programs. Mr. Monteux is apparently interested in the music of all schools. In the course of the past 10 programs we have heard music of all styles presented with unfailing care and sympathy. We have heard several novelties, yet the old and tried has not been neglected. Mr. Monteux shuns the spectacular. He is modest and unassuming, yet, as the concerts have succeeded one another, the power of his quiet but whole-hearted devotion to a high artistic ideal is being felt more and more. The remaining concerts of the season will be looked forward to with all the greater pleasure because of the feeling of confidence and respect which his sincerity of purpose has inspired.

MUSIC

Music by the Boston Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its tenth program on January 2. The following pieces were played:

Mendelssohn....."Reformation" Symphony
Debussy....."Jeux" (play) a danced poem
Glazounoff....."Stenka Razine"

Debussy's piece was played for the first time in Boston. Glazounoff's symphonic poem was played for the first time at these concerts.

It is the present fashion to turn symphonic poems into ballets and ballets into symphonic poems. It is a matter of opinion whether or not the music does not suffer in either case. Still, the symphonic work transferred to the theater is the less likely of the two to lose in effectiveness. Designed without thought of pantomime, scenery, or dramatic action, the addition of these elements, while tending to distract the attention from the purely musical side of the composition, never wholly mars its beauty or clouds its meaning. On the contrary, music primarily designed to accompany and comment upon a stage scene or picture tends to lose in effectiveness when transported to the concert room. Phrases and motives which most aptly intensify and illustrate a dramatic situation are not necessarily suitable to stand on their own merits as pure music. Whereas the symphonic poem creates a mood and then allows the listener to supply the detail of the dramatic action according to the dictates of his imagination, the music of the theater is only one of the many elements which unite to produce their effect. Many passages from Wagner operas are an apparent exception and for this reason many have declared that Wagner was greater as a symphonist than as a dramatic composer. It is possible, however, that the situations to which the selections customarily played in our concert rooms serve as a commentary, are so familiar to the average concert goer that he unconsciously supplies the atmosphere of the theater from [illegible]house of his past impressions to be established for this occupation.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST HEARING DEBUSSY'S 'JEUX'

Pierre Monteux's reading of Debussy's "Jeux" (Play) and the excellent work of the orchestra [illegible] first hearing of the number, featured the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. It's a question if Debussy himself, could he have heard the playing, would not have declared that conductor and orchestra are wonderful. Certainly they brought out everything possible in the number; in fact, apparently imparted interest where, a first hearing would seem to indicate, there was too little foundation. It gives the impression of the composer being out of his element, writing of something he lacked sympathy with.

It's safe to predict Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony will be permitted another long slumber after this week's concerts. On the other hand the welcome accorded Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," indicates a frequent hearing.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

10TH CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Work Has First Place on Program

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" ANOTHER FEATURE

By PHILIP HALE

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." "Jeux" was performed probably for the first time in this country. Glazounoff's tone-poem, first performed here at one of Mr. Lang's "Chickering Production Concerts" in 1904, was heard yesterday for the first time at a Symphony concert.

Mendelssohn's symphony was new to the great majority of the audience. The first performance in America was at a Handel and Haydn concert in 1868, the year that the score was published. Mendelssohn evidently did not think much of his work, for he did not wish it published during his lifetime, nor did he like to hear of performances. The Harvard Musical Association played the Symphony in 1868 and in later years gave three performances of the Scherzo. There were at least two performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the last was in 1886, if we are not mistaken. The Scherzo was played here twice by Theodore Thomas's orchestra.

The reason for this neglect is not far to seek: The music is for the most part perfunctory and deadly dull. The only measures of interest in the first movement are those of the "Dresden Amen," used years afterward by Wagner in "Parsifal." The Scherzo shines by contrast with the other movements; it is suave, graceful, eminently Mendelssohnian in its scherzo character. The andante is as sentimental as the most sentimental of the "Songs Without Words." The treatment of Luther's choral, "A Safe Stronghold," is not impressive, and the finale with its pedestrian counterpoint might have been written by some English doctor of music for his oratorio "Jeroboam" or "Keren-happuch." Mr. Monteux and his merry men did their best to make the dry bones live, but only the Scherzo gave pleasure. Still it was worth while to revive the symphony, if only to show what arid music could be written by a composer of certain romantic and charming works.

Debussy's music was sadly in need of the stage effects and the miming of the dancers. It was written for a singular ballet. The composer, it is said, was greatly harassed by the demands of Nijinsky. Here again a filmed representation of the ballet displayed yesterday might have "explained" and emphasized the music, but the audience would probably have strained eyes, not ears. As a concert work, "Jeux" interests by its orchestral tints and demi-tints; its instrumental combinations and contrasts; and at times harmonic progressions, unusual even in Debussy's other compositions, arrest attention; but away from the theatre, "Jeux" cannot be ranked with earlier music by Debussy. There is a paucity of ideas; the suggestion that a composer was endeavoring to imitate Debussy and succeeded only in aping certain mannerisms, certain tricks of idiom. Mr. Monteux, who had conducted the ballet in Paris and London, no doubt yesterday again saw the stage, Nijinsky and the two young women. To him this music had significance. The performance was brilliant.

Glazounoff wrote his "Stenka Razin" when he was 20 years old; when he was ...ar...c; when he was imbued ...ional spirit; when Balakireff ...sky-Korsakoff had hope of him ...cessor. Crude as "Stenka Rasin" ...tain respects, it is to be pre... the academic works of Glazou... ...o became Germanized, and ...th fatal fluency and painful ...sm. The wildness and au... the opening descriptive of ... with the use of the barge... ...g; the oriental coloring of the ...ortraying the adored but ill... ...ncess; these console one for ...es of artless padding, measures ...which Glazounoff merely treads water (in the marvellous Volga) and for the comparative tameness of Stenka's music, tame in spite of the strenuous endeavor. And so "Stenka Razin" is today a work that gave rich promise not to be fulfilled. It is said that a few years ago this music was used for a ballet in Russia. How was the scenario arranged? Was the dancing all on Stenka's boat?

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program for Jan. 16, 17, is as follows: Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, op. 21 (first time in Boston), Songs with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; Schumann, "Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less" and "Leave Me in His Arms Endearing"; Schubert, "Erlking"; Wagner, Funeral march and Immolation scene from "The Dusk of the Gods." Margaret Matzenauer will be the singer.

TENNIS AS PLAYED BY SYMPHONY

Debussy's Ballet Is Heard—Three Novelties on List

BY OLIN DOWNES

Should the sporting editor of the Post have attended the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and reported the matter in his own inimitable style? A leading feature of the programme was Debussy's music for the ballet "Jeux" ("Play"), which was mimed on the stage in Paris, May 15, 1913, by dancers in tennis costume. But Mr. Monteux did not conduct with a racquet, therefore the present scribe takes up his accustomed pen.

FOR FIRST TIME HERE

This music of Debussy was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Monteux conducted the premiere of the stage work in Paris, when the famous Nijinsky was the man tennis player and the two girls were Mmes. Karsovina and Schollar. The game as mimed on the Paris stage was a cute if not exactly open-air and sportsmanlike affair, and Mr. Nijinsky is held responsible—he has a waggish disposition—for the statement to the press that "All Sorts (apologies to Mr. Newton Newkirk!) is the ballet—'tis a broad vista, The Dance of Rockefeller at Golf." The mounted ballet in a polo game and the rhythmic swivel, side-step and swat of the 'Ballet du box.' But it would take another Wagner to compose the music for an affair of gorgeous Amazons in the crunch and scrap and rough and tumble of the 'Ballet de Furore du Football.'"

O well! Tennis is not the strangest thing to have inspired musical composers. Richard Strauss wrote of a flock of baa-ing sheep in his "Don Quixote," and in another place in the same work of a windmill, and in "Salome" of the dropping of blood and in "Electric" of the lashing of whips and other elevating things.

Unlike Debussy

Debussy has lightly suggested the click of the racquets, the soft impact and bounce of the tennis balls, and there are passages of playful fancy and humor in the music. The opening and close are poetic. The situation on the stage was a game of tennis, as evening fell, which developed into a scene of coquetry and love between the man and the two girls. At the last "a tennis ball falls at their feet; surprised and frightened, they go bounding away, and disappear in the depths of the nocturnal park."

First impressions of a first performance may well be discounted, so far as accuracy and conclusiveness are concerned. But first impressions are what a reviewer is expected to write down, and sometimes these first impressions are fully as reliable and much more vivid than later ones. Be it said here, then, that this music of Debussy, as a whole, seems forced, unoriginal, without very much organic quality and about as far-fetched as the artificial and sophisticated scenario of the ballet for which it was written.

Borrows From Stravinsky

And, furthermore, this is no longer the actual Debussy. This is Debussyized Stravinsky. The score is redolent of the Stravinsky of the exquisite music for the ballet, "The Firebird," and the willingness with which Debussy has here helped himself to Stravinsky's instrumental scheme and to a number of the pet harmonic mannerisms of the celebrated Russian appears merely another proof of the waning creative powers of the Frenchman in the last years of his career, when his invention was getting more and more feeble, as his workmanship increased in ingenuity and dexterity. The day may come when a tennis game will appear poetic and legendary and inspire music of like quality. But the impression given by yesterday's performance was that of a composer extremely skilled in orchestral usage desperately in need of new ideas.

Of course there were Debussyites, for whom anything and everything the man wrote is incredibly wonderful, who applauded obstinately.

The "Reformation"

There were two other novelties on the programme. We use the word "novelty" intentionally when speaking of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, not heard in many years in Boston, and composed in 1829. To the generation present yesterday the symphony proved a novelty and a bore. Its points of interest are the execrable facility with which Mendelssohn, a youth of 20, penned this sonorous work, and the use of certain Lutheran themes, as the "Dresden Amen," which Wagner employed so significantly in "Parsifal," written years later than the Reformation Symphony, and the theme of the Lutheran choral, "Ein feste Burg." The use of the "Dresden Amen" is striking in this: It recurs three times in the first movement, twice in the introduction and once again toward the end of the movement; it has always the same instrumentation—the violins—and the impression on the ear—we do not know the score—is that it reappears in the same key.

"Ein feste burg," employed by so many composers, is intoned in the last movement as a melodic phrase without harmony, then with more and more of the wind instruments added, as the voices first of a choir, then of a congregation, might take up such a melody. And the rest is glib Mendelssohnism. The scherzo is especially characteristic in the most conventional manner. But it is only just to the composer to say that Mendelssohn himself did not care to have this symphony published nor to discuss it. It was published after his death as a posthumous work.

Interesting Tone Poem

By far the most interesting music on the programme was Glazounoff's early symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," after the story of the dreaded pirate of the 17th century in Russia, a terror to the countryside, who, sailing on the Volga, saw one day that capture by pursuers was inevitable. Seated in splendor on the deck of his vessel was his mistress, a captive Persian princess. She had told her companions of a dream that Stenka was killed, that she was drowned in the Volga.

And this dream came true. The pursuers of the Czar came nearer. The chieftain said to his comrades, "Never, during all my 30 years of my going up and down Mother Volga, have I made her a gift. Today I shall give her what is in my eyes the most precious of earthly treasures." He threw the princess into the Volga, and with his followers rushed on the soldiers of the Czar.

Full of Color and Force

The celebrated folk-song of the Volga boatmen predominates in this work. There is a savage phrase for Stenka Razine, and a seductive melody, gorgeously instrumentated, for the princess. There is the thought of the flowing Volga, of approaching conflict. The princess tells her tale. At the end the Volga theme is chanted wildly by instruments of brass through orchestral tumult.

The music is full of color and force. This is not a mature work. Themes are developed in a fragmentary way, form is none too clear, the musical thought is not enchained. Although themes are repeated they do not lead, inevitably, one into another. And yet the music has real force, imagination, fantasy, and it should be often heard. It has the true creative quality; it is of Russian imagination, and is incomparably superior in these characteristics to later and much more highly polished compositions which Glazounoff turned out in older and more polite days. The reason for this is that even in art, where so much attention must be paid to beauty and durability of workmanship, the vision and the intention of a creative nature hold first place, and questions of technic and even of esthetics are secondary.

NOVELTIES ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

By FRED J. McISAAC.

It seems there are still fine works by great authors to be presented for the first time at Boston Smyphony concerts. Yesterday we heard a tone poem by Glazounoff entitled "Stenka Razine" and Debussy's "Jeux," a ballet written to an idea of Nijinsky's.

There was also the not very familiar "Reformation" symphony by Mendelssohn, a work based on one or two Lutheran hymns and distinguished by the rotund and sonorous treatment to be expected from Mentelssohn.

"Jeux" is Debussy at his least inspiration. Murmurs, twitters, squeaks, frank discords played softly, rare snatches of melody, a general impression of prelude which never resolves into anything substantial. With Nijinsky jumping about on a stage it might be more interesting. There is nothing but praise for the Russian tone poem. It begins with that wonderful song of the Volga boatmen treated in the most imaginative manner and it runs a riot of fire, fury and brilliancy. Not for one second are you bored.

Ballet music is Monteux's specia... metier. When he plays it he is ... very great conductor. I don't reca... ever having heard a finer body of ton... or more effective work by the o... chestra than in the Glazounoff wor...

DEBUSSY'S "JEUX" AT THE SYMPHONY

Ballet "Poem" Given First American Performance

Orchestral Music by Mendelssohn and Glazounoff Revived

All three numbers of yesterday's Symphony Concert were new to nearly every one in the audience, though Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony is a revival, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" was composed in 1885, and first played in Boston in 1904.

Debussy's "Jeux," which is his arrangement for concert performance of music written for a danced "poem" given by the Russian Ballet in Paris ...d London in 1913, was first played in ...ris in 1914. The audience yesterday ...nd it so very novel that only a few ...uthful enthusiasts ventured to ap... ...ud the first American performance, ...pite the supposed vogue of Debussy ...Boston.

...r Monteux and the orchestra deserved ...round of applause for an unusually ...liant performance of the extremely ...ficult music even from those who ...nd it only a disagreeable noise. Mr ...onteux, who conducted the original ...rformances of the ballet, consulted ...quently with the composer and is thus ... a position to give an authoritative ...ading. The vehemence of the "saving ...mnant," much of it in the second bal... ...my "rush seats," compelled him to ...w repeatedly, and possibly persuaded ...m that the pains spent on preparation ...ere not wasted after all.

...hows Mastery of Technique

...t is impossible to judge such music ... "Jeux" finally from a single hearing. ...bussy here as always uses the or... ...estra as a single instrument whose ...hnique he has mastered. In "Jeux" ...would be as absurd to separate his ...hestra into "strings, woodwind. ...ss and percussion" for purposes of ...lysis as it would be to divide the ...board of a modern pianoforte into ... sections in order to talk about ...io style.

... writes for orchestra as effectively ...e writes for piano, always securing ...isely the effect he desires with the ...test possible economy of means. He ... similar mastery of the technique ...mposition. For example, he knows ...to weave rhythms into a well de... ...ed climax. In "Jeux" he seems to ... substituted this rhythmic develop... for the orthodox thematic de... ...ment. The themes are fragmen... and not melodic at all according ...ceived notions of melody, which ...f course, based on precedent rather ...on any scientific principle.

...nical skill, however great, will ...lake a masterpiece, but there is ...he imaginative power and emo... intensity back of the skill dis... in "Jeux." The piece is more ...ly dissonant than Stravinsky's ...ird," played at a recent concert. ...ves that Debussy went on de... ...g as a composer up to his very ...ears. The reputed sterility of ...er works may prove, as has been ...e with Beethoven, to be in the ...work. When Mr. Monteux came last ...year to conduct a few concerts at the beginning of the season, he found the orchestra in a low state of efficiency. During those few weeks he succeeded in reorganizing the orchestra and in restoring many of its past virtues. The public immediately realized that he was expert in all matters pertaining to orchestral technic, but it did not have time to judge of his capacities as an interpreter and programmaker.

At the present time, however, it is a pleasure to note the steady progress which the orchestra has made under his skillful leadership and the interesting character and variety of his programs. Mr. Monteux is apparently interested in the music of all schools. In the course of the past 10 programs we have heard music of all styles presented with unfailing care and sympathy. We have heard several novelties, yet the old and tried has not been neglected. Mr. Monteux shuns the spectacular. He is modest and unassuming, yet, as the concerts have succeeded one another, the power of his quiet but whole-hearted devotion to a high artistic ideal is being felt more and more. The remaining concerts of the season will be looked forward to with all the greater pleasure because of the feeling of confidence and respect which his sincerity of purpose has inspired.

MUSIC

Music by the Boston Orchestra

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its tenth program on January 2. The following pieces were played:

Mendelssohn....."Reformation" Symphony
Debussy....."Jeux" (play) a danced poem
Glazounoff....."Stenka Razine"

Debussy's piece was played for the first time in Boston. Glazounoff's symphonic poem was played for the first time at these concerts.

It is the present fashion to turn symphonic poems into ballets and ballets into symphonic poems. It is a matter of opinion whether or not the music does not suffer in either case. Still, the symphonic work transferred to the theater is the less likely of the two to lose in effectiveness. Designed without thought of pantomime, scenery, or dramatic action, the addition of these elements, while tending to distract the attention from the purely musical side of the composition, never wholly mars its beauty or clouds its meaning. On the contrary, music primarily designed to accompany and comment upon a stage scene or picture tends to lose in effectiveness when transported to the concert room. Phrases and motives which most aptly intensify and illustrate a dramatic situation are not necessarily suitable to stand on their own merits as pure music. Whereas the symphonic poem creates a mood and then allows the listener to supply the detail of the dramatic action according to the dictates of his imagination, the music of the theater is only one of the many elements which unite to produce the effect. Many passages from Wagner operas are an apparent exception and for this reason many have declared that Wagner was greater as a symphonist than as a dramatic composer. It is possible, however, that the situations to which the selections customarily played in our concert rooms serve as a commentary, are so familiar to the average concert goer that he unconsciously supplies the atmosphere of the theater from ...house of his past impressions to be established for this occupation.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIRST HEARING DEBUSSY'S 'JEUX'

Pierre Monteux's reading of Debussy's "Jeux" (Play) and the excellent work of the orchestra, being Boston's first hearing of the number, featured the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. It's a question if Debussy himself could he have heard the playing, would not have declared that conductor and orchestra are wonderful. Certainly they brought out everything possible in the number, in fact, apparently imparted interest where, a first hearing would seem to indicate, there was too little foundation. It gives the impression of the composer being out of his element, writing of something he lacked sympathy with.

It's safe to predict Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony will be permitted another long slumber after this week's concerts. On the other hand the welcome accorded Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," indicates a frequent hearing.

Feature of Symphony Slav Poem

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Mendelssohn. Reformation Symphony, D minor
Debussy. "Jeux." A Ballet.
Glazounoff. "Stenka Razine." Symphonic Poem

WHOLLY orchestral and the first half very tame. What on earth was in M. Monteux's mind when he resuscitated the very watery Reromration Symphony? Mendelssohn himself, after directing it a single time, never tried it again. Habeneck rehearsed it in Paris and laid it aside without a performance. It was a made-to-order work without any inspiration. Written to celebrate the 300th anniversary of the establishment of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, in 1930, but not performed until two years later because of political agitation in Germany, it was about as dead, after its single performance, as Mendelssohn's opera, "Camacho's Wedding," which, by the way, was resuscitated in Boston, for one single and very boresome performance.

The first movement presents two themes in conflict, portraying Catholic and Protestant, and one might apply to the Reformation Symphony the sarcasm which Saphir pointed at "The Huguenots"—"The Catholics and Protestants kill each other in it, and the Jews make music to it!" We have infinitely greater tumults in modern music. It is merely a very feeble imitation of the combative style of the Heroic symphony, the Protestant theme being the well-known "Dresden Amen." But the scherzo is better.

Advertisement.

Cocoanut Oil Fine For Washing Hair

If you want to keep your hair in good condition, be careful what you

In fact, it is the only part of the work worth preserving and we could have forgiven M. Monteux if he had played this movement only.

Mendelssohn was the prince of scherzo writers and there is a genial-ity here that makes it worth while, although it is not nearly so fine as the Scotch Symphony scherzo. It is in the conventional song-form with trio shape and the three-quarter rhythm which Beethoven established for the earliest forms of this movement. There is no regular slow movement in this symphony unless we take the little, diluted song-form which follows the scherzo as a movement, which it is not.

The finale presents a very carefully prepared lesson in counterpoint. It has much fugal work on a very clear subject, which is derived from the great Lutheran chorale—"A Strong Castle Is Our Lord." Now this chorale was the very embodiment of the Reformation, its actual war-cry, and it was very fitting that Mendelssohn should bring it in. But it was not fitting that, to make a gradual crescendo, he should begin the finale by tootling this grand theme on the flute alone! When Wagner used it in the Kaiser March he thundered it out on trombones.

Mendelssohn loved the flute and even tried to imitate its ancient use in "Oh Be Gracious, ye Immortals," in "St. Paul," but certainly he never made a more unfiting use of it than in the beginning of this finale. The counterpoint which follows is correct but uninspired, and the whole work shows that Mendelssohn could not rise to the height of his subject. Let the symphony rest.

We get something of the highest class of dance music in almost every one of M. Monteux's programs. This is nothing to complain of, on the contrary, it gives spice and variety to the concerts. "Jeux" was written as a ballet for M. Diaghileff and its action was divised by M. Nijinski. Thus it was given in Paris. But it was also given there as a concert selection, and it was on this occasion, although it requires more of imagination to follow its meaning in this guise.

Like much of Debussy's music, it juggles with rythm and gives more of suggestion than of worked out ideas. But we can imagine a degree of fitness to this setting of a tennis flirtation to music, we can fancy the bounding of the balls over the hedge, and the youth carrying out the difficult task of making love simultaneously to two maidens is pictured with appropriately tangled rythms. The subdivision of the strings suggests a Gallic "Waldesweben." The percussive instruments are often employed, however, to acent rythms that might otherwise be difficult to follow. In short, this is more comprehensible than the composer's picture of the Sea or of the unhappy Faun. It runs the gamut from languor to frenzy and its picture of "Amore a tre" is sufficiently amorous. It is osmetimes more emphatic and powerful than one expects of Debussey, but what would a tenis game be without a racket! It was very calmly received by the audience.

Much the best work of the concert was its last number, Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." Two of its three themes in fine contrast to each other, the brief barbaric one which pictures Stenka himself, and the tender, languishing one which portrays the Persian princess. But better than these is the Volga boatsmen's song, a theme which has in it all the simplicity, sadness, yet strength of Old Russia. Its weird monotony permeates the entire work and it gives a sombre dignity to the whole symphonic poem that is indescribably characteristic. It is Russian to the core.

Stenka battles with the river, and the contest is well portrayed, and the Volga and its mighty theme win the victory and the princess besides. Even the Kettlechums had a mighty share in developing the Volga theme and at the end the whole of the boatsmen's song rang out in a fierce climax, as if the river had swept everything before it. The work was a glorification of the mighty Volga, rather than of the pussy mortals upon it.

* * *

Josef Rosenblatt, who appeared in a Symphony Hall song recital last Sunday, repeated his triumph of last Spring. A year ago he showed a vocal force and a poignant intensity of expression that carried an instant suggestion of Caruso.

Not content with this, howe Rosenblatt has now invaded th vate preserves of John Mc by entering the field of song. He sang "The H in a somewhat pre though no

Advertisement

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

UNANTICIPATED PLEASURES FROM MENDELSSOHN

The Resurrection of His "Reformation Symphony" Proves No Rattling of Dry Bones—Mr. Heifetz Outdoes Himself in Bach's Chaconne and Then Takes Refuge Into Routine — Miss Baird as Expert Young Pianist—Ysaye and Elman to Be Heard Together

BOTH to lay and expert listeners at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" distinctly belied expectations. Scarcely a hearer, unless he were uncommonly ripe in years and retentive of memory, could have had any clear recollection of the music. It was three and thirty years since it had been played in Boston; not by one chance in a thousand, nowadays, was the persistent wanderer of concert halls likely to have heard it, either in Europe or in America. Nearly everyone, moreover, who dared to anticipate the performance gave the symphony a bad name. Mendelssohn himself had never really liked it, had withheld it from publication through his life. Picked from his papers in the sixties, it had then been played merely as a curiosity, quickly falling from "active" repertories. The very biographers and commentators were shy of it. Never had Mr. Monteux made so futile a resurrection. So forth and so onward. Yet at both concerts, from the sophisticated and exacting of Saturday evening no less than from the easygoing and incurious of Friday afternoon, more applause answered Mendelssohn of the "Reformation Symphony" than rewarded Debussy for "Jeux" or Glazunov for "Stenka Razin."

Needless, almost, to say, this "Reformation Symphony" is no perennial masterpeice like Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while outside the Scherzo there is no place in it for the grace of fancy and of handiwork that keeps his overtures of Scottish seas and Scottish islands still pleasurable. Yet, in the comparisons of memory, while the "Scotch" and the "Italian" symphonies may at moments rise higher, they wither not less often, in the ears of 1920, into without a hint of [illegible] movement at the beginning of the Reformation Symphony." The ensuing Allegro played as warmly and vividly as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it, still strikes dramatic fire. In fact, it was hard to recall Mendelssohn so ardent in tonal conflict, so vigorous of tonal tumult, so minded to catch the hearer into the full-voiced march of his music. His Lutherans have clearly gone crusading, with the soft "Amen" of Dresden—and of "Parsifal"—to bless them; and more than a whiff of their fire touches the composer. The Scherzo is charming, alike in the play of melodies and rhythms, in the brightening harmonies, in the pretty strokes of instrumental color. Not until he enters upon the Finale and his Lutherans seem to begin a footless promenade of the streets of Augsburg, does Mendelssohn become dry, mechanical, empty. About and about to a pedestrian fugato march his whilom crusaders—and no fruitless use of "Ein' Feste Burg" and no pompous "Maestoso" will save them from futility. The legend is that Mendelssohn buried the "Reformatory Symphony," dreading comparison with the Meyerbeer of "The Huguenots" But only in this Finale does Felix of Berlin drop to the level of Jacob of Paris. Once more Mr. Monteux has not rattled dry bones in vain. Rather he set tonal flesh and blood upon them.

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BALLET-MUSIC AND A PERPLEXED AUDIENCE

With the Best Will in the World, Debussy's "Jeux" Puzzles It, Like Similar Pieces of the Season — A Piece, None the Less, of Rare and Subtle Quality, with Many a Mark of the Composer's Later Years—Sensuous Charm and Sophisticated Workmanship — The Contrasts of "Stenka Razin"

A BOLD, brave man within his quiet bearing and gentle speech, Mr. Monteux dares to ask of his hearers imagination and, in the case of Debussy's "Jeux," an imagination particularly difficult for them to summon. The Bostonian public, in or out of the Symphony Concerts, is not familiar with the ballet as the Russians of Mr. Diaghilev have long cultivated it. Their pictorial fantasies and graphic mimodramas it knows only by the scant fruition of fifteen performances nearly four years ago and now fast receding in even retentive memories. It may yet recall enough of the action that Fokine and Bakst set to a patchwork of music from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," to find the recollection troublesome when that glowing and impassioned Symphonic Suite is played in the concert-hall as the composer put it to paper. A few minds may still visualize the personages and the progress of "The Fire-Bird" in the theatre, when the sound of Stravinsky's music from Mr. Monteux and the orchestra blows into thin flame this or that smouldering memory. A few more, perhaps, may set Bakst's tower of molten red, Mr. Bolm's figure of the fated wayfarer, as pale and sombre as some spectre of old ballad, the barbaric garb and the barbaric dances of Thamar's train, as background to Balakirev's tone-poem, heard as symphonic piece. There, recalling of a visible stage, aglow with color, with action, halts as necessary handmaid to the ballet-music played at the Symphony Concerts since Mr. Monteux took command of them. Dukas's "Peri," which he included in his programmes of has never been set upon the stage in America and none too often represented in Paris. Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," more recently played at Symphony Hall, unknown to the American theatre; while Debussy's "Jeux," heard yesterday at the Symphony Concert, vanished from the repertory of the Russian Ballet itself after no more than six or eight performances divided between Paris and London.

With these three pieces, the sympathetic hearer, unless he has stumbled upon them in some European journey, must set sparks to his imagination from no better flint and steel than prefatory "arguments," printed description, and chance photographs and drawings. At best, there are no very brisk kindling in comparison with memories of actual and graphic performance; while to many a willing imagination they are quite cold and lifeless. As practised conductor of ballet and opera, long in the [illegible] cities.

service of the Russians themselves, Mr. Monteux possesses this visualizing faculty. By the same token, he may forget how relatively rare it is among his hearers. It is quite true that, more or less remotely, Dukas anticipated the performance of "The Peri," Stravinsky the performance of "The Fire-Bird," and Debussy, the performance of "Jeux" as symphonic pieces in the concert-hall. It is as true, however, that when they were designing, moulding and coloring their music, the were at work upon it as music of theatre to clothe, sustain and enhance a visible and illusory action, to be within a decorative and atmospheric frame. Exactly as the composer of an opera in the modern sense of the word must write many a page in order to "get on" with the dramatic narrative, so the composer of a ballet or a mimo-drama, again in the current fashion, must put more or less notes to music-paper merely to point the details of a pre-determined action.

Such measures, often brief, but not always few, are sure to sound empty and meaningless in the concert-hall. In "Jeux" they are not many; but they are also easily recognizable; while for the moment they jolt the hearer out of the atmosphere the music is weaving out of the illusion it is summoning, out even of its progress and continuity as a symphonic web. Moreover, these passages, aside, there is no questioning the fact that music for a ballet or music for a mimodrama, unless it be prettily decorated, elementary dance-tunes, as in Chaikovsky's "Nut-Cracker," is little more than half itself unless it is accompanied by the action and framed by the settings for which it was written. Tone-poem or no tone-poem, imagination or no imagination in the hearer, the analogy of a play of the spoken word holds good. A piece for the theatre is a piece within the theatre or otherwise only its diminished and relatively lifeless self. For no other reason, "The Peri," "Salome's Tragedy," in measure "The Fire-Bird" and now "Jeux" have all failed as symphonic pieces to impress, perhaps to interest, the average hearer in Symphony Hall. It is mere irritation to call him dull and stupid; often indeed he has tried his best to visualize the action that the music should clothe. It is rank injustice to lay blame upon Mr. Monteux, since in such music he excels even his usually able self. The fate of such ventures, unless they be made upon an audience to which the visualization of the ballet or the mimodrama has become second nature, is intrinsic in the ventures themselves. Even the most eloquent fragments of Wagner's music-dramas suffer when they are wrenched from operatic foreground, background and actuality and played detachedly in the concert-hall. How ill, then, may the less familiar, the more intricate, the more subtly delineative music for the theatre of Dukas, Strawinsky and Debussy bear such transfer!

The interest and the pleasure of "Jeux," in performance as a tone-poem of the concert-room was, therefore, an interest and a pleasure for the sophisticated, the studious and the curious. They deserve their inning at the Symphony Concerts, no less than do those who prefer more transparent and elementary satisfactions from the music they hear. These connoisseurs were amply and unely rewarded; not a few will return this evening to hear "Jeux" anew; and in such response Mr. Monteux may well find compensation for the pains he spent in preparation of the performance, for the hopes he cherished of it. Through no shortcoming of conductor or orchestra, who indeed surpassed themselves with the music, did Debussy's ballet remain "Caviare to the general." Rather, to semi-prepared, readily responsive and finely sensitive hearers, it gave immediate and keen delight. There is no mistaking, for example, the loveliness of the music that, at the beginning and again at the end, evokes the solitude, the mystery, of the empty garden by night. A few measures—such is Debussy's economy and concentration of means—weave atmosphere and atmosphere of fantasy. Again, there is no questioning the beauty of the music when Debussy's threads of motivs, ever winding and unwinding, ever parting and wining, of a sudden coalesce into a few measures of sustained, diaphanous, exquisitely sensuous melody, garlanded with shimmering arabesques of harmony, swimming in iridescent instrumental colors.

For "eux" is no ballet of sport, of tennis. Near the beginning of the action a ball, which never was and never could be a tennis-ball, falls into the garden from nowhere. At the end, a similar ball similarly descends. One One mime carries a racquet and puts it by, as Jean de Rezzké used to doff his hat, as soon as ever he can. No Debussy's music is concerned with the sensuous impulses, the amorous play, the little piques and the little coquetries of a boy and two girls in an empty garden, in the intoxication of a fair midsummer night and of their own wanton promptings. The music when it sounds like a mere succession of harmonic, instrumental rhythmic points, is tremulous with these youthful and sensuous quiverings. When it spins itself into the finest of tonal threads, it seems to undulate to these amorous impulses. When, for a moment, it sustains itself in clearly melodic measures, it is warm and bright with this playful passion. As some will have it, Debussy is minded here and there to mock these youthful amorists. Possibly, though these ironies are easy to detect, except when he gently mocks the pique of one or the other pouting girl.

Much more easy for the practised ear to discover is the intricacy and the sophistication of the music. Hardliy anywhere else, even in these later pieces, has Debussy so divided and sub-divided both his motives and his orchestra, so delicately and dexterously interwoven his melodies and counter-melodies, been so light and adroit of harmonic and instrumental stroke, fanciful of arabesque, subtle of rhythmic suggestion. If in his younger days he wrote music in iridescent stream, now he writes a music that seems all gleaming, titillating points. Yet, by these means, he gains, even in the concert-room, not merely illusion of time, place and personages, but of the very impulses stirring from instant to instant in them. He has written in "Jeux" not only a music of subtle and shimmering fantasy, but also a music of penetrating sensuous charm and at instants of warm sensuous beauty. The keener the charm and the brighter the beauty because at moments it is bittersweet. Rarely, and only rarely, has he fallen into the temptation of such a score, which is to write music for eye on the engraved page rather than for ear in the concert-hall.

The contrasting piece, as the movie programmes like to say—contrasting, besides, in more senses than one was Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," written in the days in which ancient Russian legend kindled his imagination and old Russian folk melody stimulated his invention. In tones, he would retell the tale of the brigand, who sailed the Volga and strode its bank pillaging and harrying alike on land and water. In time came the day of reckoning, when the troops of the Czar pressed upon Razin and his outlaws. Upon the Volga, the mighty Volga, he bethought himself, he had long flourished, yet had he bestowed nothing upon the river. Into the stream forthwith he cast his fair Persian mistress. As though the might of the river renewed their might, his men then and there beat back the threatening minions of "law and order." A pleasant, a piquant, a characteristically Russian tale, of which, however, Glazunov has made less in his music than there was reason to expect, alike from the promise of the material and the curious repute of the tone-poem itself. Thereon, it is the custom to say, the listened may hear the youthful, the imaginative, the vitalizing Glazunov before he came old, academical and shrunk into quasi-Teutonic grooves.

Yet, somehow, the music of "Stenka Razin" is impressive and alive only when the composer, like the brigand of his tonal tale, has to do with the Volga. There is a motive for the pirate—"short, savage, bizarre," according to the programme-book; yet in actual hearing by no means arresting to the ear, and scarcely more significant when on occasion it flashes and flails through tumultuous measures. There is motiv, likewise, for the hapless Persian princess—a motiv that becomes a melody dipped in oriental harmonies, beating to oriental rhythms, yet not quite stirring the imagination, even under elaborate "working," as do Rimsky-Korsakov's magical eastern measures. There is also a motiv of the Volga—no other than the folk-tune, rising, falling, swelling, vanishing, of the drudging, trudging boatmen. It seizes the ear, penetrates the admiration, enkindles Glazunov, dominates the tone-poem. Again and again it recurs, and at each return it bourgeons into music pictorial of the great and glowing river or voice and image of its might. True Glazunov is prone to repeat his pictures and to reiterate his imagery. But with the one he is vivid and with the other he is eloquent. Not to the glory of Stenka Razin but to the glory of the Volga runs his tone-poem, and to his own glory in the day wkhen he could still write the music of a fired composer and not of thoughtful pedagogue.

H. T. PARKER

POLITICAL BUGS

There is an invasion of these pests all over the United States. Some of our most respected citizens are bothered with them. It is rumored that Mr. Bryan has political

CONTINUING PIECES

Colonial—The Canary

PRETTY, polite [illegible] selections. [illegible]mph hy was disap-

Feature of Symphony Slav Poem

By LOUIS C. ELSON.

PROGRAM.

Mendelssohn. Reformation Symphony, D minor
Debussy. "Jeux." A Ballet.
Glazounoff. "Stenka Razine." Symphonic Poem

WHOLLY orchestral and the first half very tame. What on earth was in M. Monteux's mind when he resuscitated the very watery Reformation Symphony? Mendelssohn himself, after directing it a single time, never tried it again. Habeneck rehearsed it in Paris and laid it aside without a performance. It was a made-to-order work without any inspiration. Written to celebrate the 300th anniversary of the establishment of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, in 1930, but not performed until two years later because of political agitation in Germany, it was about as dead, after its single performance, as Mendelssohn's opera, "Camacho's Wedding," which, by the way, was resuscitated in Boston, for one single and very boresome performance.

The first movement presents two themes in conflict, portraying Catholic and Protestant, and one might apply to the Reformation Symphony the sarcasm which Saphir pointed at "The Huguenots"—"The Catholics and Protestants kill each other in it, and the Jews make music to it!" We have infinitely greater tumults in modern music. It is merely a very feeble imitation of the combative style of the Heroic symphony, the Protestant theme being the well-known "Dresden Amen." But the scherzo is better. In fact, it is the only part of the work worth preserving and we could have forgiven M. Monteux if he had played this movement only.

Mendelssohn was the prince of scherzo writers and there is a genial it here that makes it worth while, although it is not nearly so fine as the Scotch Symphony scherzo. It is in the conventional song-form with trio shape and the three-quarter rhythm which Beethoven established for the earliest forms of this movement. There is no regular slow movement in this symphony unless we take the little, diluted song-form which follows the scherzo as a movement, which it is not.

The finale presents a very carefully prepared lesson in counterpoint. It has much fugal work on a very clear subject, which is derived from the great Lutheran chorale—"A Strong Castle Is Our Lord." Now this chorale was the very embodiment of the Reformation, its actual war-cry, and it was very fitting that Mendelssohn should bring it in. But it was not fitting that, to make a gradual crescendo, he should begin the finale by tooting this grand theme on the flute alone! When Wagner used it in the Kaiser March he thundered it out on trombones.

Mendelssohn loved the flute and even tried to imitate its ancient use in "Oh Be Gracious, ye Immortals," in "St. Paul," but certainly he never made a more unfiting use of it than in the beginning of this finale. The counterpoint which follows is correct but uninspired, and the whole work shows that Mendelssohn could not rise to the height of his subject. Let the symphony rest.

We get something of the highest class of dance music in almost every one of M. Monteux's programs. This is nothing to complain of, on the contrary, it gives spice and variety to the concerts. "Jeux" was written as a ballet for M. Diaghileff and its action was divised by M. Nijinski. Thus it was given in Paris. But it was also given there as a concert selection, and it was on this occasion, although it requires more of imagination to follow its meaning in this guise.

Like much of Debussy's music, it juggles with rythm and gives more of suggestion than of worked out ideas. But we can imagine a degree of fitness to this setting of a tennis flirtation to music, we can fancy the bounding of the balls over the hedge, and the youth carrying out the difficult task of making love simultaneously to two maidens is pictured with appropriately tangled rythms. The subdivision of the strings suggests a Gallic "Waldesweben." The percussive instruments are often employed, however, to acent rythms that might otherwise be difficult to follow. In short this is more comprehensible than the composer's picture of the Sea or of the unhappy Faun. It runs the gamut from languor to frenzy and its picture of "Amore a tre" is sufficiently amorous. It is osmetimes more emphatic and powerful than one expects of Debussey, but what would a tenis game be without a racket! It was very calmly received by the audience.

Much the best work of the concert was its last number, Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." Two of its three themes in fine contrast to each other, the brief barbaric one which pictures Stenka himself, and the tender, languishing one which portrays the Persian princess. But better than these is the Volga boatsmen's song, a theme which has in it all the simplicity, sadness, yet strength of Old Russia. Its weird monotony permeates the entire work and it gives a sombre dignity to the whole symphonic poem that is indescribably characteristic. It is Russian to the core.

Stenka battles with the river, and the contest is well portrayed, and the Volga and its mighty theme win the victory and the princess besides. Even the Kettlechums had a mighty share in developing the Volga theme and at the end the whole of the boatsmen's song rang out in a fierce climax, as if the river had swept everything before it. The work was a glorification of the mighty Volga, rather than of the pussy mortals upon it.

* * *

Josef Rosenblatt, who appeared in a Symphony Hall song recital last Sunday, repeated his triumph of last Spring. A year ago he showed a vocal force and a poignant intensity of expression that carried an instant suggestion of Caruso.

Not content with this, howe Rosenblatt has now invaded th vate preserves of John Mc by entering the field of song. He sang "The P in a somewhat pre though not

Advertisement.

Cocoanut Oil Fine For Washing Hair

If you want to keep your hair in good condition, be careful what you

Advertisement

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

UNANTICIPATED PLEASURES FROM MENDELSSOHN

The Resurrection of His "Reformation Symphony" Proves No Rattling of Dry Bones—Mr. Heifetz Outdoes Himself in Bach's Chaconne and Then Takes Refuge Into Routine — Miss Baird as Expert Young Pianist—Ysaye and Elman to Be Heard Together

BOTH to lay and expert listeners at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday, Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" distinctly belied expectations. Scarcely a hearer, unless he were uncommonly ripe in years and retentive of memory, could have had any clear recollection of the music. It was three and thirty years since it had been played in Boston; not by one chance in a thousand, nowadays, was the persistent wanderer of concert halls likely to have heard it, either in Europe or in America. Nearly everyone, moreover, who dared to anticipate the performance gave the symphony a bad name. Mendelssohn himself had never really liked it, had withheld it from publication through his life. Picked from his papers in the sixties, it had then been played merely as a curiosity, quickly falling from "active" repertories. The very biographers and commentators were shy of it. Never had Mr. Monteux made so futile a resurrection. So forth and so onward. Yet at both concerts, from the sophisticated and exacting of Saturday evening no less than from the easygoing and incurious of Friday afternoon, more applause answered Mendelssohn of the "Reformation Symphony" than rewarded Debussy for "Jeux" or Glazunov for "Stenka Razin."

Needless, almost, to say, this "Reformation Symphony" is no perennial masterpeice like Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; while outside the Scherzo there is no place in it for the grace of fancy and of handiwork that keeps his overtures of Scottish seas and Scottish islands still pleasurable. Yet, in the comparisons of memory, while the "Scotch" and the "Italian" symphonies may at moments rise higher, they wither not less often, in the ears of 1920, into agreeable suggestion of stately ceremony without a hint of pomposity, in the slow movement at the beginning of the "Reformation Symphony." The ensuing Allegro played as warmly and vividly as Mr. Monteux and the orchestra played it, still strikes dramatic fire. In fact, it was hard to recall Mendelssohn so ardent in tonal conflict, so vigorous of tonal tumult, so minded to catch the hearer into the full-voiced march of his music. His Lutherans have clearly gone crusading, with the soft "Amen" of Dresden—and of "Parsifal"—to bless them; and more than a whiff of their fire touches the composer. The Scherzo is charming, alike in the play of melodies and rhythms, in the brightening harmonies, in the pretty strokes of instrumental color. Not until he enters upon the Finale and his Lutherans seem to begin a footless promenade of the streets of Augsburg, does Mendelssohn become dry, mechanical, empty. About and about to a pedestrian fugato march his whilom crusaders—and no fruitless use of "Ein' Feste Burg" and no pompous "Maestoso" will save them from futility. The legend is that Mendelssohn buried the "Reformatory Symphony," dreading comparison with the Meyerbeer of "The Huguenots". But only in this Finale does Felix of Berlin drop to the level of Jacob of Paris. Once more Mr. Monteux has not rattled dry bones in vain. Rather he set tonal flesh and blood upon them.

Symphony Concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BALLET-MUSIC AND A PERPLEXED AUDIENCE

With the Best Will in the World, Debussy's "Jeux" Puzzles It, Like Similar Pieces of the Season — A Piece, None the Less, of Rare and Subtle Quality, with Many a Mark of the Composer's Later Years—Sensuous Charm and Sophisticated Workmanship — The Contrasts of "Stenka Razin"

A BOLD, brave man within his quiet bearing and gentle speech, Mr. Monteux dares to ask of his hearers imagination and, in the case of Debussy's "Jeux," an imagination particularly difficult for them to summon. The Bostonian public, in or out of the Symphony Concerts, is not familiar with the ballet as the Russians of Mr. Diaghilev have long cultivated it. Their pictorial fantasies and graphic mimodramas it knows only by the scant fruition of fifteen performances nearly four years ago and now fast receding in even retentive memories. It may yet recall enough of the action that Fokine and Bakst set to a patchwork of music from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade;" to find the recollection troublesome when that glowing and impassioned Symphonic Suite is played in the concert-hall as the composer put it to paper. A few minds may still visualize the personages and the progress of "The Fire-Bird" in the theatre, when the sounds of Stravinsky's music from Mr. Monteux and the orchestra blows into thin flame this or that smouldering memory. A few more, perhaps, may set Bakst's tower of molten red, Mr. Bolm's figure of the fated wayfarer, as pale and sombre as some spectre of old ballad, the barbaric garb and the barbaric dances of Thamar's train, as background to Balakirev's tone-poem, heard as symphonic piece. There, recollection of a visible stage, aglow with color, alive with action, halts as necessary handmaid to the ballet-music played at the Symphony Concerts since Mr. Monteux has command of them. Dukas's "Peri," which he included in his programmes of 1919, has never been set upon the stage in America and none too often represented in Europe. Schmitt's "Tragedy of Salome," before recently played at Symphony Hall, is unknown to the American theatre; while Debussy's "Jeux," heard yesterday at the Symphony Concert, vanished from the repertory of the Russian Ballet itself after no more than six or eight performances divided between Paris and London.

With these three pieces, the sympathetic hearer, unless he has stumbled upon them in some European journey, must set sparks to his imagination from no better flint and steel than prefatory "arguments," printed description, and chance photographs and drawings. At best, there are no very brisk kindling in comparison with memories of actual and graphic performance; while to many a willing imagination they are quite cold and lifeless. As practised conductor of ballet and opera, long in the [illegible] cities, service of the Russians themselves, Mr. Monteux possesses this visualizing faculty. By the same token, he may forget how relatively rare it is among his hearers. It is quite true that, more or less remotely, Dukas anticipated the performance of "The Peri," Stravinsky the performance of "The Fire-Bird," and Debussy, the performance of "Jeux" as symphonic pieces in the concert-hall. It is as true, however, that when they were designing, moulding and coloring their music, the were at work upon it as music of theatre to clothe, sustain and enhance a visible and illusory action, to be within a decorative and atmospheric frame. Exactly as the composer of an opera in the modern sense of the word must write many a page in order to "get on" with the dramatic narrative, so the composer of a ballet or a mimo-drama, again in the current fashion, must put more or less notes to music-paper merely to point the details of a pre-determined action.

Such measures, often brief, but not always few, are sure to sound empty and meaningless in the concert-hall. In "Jeux" they are not many; but they are also easily recognizable; while for the moment they jolt the hearer out of the atmosphere the music is weaving out of the illusion it is summoning, out even of its progress and continuity as a symphonic web. Moreover, these passages, aside, there is no questioning the fact that music for a ballet or music for a mimodrama, unless it be prettily decorated, elementary dance-tunes, as in Chaikovsky's "Nut-Cracker," is little more than half itself unless it is accompanied by the action and framed by the settings for which it was written. Tone-poem or no tone-poem, imagination or no imagination in the hearer, the analogy of a play of the spoken word holds good. A piece for the theatre is a piece within the theatre or otherwise only its diminished and relatively lifeless self. For no other reason, "The Peri," "Salome's Tragedy," in measure "The Fire-Bird" and now "Jeux" have all failed as symphonic pieces to impress, perhaps to interest, the average hearer in Symphony Hall. It is mere irritation to call him dull and stupid; often indeed he has tried his best to visualize the action that the music should clothe. It is rank injustice to lay blame upon Mr. Monteux, since in such music he excels even his usually able self. The fate of such ventures, unless they be made upon an audience to which the visualization of the ballet or the mimodrama has become second nature, is intrinsic in the ventures themselves. Even the most eloquent fragments of Wagner's music-dramas suffer when they are wrenched from operatic foreground, background and actuality and played detachedly in the concert-hall. How ill, then, may the less familiar, the more intricate, the more subtly delineative music for the theatre of Dukas, Stravinsky and Debussy bear such transfer!

The interest and the pleasure of "Jeux," in performance as a tone-poem of the concert-room was, therefore, an interest and a pleasure for the sophisticated, the studious and the curious. They deserve their inning at the Symphony Concerts, no less than do those who prefer more transparent and elementary satisfactions from the music they hear. These connoisseurs were amply and timely rewarded; not a few will return this evening to hear "Jeux" anew; and in such response Mr. Monteux may well find compensation for the pains he spent in preparation of the performance, for the hopes he cherished of it. Through no shortcoming of conductor or orchestra, who indeed surpassed themselves with the music, did Debussy's ballet remain "Caviare to the general." Rather, to semi-prepared, readily responsive and timely sensitive hearers, it gave immediate and keen delight. There is no mistaking, for example, the loveliness of the music that, at the beginning and again at the end, evokes the solitude, the mystery, of the empty garden by night. A few measures—such is Debussy's economy and concentration of means—weave atmosphere and atmosphere of fantasy. Again, there is no questioning the beauty of the music when Debussy's threads of motivs, ever winding and unwinding, ever parting and twining, of a sudden coalesce into a few measures of sustained, diaphanous, exquisitely sensuous melody, garlanded with shimmering arabesques of harmony, swimming in iridescent instrumental colors.

For "eux" is no ballet of sport, of tennis. Near the beginning of the action a ball, which never was and never could be a tennis-ball, falls into the garden from nowhere. At the end, a similar ball similarly descends. One One mime carries a racquet and puts it by, as Jean de Rezzké used to doff his hat, as soon as ever he can. No Debussy's music is concerned with the sensuous impulses, the amorous play, the little piques and the little coquetries of a boy and two girls in an empty garden, in the intoxication of a fair midsummer night and of their own wanton promptings. The music when it sounds like a mere succession of harmonic, instrumental rhythmic points, is tremulous with these youthful and sensuous quiverings. When it spins itself into the finest of tonal threads, it seems to undulate to these amorous impulses. When, for a moment, it sustains itself in clearly melodic measures, it is warm and bright with this playful passion. As some will have it, Debussy is minded here and there to mock these youthful amorists. Possibly, though these ironies are easy to detect, except when he gently mocks the pique of one or the other pouting girl.

Much more easy for the practised ear to discover is the intricacy and the sophistication of the music. Hardlly anywhere else, even in these later pieces, has Debussy so divided and sub-divided both his motives and his orchestra, so delicately and dexterously interwoven his melodies and counter-melodies, been so light and adroit of harmonic and instrumental stroke, fanciful of arabesque, subtle of rhythmic suggestion. If in his younger days he wrote music in iridescent stream, now he writes a music that seems all gleaming, titillating points. Yet, by these means, he gains, even in the concert-room, not merely illusion of time, place and personages, but of the very impulses stirring from instant to instant in them. He has written in "Jeux" not only a music of subtle and shimmering fantasy, but also a music of penetrating sensuous charm and at instants of warm sensuous beauty. The keener the charm and the brighter the beauty because at moments it is bittersweet. Rarely, and only rarely, has he falen into the temptation of such a score, which is to write music for eye on the engraved page rather than for ear in the concert-hall

The contrasting piece, as the movie programmes like to say—contrasting, besides, in more senses than one was Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin," written in the days in which ancient Russian legend kindled his imagination and old Russian folk melody stimulated his invention. In tones, he would retell the tale of the brigand, who sailed the Volga and strode its bank pillaging and harrying alike on land and water. In time came the day of reckoning, when the troops of the Czar pressed upon Razin and his outlaws. Upon the Volga, the mighty Volga, he bethought himself, he had long flourished, yet had he bestowed nothing upon the river. Into the stream forthwith he cast his fair Persian mistress. As though the might of the river renewed their might, his men then and there beat back the threatening minions of "law and order." A pleasant, a piquant, a characteristically Russian tale, of which, however, Glazunov has made less in his music than there was reason to expect, alike from the promise of the material and the curious repute of the tone-poem itself. Thereon, it is the custom to say, the listened may hear the youthful, the imaginative, the vitalizing Glazunov before he came old, academical and shrunk into quasi-Teutonic grooves.

Yet, somehow, the music of "Stenka Razin" is impressive and alive only when the composer, like the brigand of his tonal tale, has to do with the Volga. There is a motive for the pirate—"short, savage, bizarre," according to the programme-book; yet in actual hearing by no means arresting to the ear, and scarcely more significant when on occasion it flashes and flails through tumultuous measures. There is motiv, likewise, for the hapless Persian princess—a motiv that becomes a melody dipped in oriental harmonies, beating to oriental rhythms, yet not quite stirring the imagination, even under elaborate "working," as do Rimsky-Korsakov's magical eastern measures. There is also a motiv of the Volga—no other than the folk-tune, rising, falling, swelling, vanishing, of the drudging, trudging boatmen. It seizes the ear, penetrates the admiration, enkindles Glazunov, dominates the tone-poem. Again and again it recurs, and at each return it bourgeons into music pictorial of the great and glowing river or voice and image of its might. True Glazunov is prone to repeat his pictures and to reiterate his imagery. But with the one he is vivid and with the other he is eloquent. Not to the glory of Stenka Razin but to the glory of the Volga runs his tone-poem, and to his own glory in the day wkhen he could still write the music of a fired composer and not of thoughtful pedagogue.

H. T. PARKER

POLITICAL BUGS

There is an invasion of these pests all over the United States. Some of our most respected citizens are bothered with them. It is rumored that Mr. Bryan has political bugs, also Mr.

CONTINUING PIECES

Colonial—The Canary

DRETTY, polite [illegible] selections. [illegible]mphony was disap-

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mme. Matzenauer and a Scene from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" at Symphony Hall—A Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra — "The Flonzaleys'" Notable Programme—Other Impending Joys

At the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Jan. 16, and Saturday, Jan. 17, Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the assisting singer. Her coming and coöperation have enabled Mr. Monteux to set on the programme the first long excerpt from Wagner's music-dramas to be heard at the Symphony Concerts since the orchestra and Mr. Witherspoon undertook, in Dr. Muck's time, the final scene from "The Valkyr." Mr. Monteux has turned to "The Dusk of the Gods," least known in Boston of all Wagner's operas. First the orchestra will play the music in memory of the dead Siegfried and then pass to the music of the final scene with Mme. Matzenauer singing the part of Brünhilde in an English version skilfully prepared by Mr. Krehbiel. She will also be heard in songs of Brahms and Schubert, to which he also has set English words. The symphony of these concerts will be new hereabouts—a symphony in D minor, written by Sigmund Stojowski, Mr. Paderewski's Polish friend and well liked in occasional performance in other cities.

Tentatively following the example of Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra and of Mr. Damrosch and his orchestra in New York, Mr. Monteux and his men will be heard in a concert for children and youth in their early teens in Symphony Hall, at four o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, Jan. 29. The programme will be relatively short and will consist of light and easily understood numbers from the standard orchestral repertory. Whether the conductor or some other spokesman will say a preliminary word about the pieces to be played, as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch do, the communiqué from Symphony Hall fails to indicate. The purpose of the concert is, of course, to acquaint the youngsters with the pleasures of symphonic music and so lead ultimately into Symphony Hall a new generation of listeners. In Chicago and in New York, the young people have filled the hall to the doors. The prospect is that they will do likewise in Boston and that the announced concert will be the first of a monthly series. Many of the tickets, at twenty-five, thirty-five and fifty cents "and no higher," will be distributed through the high schools and the settlement-houses.

At its concerts of Jan. 16 and 17, the Chicago Orchestra will play Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan"—the first repetitions of the piece since Mr. Monteux produced it in Boston and New York to unanimous pleasure and plaudits. The more the pity that in this Mr. Griffes's first hour of note as a composer, an attack of pneumonia should have laid him low. He is now well on the way to recovery.

MATZENAUER TO BE SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY 16TH

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, will be the soloist in the next pair of Symphony concerts, Jan. 16 and 17, the orchestra being away on trip the coming week. She will sing numbers by Brahms, Schumann, Schubert and the closing "Immolation" scene from "The Dusk of the Gods."

The symphony will be Stojowski's in D minor.

Post Dec 4

MATZENAUER SYMPH... SOLOIST

The next Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall will befall Friday and Saturday, Jan. 16 and 17, when the orchestra has returned from its third Southern trip, which will occupy the coming week. The programme set for this pair of concerts will be notable in the first performance by the orchestra of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor, which has been played and very well received in other cities. Margaret Matzenauer, one of the most glorious-voiced contraltos of our day, whose vocal range is so ex ensive tha she takes soprano parts with ease, will figure prominently on the programme. Not only will she sing Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," the first two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and Schubert's "Erl-King," but when the orchestra has played the funeral music of Siegfried's death from "The Dusk of the Gods," she will sing the final "Immolation" scene of Wagner's same epic music drama. The English version of each of her numbers has been made by H. E. Krehbiel.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The next Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall will be on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 16 and 17, when the orchestra has returned from its third southern trip. The program will be noteworthy for the first performance here of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor. Margaret Matbenauer will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," Schumann's "Two Songs of a Bride" and Schubert's "Erl-King," but when the orchestra has played the funeral music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods" she will sing the final "Immolation" scene. The English version of each of her songs has been made by H. E. Krehbiel.

Tribune Jan 3

Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, a new venture by the Symphony Orchestra—a short concert of well-chosen and unexacting pieces for young people in their early teens, designed to open to them the pleasures of such music and accustom them to the ways of such a band. Mr. Monteux will conduct.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 30, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony for the chief item of the programme.

Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony as noted above.

NEW PLAYS NEXT WEEK

cata (Op. 111) and pieces of the Weil.

Thursday evening, Jan. 15, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the fourth of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. The first violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti, will be heard in a Concerto.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mme. Matzenauer in the noon of her powers, for assisting singer. She will be heard in songs with orchestra and to English text by Schubert, Schumann and Brahms and in Brünnhilde's scene, likewise to English words, at the end of Wagner's opera, "The Dusk of the Gods." The purely orchestral numbers are Stojowski's symphony in D minor to be played for the first time in Boston and the apotheosis of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Jan 3

Items and Announcements

When Mr. oCrtot, the Parisian pianist, now returned for a second visit to the United States, plays at the Symphony Concerts, he purposes, with Mr. Honteux, to make known for the first times in America an early Fantasia for piano and orchestra by Debussy. It is one of the pieces that he wrote while he was dwelling and working at the Villa Medici as a winner of the Prix de Rome. Last autumn Mr. Certot played the piece in England and it was well received.

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening Mr. Monteux proposes Mr. Stojowski's symphony to be heard in Boston on the following day: Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," not yet played in the concerts at Symphony Hall; Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Schumann's Concerto for violoncello. In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, who has already proved himself signal musician and virtuoso, will play the solo-part.

A prophet—and also a composer—is not without honor save in his country. The other day Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played for the first time in that city. Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death," recently heard at Symphony Hall. Almost with one accord, the reviewers praised it. Mr. Hubbard, writing in The Tribune, believed the music "need fear no comparison," with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; affirmed even that not only the composer but also America "might well be proud of it." Even Mr. Hackett of The Evening Post, who had his doubts about "creative thought" in the piece, warmed to the workmanship.

Beethoven's full-voiced overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and four dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," are the pieces chosen by Mr. Monteux for the first concert for young people of the Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Thursday, Jan. 29. At first glance the programme, with half a symphony and a classic overture upon it, does seem somewhat exacting for a beginning with such an audience, but the only real test will be the fashion in which that audience takes it. The management has made a wise restriction admitting older people only as experts. There will be no public sale of tickets, moreover, until Jan. 22, in order that the youth of the schools may have first and free choice.

Globe Jan. 4

No Symphony This Week

There will be no Symphony concerts this week on account of the third Southern tour of the orchestra. On Jan 16 and 17 Mme Matzenauer, the soloist, will sing Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," Schubert's "Erl King," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and the "Immolation" scene from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," an unusually fine choice of selections. The orchestra will play what is perhaps Wagner's masterpiece, the Siegfried Funeral Music, from "The Dusk of the Gods," and give the first performances in Boston of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor.

CONCERT FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Symphony's School Children's Concert Jan. 29

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged a suitable programme for the "Young People's Concert" to be given by the full orchestra on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, at four o'clock, for the enjoyment and education of all who attend the schools of Greater Boston. Music of the finest calibre, but of direct popular appeal will be Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor. The concert will end in lighter vein with dance music—Delibes' Ballet Suite "Sylvia."

This concert will launch a project by which theTrustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra hope to interest the younger element in symphonic music by presenting it to them in the finest performance in pleasing and instructive fashion.

The tickets will be distributed with the help of the school and settlement officials at the rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. Descriptive programmes will be distributed with the tickets. Older people will be admitted only as escorts. There will be no public sale until Jan. 22d, in order that the schools may have the first opportunity.

American Jan 3

Who Think——— SATURDAY,

CHILDREN'S SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have adranged a "Young People's Concert," to be given at Symphony Hall on Thursday, January 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, that it may follow conveniently upon the school hours. This concert and any others of a similar character that may be undertaken later will provide the best music by the full orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor. The program will be simple and of direct appeal—designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear music with the finest symphonic works in the finest performance.

...LIAM'S CORNER STRAND

Post Dec 2

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR YOUNG

Concerts for School Children Planned

For the delight and profit of the younger generation, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have arranged for a "Young People's Concert" to be given at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon that it may follow conveniently upon the school hours. This concert, and any others of a similar character that may be undertaken later, will provide the best music by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor. The programme will be simple and of direct appeal—designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear such music with the finest symphonic works in the finest performance.

The trustees consider that to have an audience entirely of school age would best fulfil the purpose of this project. These they propose to reach through the settlements as well as the schools of Greater Boston.

Jan 3 Herald 6

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CHILDREN'S CONCERTS

First Popular-Priced Entertainment Jan. 29 at 4 P. M.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under plans of its trustees to make its finest music accessible to the school children of the city, is to give a special "young people's concert" in Symphony Hall at 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29. This concert may be the beginning of a series especially for school children, all to be given by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, the regular conductor.

Tickets, to be sold at 25, 35 and 50 cents, are to be distributed through the schools and through the settlement houses of the city.

This month is considered a propitious time to investigate the possible presence of [illegible] planets between the earth and the sun. Their relative position is [illegible] to the sun.

PLAN SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

A "Young People's Concert" for the entertainment and education of the younger generation will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Jan 29, at 4 p.m. according to an announcement made last night by the trustees of the orchestra. The hour for the concert has been arranged so that it will follow conveniently on school hours.

It is altogether likely that this concert, which is something in the nature of an experiment, will be followed by others of a like nature. The concert will provide the best music by the full Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its conductor. The program will be simple, however, and of direct appeal, designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear such music with the finest symphonic works.

The orchestra trustees believe that to have an audience entirely of school age will best fulfill the purpose of this project. These they propose to reach through the settlements as well as through the schools of Greater Boston. The tickets are to be distributed at a charge of 25, 35 and 50 cents. In order that the distribution may be as equitable as possible, the cooperation of the school and settlement officials is being asked by the orchestra trustees.

Globe Jan. 11

Boston Symphony Concert For Young People

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for young people Thursday, Jan 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, that it may not conflict with school hours. Its purpose is to acquaint our younger generation with the beauties of symphonic music by presenting it to them in enjoyable fashion, and in the finest performance.

The program for this concert will begin with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—great music which is simple and of direct appeal. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes' ballet suite, "Sylvia."

Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are being distributed through the schools and settlements, and there will be no public sale until Jan 22, when these have had every opportunity. Adults are to be admitted only as escorts.

Traveler Jan. 10

The full orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give a special concert for "young people" on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 P. M. The program will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes's Ballet Suite, "Sylvia."

Monitor Jan. 10

MUSIC FOR YOUNG PEOPLE IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a concert of music for young people, which will take place in Symphony Hall, on Thursday, January 29. Mr. Monteux will conduct a program comprising Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' ballet suite "Sylvia." In the matter of concerts of this character Boston has been somewhat behind other cities which support symphony orchestras. The educational value of such concerts has long been recognized and the present project cannot but be welcomed favorably.

The influence of good music is far-reaching. The music lovers of the years to come will be drawn from the members of the rising generation and the more often these come in contact with the great and beautiful specimens of the art, the sooner and more accurately will they learn to distinguish and appreciate music which is really worthy. Cheap and trivial music is as bad an influence as literature of the same sort, although the same care is not used in keeping it from the young. Any scheme calculated to offset the influence of such music must find general favor. It is to be hoped that the success of the forthcoming concert will be such as to encourage the trustees of the orchestra to continue in the same way and that in due time not only orchestral concerts, but concerts of chamber music as well, will be made available to the younger element of the city.

Traveler Jan 10

BOSTON TO HEAR STOJOWSKI NUMBER

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has put Stojowski's Symphony in D minor on the program for next week's concerts. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and Schubert's "Erl-King," and, after the orchestra has played the funeral march of Siegfried from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," will close the program by singing Bruenhilde's Apotheosis from the same music drama.

ITEMS ABOUT MUSIC

Mme. Matzenauer and a Scene from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods" at Symphony Hall—A Concert for Young People by the Symphony Orchestra — "The Flonzaleys'" Notable Programme—Other Impending Joys

At the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Jan. 16, and Saturday, Jan. 17, Mme. Matzenauer of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the assisting singer. Her coming and coöperation have enabled Mr. Monteux to set on the programme the first long excerpt from Wagner's music-dramas to be heard at the Symphony Concerts since the orchestra and Mr. Witherspoon undertook, in Dr. Muck's time, the final scene from "The Valkyr." Mr. Monteux has turned to "The Dusk of the Gods," least known in Boston of all Wagner's operas. First the orchestra will play the music in memory of the dead Siegfried and then pass to the music of the final scene with Mme. Matzenauer singing the part of Brünhilde in an English version skilfully prepared by Mr. Krehbiel. She will also be heard in songs of Brahms and Schubert, to which he also has set English words. The symphony of these concerts will be new hereabouts—a symphony in D minor, written by Sigmund Stojowski, Mr. Paderewski's Polish friend and well liked in occasional performance in other cities.

Tentatively following the example of Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra and of Mr. Damrosch and his orchestra in New York, Mr. Monteux and his men will be heard in a concert for children and youth in their early teens in Symphony Hall, at four o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, Jan. 29. The programme will be relatively short and will consist of light and easily understood numbers from the standard orchestral repertory. Whether the conductor or some other spokesman will say a preliminary word about the pieces to be played, as Mr. Stock and Mr. Damrosch do, the communiqué from Symphony Hall fails to indicate. The purpose of the concert is, of course, to acquaint the youngsters with the pleasures of symphonic music and so lead ultimately into Symphony Hall a new generation of listeners. In Chicago and in New York, the young people have filled the hall to the doors. The prospect is that they will do likewise in Boston and that the announced concert will be the first of a monthly series. Many of the tickets, at twenty-five, thirty-five and fifty cents "and no higher," will be distributed through the high schools and the settlement-houses

At its concerts of Jan. 16 and 17, the Chicago Orchestra will play Mr. Griffes's tone-poem, "The Pleasure-Domes of Kubla Khan"—the first repetitions of the piece since Mr. Monteux produced it in Boston and New York to unanimous pleasure and plaudits. The more the pity that in this Mr. Griffes's first hour of note as a composer, an attack of pneumonia should have laid him low. He is now well on the way to recovery

MATZENAUER TO BE SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY 16TH

Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, will be the soloist of the next pair of Symphony concerts, Jan. 16 and 17, the orchestra being away on trip the coming week. She will sing numbers by Brahms, Schumann, Schubert and the closing "Immolation" scene from "The Dusk of the Gods."

The symphony will be Stojowski's in D minor.

Post Jan 4

MATZENAUER SYMPH... SOLOIST

The next Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall will befall Friday and Saturday, Jan. 16 and 17, when the orchestra has returned from its third Southern trip, which will occupy the coming week. The programme set for this pair of concerts will be notable in the first performance by the orchestra of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor, which has been played and very well received in other cities. Margaret Matzenauer, one of the most glorious-voiced contraltos of our day, whose vocal range is so ex ensive tha she takes soprano parts with ease, will figure prominently on the programme. Not only will she sing Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," the first two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and Schubert's "Erl-King," but when the orchestra has played the funeral music of Siegfried's death from "The Dusk of the Gods," she will sing the final "Immolation" scene of Wagner's same epic music drama. The English version of each of her numbers has been made by H. E. Krehbiel.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The next Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall will be on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 16 and 17, when the orchestra has returned from its third southern trip. The program will be noteworthy for the first performance here of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor. Margaret Matbenauer will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," Schumann's "Two Songs of a Bride" and Schubert's "Erl-King," but when the orchestra has played the funeral music of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods" she will sing the final "Immolation" scene. The English version of each of her songs has been made by H. E. Krehbiel.

Tuesday Jan 3

Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, a new venture by the Symphony Orchestra—a short concert of well-chosen and unexacting pieces for young people in their early teens, designed to open to them the pleasures of such music and accustom them to the ways of such a band. Mr. Monteux will conduct.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 30, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony for the chief item of the programme.

Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new ...mphony as noted above.

NEW PLAYS NEXT WEEK

cata (Op. 111) and pieces of his own.

Thursday evening, Jan. 15, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the fourth of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Monteux. The first violoncellist, Mr. Bedetti, will be heard in a Concerto.

Friday afternoon, Jan. 16, in Symphony Hall, the eleventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mme. Matzenauer, in the noon of her powers, for assisting singer. She will be heard in songs with orchestra and to English text by Schubert, Schumann and Brahms and in Brünnhilde's scene, likewise to English words, at the end of Wagner's opera, "The Dusk of the Gods." The purely orchestral numbers are Stojowski's symphony in D minor to be played for the first time in Boston and the apotheosis of Siegfried from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Jan. 5

Items and Announcements

When Mr. oCrtot, the Parisian pianist, now returned for a second visit to the United States, plays at the Symphony Concerts, he purposes, with Mr. Honteux, to make known for the first times in America an early Fantasia for piano and orchestra by Debussy. It is one of the pieces that he wrote while he was dwelling and working at the Villa Medici as a winner of the Prix de Rome. Last autumn Mr. Cortot played the piece in England and it was well received.

For the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge next Thursday evening Mr. Monteux proposes Mr. Stojowski's symphony to be heard in Boston on the following day: Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," not yet played in the concerts at Symphony Hall; Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" and Schumann's Concerto for violoncello. In the Concerto, Mr. Bedetti, who has already proved himself signal musician and virtuoso, will play the solo-part.

A prophet—and also a composer—is not without honor save in his country. The other day Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra played for the first time in that city. Mr. Chadwick's tone-poem, "The Angel of Death," recently heard at Symphony Hall. Almost with one accord, the reviewers praised it. Mr. Hubbard, writing in The Tribune, believed the music "need fear no comparison," with Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration"; affirmed even that not only the composer but also America "might well be proud of it." Even Mr. Hackett of The Evening Post, who had his doubts about "creative thought" in the piece, warmed to the workmanship.

Beethoven's full-voiced overture to Goethe's play, "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and four dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," are the pieces chosen by Mr. Monteux for the first concert for young people of the Symphony Orchestra on the afternoon of Thursday, Jan. 29. At first glance the programme, with half a symphony and a classic overture upon it, does seem somewhat exacting for a beginning with such an audience, but the only real test will be the fashion in which that audience takes it. The management has made a wise restriction admitting older people only as experts. There will be no public sale of tickets, moreover, until Jan. 22, in order that the youth of the schools may have first and free choice.

Globe Jan. 4

No Symphony This Week

There will be no Symphony concerts this week on account of the third Southern tour of the orchestra. On Jan 16 and 17 Mme Matzenauer, the soloist, will sing Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," Schubert's "Erl King," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and the "Immolation" scene from Wagner's "The Dusk of the Gods," an unusually fine choice of selections. The orchestra will play what is perhaps Wagner's masterpiece, the Siegfried Funeral Music, from "The Dusk of the Gods," and give the first performances in Boston of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor.

CONCERT FOR YOUNG FOLKS

Symphony's School Children's Concert Jan. 29

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has arranged a suitable programme for the "Young People's Concert" to be given by the full orchestra on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, at four o'clock, for the enjoyment and edification of all who attend the schools of Greater Boston. Music of the finest calibre, but of direct popular appeal will be Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor. The concert will end in lighter vein with dance music—Delibes' Ballet Suite "Sylvia."

This concert will launch a project by which theTrustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra hope to interest the younger element in symphonic music by presenting it to them in the finest performance in pleasing and instructive fashion.

The tickets will be distributed with the help of the school and settlement officials at the rates of 25, 35 and 50 cents. Descriptive programmes will be distributed with the tickets. Older people will be admitted only as escorts. There will be no public sale until Jan. 22d, in order that the schools may have the first opportunity.

Republican Jan 5

Who Think——SATURDAY.

CHILDREN'S SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have adranged a "Young People's Concert," to be given at Symphony Hall on Thursday, January 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, that it may follow conveniently upon the school hours. This concert and any others of a similar character that may be undertaken later will provide the best music by the full orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor. The program will be simple and of direct appeal—designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear music with the finest symphonic works in the finest performance.

...RHAM'S CORNER STRAND

Post Jan 2

SYMPHONY TO PLAY FOR YOUNG

Concerts for School Children Planned

For the delight and profit of the younger generation, the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have arranged for a "Young People's Concert" to be given at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon that it may follow conveniently upon the school hours. This concert, and any others of a similar character that may be undertaken later, will provide the best music by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor. The programme will be simple and of direct appeal—designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear such music with the finest symphonic works in the finest performance.

The trustees consider that to have an audience entirely of school age would best fulfil the purpose of this project. These they propose to reach through the settlements as well as the schools of Greater Boston.

6 Herald

SYMPHONY TO GIVE CHILDREN'S CONCERTS

First Popular-Priced Entertainment Jan. 29 at 4 P. M.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under plans of its trustees to make its finest music accessible to the school children of the city, is to give a special "young people's concert" in Symphony Hall at 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29. This concert may be the beginning of a series especially for school children, all to be given by the full orchestra under Pierre Monteux, the regular conductor.

Tickets, to be sold at 25, 35 and 50 cents, are to be distributed through the schools and through the settlement houses of the city.

This month is considered a propitious time to investigate the possible presence of another planet because of the relative position it has to the sun.

PLAN SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

A "Young People's Concert" for the entertainment and education of the younger generation, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Jan 29, at 4 p m. according to an announcement made last night by the trustees of the orchestra. The hour for the concert has been arranged so that it will follow conveniently on school hours.

It is altogether likely that this concert, which is something in the nature of an experiment, will be followed by others of a like nature. The concert will provide the best music by the full Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its conductor. The program will be simple, however, and of direct appeal, designed to acquaint those who have little or no opportunity to hear such music with the finest symphonic works.

The orchestra trustees believe that to have an audience entirely of school age will best fulfill the purpose of this project. These they propose to reach through the settlements as well as through the schools of Greater Boston. The tickets are to be distributed at a charge of 25, 35 and 50 cents. In order that the distribution may be as equitable as possible, the cooperation of the school and settlement officials is being asked by the orchestra trustees.

Globe Jan. 11

Boston Symphony Concert For Young People

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for young people Thursday, Jan 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, that it may not conflict with school hours. Its purpose is to acquaint our younger generation with the beauties of symphonic music by presenting it to them in enjoyable fashion, and in the finest performance.

The program for this concert will begin with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony—great music which is simple and of direct appeal. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes' ballet suite, "Sylvia."

Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are being distributed through the schools and settlements, and there will be no public sale until Jan 22, when these have had every opportunity. Adults are to be admitted only as escorts

Traveler Jan. 10

The full orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will give a special concert for "young people" on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 P. M. The program will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," and Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes's Ballet Suite, "Sylvia."

Monitor Jan. 10

MUSIC FOR YOUNG PEOPLE IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a concert of music for young people, which will take place in Symphony Hall, on Thursday, January 29. Mr. Monteux will conduct a program comprising Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' ballet suite "Sylvia." In the matter of concerts of this character Boston has been somewhat behind other cities which support symphony orchestras. The educational value of such concerts has long been recognized and the present project cannot but be welcomed favorably.

The influence of good music is far-reaching. The music lovers of the years to come will be drawn from the members of the rising generation and the more often these come in contact with the great and beautiful specimens of the art, the sooner and more accurately will they learn to distinguish and appreciate music which is really worthy. Cheap and trivial music is as bad an influence as literature of the same sort, although the same care is not used in keeping it from the young. Any scheme calculated to offset the influence of such music must find general favor. It is to be hoped that the success of the forthcoming concert will be such as to encourage the trustees of the orchestra to continue in the same way and that in due time not only orchestral concerts, but concerts of chamber music as well, will be made available to the younger element of the city.

Traveler Jan 10

BOSTON TO HEAR STOJOWSKI NUMBER

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has put Stojowski's Symphony in D minor on the program for next week's concerts. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," and Schubert's "Erl-King," and, after the orchestra has played the funeral march of Siegfried from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," will close the program by singing Bruenhilde's Apotheosis from the same music drama.

Every seat for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, has been taken by the youth of the schools to whom the tickets were first proffered. It is, therefore, useless for "outsiders" to make application for them. Already the management of the orchestra is arranging a second and similar concert for the afternoon of Thursday, Feb. 26. Evidently a good and much-needed work well begun.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Monteux will fulfill his promise of last autumn and revive d'Indy's second symphony—"Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Opus 57"—by all odds the most signal piece in kind written by a French composer in our time and unheard here since Mr. Fiedler's distant day. For some reason Dr. Muck eschewed the piece, though he admired d'Indy's music. Mr. Rabaud, as bon bourgeois, was frankly afraid of it. Only one other piece stands with the symphony upon Mr Monteux's programmes—Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra in which Mr. Kreisler, for the first time in many years hereabouts, will play the solo part.

For his concert in Symphony Hall on

The Symphony and the Schools

A Second Young People's Concert

THOUGH the first of the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra is two weeks away, every ticket for it has already been distributed through the schools of Greater Boston. A second concert is, accordingly, announced for Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, with the following hints as to tickets:

Applications for tickets should be made by the heads of the various schools of Greater Boston, not later than Feb. 12, inclusive. Address W. H. Brennan, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Each applicant will be advised on or before Monday, Feb. 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall on Feb. 19 or 20.

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools which applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERT JAN 29 SOLD OUT

The young people's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, to be given Thursday afternoon, Jan 29, at 4 p m. is entirely sold out through the cooperation of the schools of Greater Boston. This will make a public sale impossible as there are no tickets for the management to offer.

The second concert will be given in the near future. In allotting tickets for the second concert, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them.

Jan. 23

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERT

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for "Young People" on Thursday, January 29, at four o'clock in the afternoon that it may not conflict with [illegible].

America Jan 7

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT MEET GREAT RESPONSE

For the "Young People's Concert," to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Delibes' Ballet, "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert, but for another, to be given on Thursday afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock.

Items and Announcements

Though the second of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people will not take place for a month—on Thursday, Feb. 26—the youth of the schools have already taken every place for it, as they did long ago for the first concert next week. Unfortunately, after such response, the schedule of work for the orchestra through the spring leaves no room for more of these concerts. Next season, however, trustees, conductor and manager will make place, from month to month, for a series of them.

Before long, Mr. Monteux is likely to include in a pair of Symphony Concerts Mr. Henry Gilbert's tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," originally and rather mistakenly produced at the Metropolitan Opera House as a ballet-pantomime and so seen and heard in Boston in the spring of 1917. Mr. Gilbert wrote it, however, as a symphonic piece for the concert hall. As such, by the test of performance in the theatre, it keeps the more virtue. Mr. Monteux is well disposed also to other orchestral pieces by Mr. Gilbert who seems at last to be gaining just deserts—even in his "home-town."

Herald Jan 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program of the Symphony concerts this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will include Vincent D'Indy's eloquent Symphony No. 2 in B flat and Brahm's violin concerto. D'Indy's symphony, which has been played four times at these concerts, once under the direction of the composer, has not been heard here for several years. The concerto will be played by Mr. Kreisler, who has not appeared at a Symphony concert for two years.

MRS. BEROUX-WILLIAMS

Post Jan. 11

Young People's Symphony

To Acquaint Young People With Beauties of Symphonic Music—Adults Admitted Only as Escorts

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for "young people" on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon that it may not conflict with school hours. Its purpose is to acquaint our younger generation with the beauties of symphonic music by presenting it to them in enjoyable fashion, and in the finest performance. The programme for this concert will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's immortal "Unfinished" Symphony—great music which is simple and of direct appeal. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes' Ballet Suite "Sylvia," famous for "The Huntress," the "Slow Waltz," the "Pizzicati," and the "Procession of Bacchus." Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are being distributed through the schools and settlements, and there will be no public sale until Jan. 22. Adults are to be admitted only as escorts.

Herald Jan.

Matzenauer Symphony Soloist

The Symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first performance here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

Margaret Matzenauer will sing at these concerts for the first time. She will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride" and Schubert's "Erl King." After the orchestra has played the funeral march of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods," she will sing Bruennhilde's Immolation music.

Trans. Jan 10

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Symphony and Mme. Matzenauer in a Long Fragment from Wagner—Mr. de Gogorza and Mme. Samaroff Paired—Mr. Werrenrath Returns—A New French "Diseuse" — Sundry Singers, Various Pianists and Two Singing Societies

A SYMPHONY hitherto unheard in Boston, the final episodes from Wagner's opera, "The Dusk of the Gods" and four classic German songs sung with orchestral accompaniment and to English texts fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, obviously designed for the coöperation of Mme. Matzenauer, the assisting singer. She will be heard in the four songs—Brahms's sombre "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; two of Schumann's "Bride-Songs"; and Schubert's "Erl-King"—and in Brünnhilde's long soliloquy at the end of Wagner's opera. The German texts of all five pieces have been newly and ably translated by Mr. Krehbiel, while various hands have arranged the orchestral versions of the songs. Needless, almost, to say, Mme. Matzenauer is in the very prime of richness of voice, of skill and eloquence in dramatic song. From "The Dusk of the Gods," the orchestra will also play the music that glorifies the dead Siegfried. The new symphony is the work of Mr. Sigmund Stojowski, the Polish friend of Mr. Paderewski, whose concerto for piano and orchestra was heard at the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time. The symphony—in D minor and in the usual four movements—has been played in various European cities and in New York.

On Thursday evening, at the fourth of the series of concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play Mr. Stojowski's symphony for the first time; Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," as yet unheard at Symphony Hall; and, from recent programmes in Boston, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The fourth item on the list is Schumann's Concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. Bedetti of the orchestra bids fair as soloist to confirm the merit he has already shown as leader of his choir.

Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, a new venture by the Symphony Orchestra—a short concert of readily comprehensible pieces for young people in their early teens, designed to open to them the pleasures of such music and accustom them to the ways of such a band. Mr. Monteux will conduct. The chosen numbers are Beethoven's overture, "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; and four dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 30, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony for the chief item of the programme.

Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony as noted above.

Globe Jan 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, playing Brahms' violin concerto. The second number on the programme will be Vincent d'Indy's prodigious second symphony in B flat, one of the best works of the modern French repertory.

Trans. Jan 13

Items and Incidents

When Mr. Kreisler reappears with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday, Jan. 23, and Saturday, Jan. 24, he will play Brahms's concerto for violin —music that he has recently studied anew and that he has seldom, if ever played in Boston.

The new French pianist, Robert Schmitz, who has been added to the "assisting artists" of the Symphony Orchestra, will play at the concert of Friday, Feb 13, and Saturday, Feb. 14. If present plans hold, he will be heard in Mr. Carpenter's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, a piece novel to Boston, and in the piano-part of Franck's tone-poem, suggested by Hugo's verse, "Les Djinns," the magical spirits in many guises of "The Arabian Nights."

Record Jan 17

Kreisler Next Week

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will play at the Symphony concerts the coming week, as well as give a recital at Symphony Hall tomorrow. At the Symphony concerts he will play the familiar violin concerto by Brahms in D major. The orchestra will revive the second symphony in B flat, by Vincent d'Indy.

Traveler Jan 17

KREISLER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist at next week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday and Saturday. He will play with the orchestra Brahm's Violin Concerto in D-major. Pierre Monteux will revive Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B-flat.

Trans Mon Jan 12

Appreciated

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra fared well with audiences and reviewers at their concerts in New York last week. In particular both warmed to the performance of Brahms's symphony in C minor. The Times judged it "beautiful"; The World (Mr. Huneker) "had never heard the conductor interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. . . . It was massive and passionate in the first movement, tenderly poetic in the second, of a just tempo and balance in the allegretto and spirited in the finale. There were homogeneity, elasticity, power and tonal plangency." In the prelude to "Parsifal," which Mr. Monteux has not yet included in a concert in Boston, the reviewers with one accord applauded "the fine sonorities of the strings." Even where there was none too much liking for the piece, as for Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," the performance by common consent, "was brilliant." So forth and so onward with the other numbers of the two programmes. As for "Jeux" in itself, the reviewers for the most part, repeat the hackneyed depreciatory formulas about Debussy's [illegible] of the final years.

Globe Jan 18

Kreisler was given an ovation lasting for 10 minutes when he played the Brahms concerto with the New York Symphony Society recently.

Globe Jan 18

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

After an absence of two seasons Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday and Saturday. He is to play Brahms' great violin concerto in D major. A revival of importance will be the second symphony of Vincent d'Indy in B flat, which has not been given in Boston for several years.

Amer. Jan 11 ..... Lis[illegible]

Samaroff.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first Boston performance at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Margaret Matzenauer will be soloist at these concerts for the first time. The famous contralto will sing Brahm's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," Schubert's "Erl-King," and, after the funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," will sing Bruenhilde's apotheosis from the same music drama.

Fri[illegible] at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano. Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, first times in Boston. Songs, with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber;" Schumann, "Brides' Songs;" Schubert, "Erl-King;" Wagner, excerpts from "The Dusk of the Gods," act three: a, "Siegfried Funeral Music," b, "Immolation" scene.

Sigismund Stojowski, whose symphony in D minor is to be played this week, is a Polish pianist and composer, now resident in New York. He is a friend and former pupil of Paderewski. This symphony was awarded a prize at Leipsic in 1898, and has since been played in many European and American cities.

Post Jan 11

The symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first Boston performance at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

Boston Traveler

MATZENAUER WINS TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY

Those privileged to see and hear Mme. Matzenauer at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall will long treasure the pleasantest memories of one of the greatest singers of the day interpreting some of the greatest music ever written and with an orchestra that has no superior. The singer was in excellent voice, entered into the spirit of her numbers and sang them as can few artists of today. For many her singing of the Wagner numbers was the event of the afternoon, but she has no reason to apologize for her Brahms, Schumann and Schubert selections.

The Stojowski symphony was disap-

...Thirteenth Rhapsody..... Li...

Every seat for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra for young people on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, has been taken by the youth of the schools to whom the tickets were first proffered. It is, therefore, useless for "outsiders" to make application for them. Already the management of the orchestra is arranging a second and similar concert for the afternoon of Thursday, Feb. 26. Evidently a good and much-needed work well begun.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Monteux will fulfill his promise of last autumn and revive d'Indy's second symphony—"Symphony in B-flat major, No. 2, Opus 57"—by all odds the most signal piece in kind written by a French composer in our time and unheard here since Mr. Fiedler's distant day. For some time past the conductor has been at work upon it, and he will spare no pains to achieve eloquent performance. For some reason Dr. Muck eschewed the piece, though he admired d'Indy's music. Mr. Rabaud, as bon bourgeois, was frankly afraid of it. Only one other piece stands with the symphony upon Mr. Monteux's programme—Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra in which Mr. Kreisler, for the first time in many years hereabouts, will play the solo part.

For his concert in Symphony Hall on

The Symphony and the Schools

A Second Young People's Concert

THOUGH the first of the Young People's Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra is two weeks away, every ticket for it has already been distributed through the schools of Greater Boston. A second concert is, accordingly, announced for Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, with the following hints as to tickets:

Applications for tickets should be made by the heads of the various schools of Greater Boston, not later than Feb. 12, inclusive. Address W. H. Brennan,, Symphony Hall, Boston.

Each applicant will be advised on or before Monday, Feb. 16, of the allotment of tickets, which may be secured at Symphony Hall on Feb. 19 or 20.

In allotting tickets for the concert on Feb. 26, preference will be shown those schools which applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them. The prices of tickets will be 25, 35 and 50 cents.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERT JAN 29 SOLD OUT

The young people's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, to be given Thursday afternoon, Jan 29, at 4 p m. is entirely sold out through the cooperation of the schools of Greater Boston. This will make a public sale impossible as there are no tickets for the management to offer.

The second concert will be given in the near future. In allotting tickets for the second concert, preference will be shown those schools who applied for tickets for the first concert but were unable to obtain them.

Jan. 23

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERT

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for "Young People" on Thursday, January 29, at four o'clock in the afternoon that it may not conflict with school hours.

Items and Announcements

Though the second of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for young people will not take place for a month—on Thursday, Feb. 26—the youth of the schools have already taken every place for it, as they did long ago for the first concert next week. Unfortunately, after such response, the schedule of work for the orchestra through the spring leaves no room for more of these concerts. Next season, however, trustees, conductor and manager will make place, from month to month, for a series of them.

Before long, Mr. Monteux is likely to include in a pair of Symphony Concerts Mr. Henry Gilbert's tone-poem, "The Dance in Place Congo," originally and rather mistakenly produced at the Metropolitan Opera House as a ballet-pantomime and so seen and heard in Boston in the spring of 1917. Mr. Gilbert wrote it, however, as a symphonic piece for the concert hall. As such, by the test of performance in the theatre, it keeps the more virtue. Mr. Monteux is well disposed also to other orchestral pieces by Mr. Gilbert who seems at last to be gaining just deserts—even in his "home-town."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS MEET GREAT RESPONSE

For the "Young People's Concert," to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Delibes' Ballet, "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert, but for another, to be given on Thursday afternoon, February 26, at 4 o'clock.

Post Jan. 11

Young People's Symphony

To Acquaint Young People With Beauties of Symphonic Music—Adults Admitted Only as Escorts

The full Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its regular conductor, Pierre Monteux, will launch a new project by giving a special concert for "young people" on Thursday, Jan. 29, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon that it may not conflict with school hours. Its purpose is to acquaint our younger generation with the beauties of symphonic music by presenting it to them in enjoyable fashion, and in the finest performance. The programme for this concert will begin with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" and Schubert's immortal "Unfinished" Symphony—great music which is simple and of direct appeal. The last number, of the lighter sort, will be Delibes' Ballet Suite "Sylvia," famous for "The Huntress," the "Slow Waltz," the "Pizzicati," and the "Procession of Bacchus." Tickets at 25, 35 and 50 cents are being distributed through the schools and settlements, and there will be no public sale until Jan. 22. Adults are to be admitted only as escorts.

Herald Jan.

Matzenauer Symphony Soloist

The Symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first performance here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

Margaret Matzenauer will sing at these concerts for the first time. She will sing Brahms's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride" and Schubert's "Erl King." After the orchestra has played the funeral march of Siegfried from the "Dusk of the Gods," she will sing Bruennhilde's Immolation music.

Advertiser Jan 11

...maroff. ..... Lisz...

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first Boston performance at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Margaret Matzenauer will be soloist at these concerts for the first time. The famous contralto will sing Brahm's "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber," two of Schumann's "Songs of a Bride," Schubert's "Erl-King," and, after the funeral march from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods," will sing Bruenhilde's apotheosis from the same music drama.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8. Boston Symphony Orchestra, 11th program. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano. Stojowski, Symphony in D minor, first times in Boston. Songs, with orchestra: Brahms, "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber;" Schumann, "Brides' Songs;" Schubert, "Erl-King;" Wagner, excerpts from "The Dusk of the Gods," act three, a, "Siegfried Funeral Music," b, "Immolation" scene.

Sigismund Stojowski, whose symphony in D minor is to be played this week, is a Polish pianist and composer, now resident in New York. He is a friend and former pupil of Paderewski. This symphony was awarded a prize at Leipsic in 1898, and has since been played in many European and American cities.

Trans. Jan 10

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A New Symphony and Mme. Matzenauer in a Long Fragment from Wagner—Mr. de Gogorza and Mme. Samaroff Paired—Mr. Werrenrath Returns—A New French "Dispute" — Sundry Singers, Various Pianists and Two Singing Societies

A SYMPHONY hitherto unheard in Boston, the final episodes from Wagner's opera, "The Dusk of the Gods" and four classic German songs sung with orchestral accompaniment and to English texts fill Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, obviously designed for the coöperation of Mme. Matzenauer, the assisting singer. She will be heard in the four songs—Brahms's sombre "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"; two of Schumann's "Bride-Songs"; and Schubert's "Erl-King"—and in Brünnhilde's long soliloquy at the end of Wagner's opera. The German texts of all five pieces have been newly and ably translated by Mr. Krehbiel, while various hands have arranged the orchestral versions of the songs. Needless, almost, to say, Mme. Matzenauer is in the very prime of richness of voice, of skill and eloquence in dramatic song. From "The Dusk of the Gods," the orchestra will also play the music that glorifies the dead Siegfried. The new symphony is the work of Mr. Sigmund Stojowski, the Polish friend of Mr. Paderewski, whose concerto for piano and orchestra was heard at the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time. The symphony—in D minor and in the usual four movements—has been played in various European cities and in New York.

On Thursday evening, at the fourth of the series of concerts in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play Mr. Stojowski's symphony for the first time; Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis," as yet unheard at Symphony Hall; and, from recent programmes in Boston, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." The fourth item on the list is Schumann's Concerto for violoncello, in which Mr. Bedetti of the orchestra bids fair as soloist to confirm the merit he has already shown as leader of his choir.

Thursday afternoon, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, a new venture by the Symphony Orchestra—a short concert of readily comprehensible pieces for young people in their early teens, designed to open to them the pleasures of such music and accustom them to the ways of such a band. Mr. Monteux will conduct. The chosen numbers are Beethoven's overture, "Egmont"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; and four dances from Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 30, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony for the chief item of the programme.

Saturday evening, Jan. 31, in Symphony Hall, the thirteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting and Mr. Converse's new symphony as noted above.

Post Jan 11

The symphony in D minor by Stojowski, the Polish composer of New York, which has been heard and praised in a number of cities, will have its first Boston performance at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux at the Symphony concerts of next Friday and Saturday.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

After an absence of two seasons Fritz Kreisler will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts next Friday and Saturday. He is to play Brahms' great violin concerto in D major. A revival of importance will be the second symphony of Vincent d'Indy in B flat, which has not been given in Boston for several years.

Globe Jan 18

Kreisler was given an ovation lasting for 10 minutes when he played the Brahms concerto with the New York Symphony Society recently.

Globe Jan 18

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fritz Kreisler, violinist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, playing Brahms' violin concerto. The second number on the programme will be Vincent d'Indy's prodigious second symphony in B flat, one of the best works of the modern French repertory.

Trans. Jan 13

Items and Incidents

When Mr. Kreisler reappears with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday, Jan. 23, and Saturday, Jan. 24, he will play Brahms's concerto for violin —music that he has recently studied anew and that he has seldom, if ever played in Boston.

The new French pianist, Robert Schmitz, who has been added to the "assisting artists" of the Symphony Orchestra, will play at the concert of Friday, Feb 13, and Saturday, Feb. 14. If present plans hold, he will be heard in Mr. Carpenter's "Concertino" for piano and orchestra, a piece novel to Boston, and in the piano-part of Franck's tone-poem, suggested by Hugo's verse, "Les Djinns," the magical spirits in many guises of "The Arabian Nights."

Herald Jan 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The program of the Symphony concerts this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will include Vincent D'Indy's eloquent Symphony No. 2 in B flat and Brahm's violin concerto. D'Indy's symphony, which has been played four times at these concerts, once under the direction of the composer, has not been heard here for several years. The concerto will be played by Mr. Kreisler, who has not appeared at a Symphony concert for two years.

MRS. REDUX-WILLIAMS

Record Jan 17

Kreisler Next Week

Fritz Kreisler, the eminent violinist, will play at the Symphony concerts the coming week, as well as give a recital at Symphony Hall tomorrow. At the Symphony concerts he will play the familiar violin concerto by Brahms in D major. The orchestra will revive the second symphony in B flat, by Vincent d'Indy.

...ordinary interest, not only ...ture, but

Traveler Jan 17

KREISLER WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist at next week's pair of Boston Symphony concerts, Friday and Saturday. He will play with the orchestra Brahm's Violin Concerto in D-major. Pierre Monteux will revive Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B-flat.

J. 7

Trans Mon Jan 12

Appreciated

Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra fared well with audiences and reviewers at their concerts in New York last week. In particular both warmed to the performance of Brahms's symphony in C minor. The Times judged it "beautiful"; The World (Mr. Huneker) "had never heard the conductor interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. . . . It was massive and passionate in the first movement, tenderly poetic in the second, of a just tempo and balance in the allegretto and spirited in the finale. There were homogeneity, elasticity, power and tonal plangency." In the prelude to "Parsifal," which Mr. Mouteux has not yet included in a concert in Boston, the reviewers with one accord applauded "the fine sonorities of the strings." Even where there was none too much liking for the piece, as for Debussy's "Jeux" and Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," the performance by common consent, "was brilliant." So forth and so onward with the other numbers of the two programmes. As for "Jeux" in itself, the reviewers, for the most part, repeat the hackneyed depr...ciatory formulas about Debussy's ... of the final years.

...on Traveler

MATZENAUER WINS TRIUMPH AT SYMPHONY

Those privileged to see and hear Mme. Matzenauer at the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall will long treasure the pleasantest memories of one of the greatest singers of the day interpreting some of the greatest music ever written and with an orchestra that has no superior. The singer was in excellent voice, entered into the spirit of her numbers and sang them as can few artists of today. For many her singing of the Wagner numbers was the event of the afternoon, but she has no reason to apologize for her Brahms, Schumann and Schubert selections.

The Stojowski symph...hy was disap-

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 27

...the season's third Boston Sym... concert to be given in Carnegie ... Thursday evening, January 8, ... Monteux will conduct the First ... in C minor of Brahms, ...'s Overture to "Iphigenia in ...," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" ... Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, ...enka Razine." For the Saturday ...inee, the symphony will be Bee...oven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest ... the program Debussy's Danced ...oem, "Jeux" ("Play,"), which Mr. ... Monteux is introducing to America, and ...Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux's January 8 Program Includes Debussy's "Danced Poem" for First Time.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From SUN
Address New York City
Date DEC 28 1919

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, is as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Glazounoff, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem, "Jenx," ("Play"), new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz.

HERALD
Address New York City
Date DEC 28 1919

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, Jan. 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude, are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahere." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 28 1919

Boston Symphony.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounow's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City
Date JAN 3 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephis to Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee, January 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From Times
New York City
JAN 4 1920

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Eddy Brown with the Philadelphia and Both Orchestras are visitors to New York this week, with programs announced in this column Sunday.

EVENING SUN
Address New York City
Date JAN 3 - 192

THE SYMPHONIES.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

SUN
Address New York City
Date

The programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening is as follows: Brahms, symphony, C minor; Gluck, overture, "Iphigenie in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz. The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony, "Pastoral"; Debussy dance poem "Jeux," ("Play") new here; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," (built upon Russian folk themes).

From HERALD
Address New York City
Date

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the great barytones of the day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under institute auspices in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenis," from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural thrill.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 4 1920

UNDER INSTITUTE AUSPI

Rachmaninoff Recital M... Boston Symphony ... Evening.

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening. He will sing familiar arias from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore" and Gluck's "Iphegenie en Aulide." The purely orchestral numbers will disclose further Mr. Monteux's ability in the Brahms C Minor Symphony, a symphonic poem by Glyzounov, and two selections from Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

From Times
New York
JAN

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian p... anist and composer, will appear in r... cital tomorrow evening at the Brookl... Academy.

Emilio de Gogorza is announced ... soloist with the Boston Symph... Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert n... Friday evening.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 4

Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCER...

Emilio de Gogorza to Be Assisting Artist.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under Institute auspices, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 9, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert; also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural...

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
ESTABLISHED JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony Programs.

...the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie ...hursday evening, Pierre Monteux ...nduct the First Symphony in C ... Brahms, Gluck's Overture to ...a in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude ...ifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto ... For the Saturday matinee, the ... will be Beethovens "Pastoral" ... the rest of the program De... ...nced Poem, "Joux" ("Play"), ... Monteux is introducing to ... and Glazounoff's Symphonic ... "Stenka Razine."

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 4 19...
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra ...ys in Carnegie Hall next Thursday ...ening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will ...nduct the first symphony of Brahms ... C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphi...enia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to ...Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," ...hich is the tavern episode from Lenau's ...Faust." For the Saturday matinee on ...January 10 the Symphony will be Bee...thoven's Pastorale No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Sten...

From Times
New York
JAN

...ka Razine," built upon Russian folk ...ther...

From EVENING POST,
New York City
JAN 3 - 1...

Boston Symphony Concerts.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinée on January 10, the Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral." A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
JAN 3 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ...ys in Carnegie Hall next Thurs... evening as its chief number the ...st Symphony of Brahms, and at ... Saturday matinee Beethoven's ...storal" Symphony, as well as a ...t performance in New York of ... Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

TELEGRAM
New York City
JAN 3 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jannary 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor. Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephis to Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinée on January 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

Address: New York
Date JAN 3 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.
From JAN 3 - 1920

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gorgorza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B-flat, considered one of the finest achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this co-called "Danced Poem," under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. On that occasion Nijinsky staged and danced an accompaniment of love and tennis balls in a garden. There will be still further interest in the final number — Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folksongs for its themes.

EVENING ...
Baltimore, Md.

NEW SYMPHONY ARTIST

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night.

Mr. De Gogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Debussy's a dance poem, "Jeux"; MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, and Glatounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

...ON EVENING JOURNAL
Address New York City
Date JAN 19 192...

A TWENTY-CONCERT WEEKEND.

There were twenty-one concerts scheduled to take place on Saturday and Sunday, a number probably unequalled in the record. One of them, that of the Society of the Friends of Music at the Ritz, was wisely postponed to a less jammed-up period next Sunday. Of the score that remained, not more than a half-dozen were attended by paying audiences. Some of the twenty deserved these and got them not, others got them and deserved them not. But most of them got what they deserved. So wags the world in its only roughly just appraisements.

One seeks to wag no better than the rest of the world in the face of twenty concerts in halls, theatres and opera houses. So one may merely single out for bare mention a few of the twenty—the continuation of Walter Damrosch's pleasant and profitable argosy to children on Saturday mornings at Aeolian Hall; the third matinee of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall, notable for a first performance of Debussy's "Jeux," made from a lawn tennis dance-pantomime; an evening of plenteous Wagnerian excerpts on Saturday at Carnegie Hall played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, hugely enjoyed by a very large audience and thus attesting the hunger of the people for this music in ...ite of its indifferent revelation; a ...ecital by the ineffably placid ...etz yesterday afternoon ... similar in all re... ...am, to the other ... preceding; ...drome

TELEGRAM
...ress New York City
JAN 10 1920

This afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux leads the brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra through the cheerful mazes of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

A symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounoff is also on the programme.

The most interesting feature of the programme, however, is Debussy's symphonic poem "Jeux." Mr. Monteux conducted this work with De Diaghileff's Russian Ballet in Paris when Nijinsky danced to its measures in a colorful Bakst setting.

Monteux Conducts a Fine Performance of Brahms and Wagner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third visit of the season, gave cause for rejoicing to its friends at Carnegie Hall last night, first by a beautiful performance of Brahms's C-minor symphony, led by the French conductor, Pierre Monteux, and second, both in this work and in Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude, by a superb quality of strings, which defied a night of soft, soggy weather. After the symphony Mr. Monteux rightly beckoned the band to rise with him in acknowledging the applause.

In the "Parsifal" music, of which a dramatic revival is pending, it is certain no finer sonorities have been attained during the recent years of little Wagner; the conductor took two recalls before the house insisted on having the whole orchestra stand again. Before Wagner's prelude came Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and after it Liszt's intended diabolic dance, the "Mephisto Waltzs," composed for a village tavern scene in Lenau's "Faust."

From HERALD
Address New York City
Date JAN 4 - 1920

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's pre ude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz.

At the Saturday matinee concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6. The remainder of the programme will be Debussy's dance poem, "...play), which Mr. Monteux ... America, and ...

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 27

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play,"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux's January 8 Program Includes Debussy's "Danced Poem" for First Time.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From SUN
Address New York City
Date DEC 28 1919

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, is as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem, "Jenx," ("Play"), new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz.

HERALD
ess New York City

Mrs. Clemens and [illegible]

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

* * *

CITIZEN
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, Jan. 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude, are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahere." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Memphisto Waltz.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 28 1919

Boston Symphony.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounow's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 1 1920

EVENING MAIL
ess: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephis to Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee, January 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

EVENING SUN
ress New York City
JAN 3 - 1920

THE SYMPHONIES.

[illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next [illegible]day evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony [illegible]rahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

SUN
ss New York City

The programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening is as follows: Brahms, symphony, C minor; Gluck, overture, "Iphigenie in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz. The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem "Jeux," ("Play") new here; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," (built upon Russian folk themes).

From HERALD
Address New York City
Date

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the great barytones of the day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under institute auspices in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenis," from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural thrill.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 29 1919

Monteux Conducts a Fine Performance of Brahms and Wagner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third visit of the season, gave cause for rejoicing to its friends at Carnegie Hall last night, first by a beautiful performance of Brahms's C-minor symphony, led by the French conductor, Pierre Monteux, and second, both in this work and in Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude, by a superb quality of strings, which defied a night of soft, soggy weather. After the symphony Mr. Monteux rightly beckoned the band to rise with him in acknowledging the applause. In the "Parsifal" music, of which a dramatic revival is pending, it is certain no finer sonorities have been attained during the recent years of little Wagner; the conductor took two recalls before the house insisted on having the whole orchestra stand again. Before Wagner's prelude came Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and after it Liszt's intended diabolic dance, the "Mephisto Waltz," composed for a village tavern scene in Lenau's "Faust."

From Morning Telegraph
New York City
JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony Programs.

[illegible] the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie [illegible]hursday evening, Pierre Monteux [illegible]nduct the First Symphony in C [illegible] Brahms, Gluck's Overture to [illegible]a in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to [illegible]ifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony [illegible] will be Beethovens "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's [illegible]nced Poem, "Joux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

ESTABLISHED 1881 JAN 4 19.
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the Symphony will be Beethoven's Pastorale No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From Times
New York City

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will appear in recital tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy.

Emilio de Gogorza is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert on Friday evening.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 4 1920

UNDER INSTITUTE AUSPICES

Rachmaninoff Recital M[illegible]
Boston Symphony [illegible]
Evening.

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening. He will sing familiar arias from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore" and Gluck's "Iphegenie en Aulide." The purely orchestral numbers will disclose further Mr. Monteux's ability in the Brahms C Minor Symphony, a symphonic poem by Glyzounov, and two selections from Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

From Times
New York

[illegible] Razine," built upon Russian folk [illegible]

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinée on January 10, the Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral." A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

EVENING JOURNAL
New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening as its chief number the first Symphony of Brahms, and at the Saturday matinee Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, as well as a first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

TELEGRAM
New York City

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCER[illegible]

Emilio de Gogorza to Be Assisting Artist.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under Institute auspices, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 9, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 3 - 1920

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gorgorza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B-flat, considered one of the finest achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this co-called "Danced Poem," under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. On that occasion Nijinsky staged and danced an accompaniment of love and tennis balls in a garden. There will be still further interest in the final number — Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folksongs for its themes.

EVENING [illegible]
Baltimore, Md.

NEW SYMPHONY ARTIST

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night.

Mr. De Gogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Debussy's a dance poem, "Jeux"; MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, and Glatounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

[illegible] EVENING JOURNAL
ddress New York City
ate JAN 9 19[illegible]

A TWENTY-CONCERT WEEKEND.

There were twenty-one concerts scheduled to take place on Saturday and Sunday, a number probably unequalled in the record. One of them, that of the Society of the Friends of Music at the Ritz, was wisely postponed to a less jammed-up period next Sunday. Of the score that remained, not more than a half-dozen were attended by paying audiences. Some of the twenty deserved these and got them not, others got them and deserved them not. But most of them got what they deserved. So wags the world in its only roughly just appraisements.

One seeks to wag no better than the rest of the world in the face of twenty concerts in halls, theatres and opera houses. So one may merely single out for bare mention a few of the twenty—the continuation of Walter Damrosch's pleasant and profitable argosy to children on Saturday mornings at Aeolian Hall; the third matinee of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall, notable for a first performance of Debussy's "Jeux," made from a lawn tennis dance-pantomime; an evening of plenteous Wagnerian excerpts on Saturday at Carnegie Hall played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, hugely enjoyed by a very large audience and thus attesting the hunger of the people for this music in spite of its indifferent revelation; a recital by the ineffably placid [illegible]fetz yesterday afternoon [illegible] similar in all re[illegible]eam, to the other [illegible]receding; [illegible]drome

TELEGRAM
ress New York City
JAN 10 19[illegible]

This afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux leads the brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra through the cheerful mazes of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. A symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounoff is also on the programme.

The most interesting feature of the programme, however, is Debussy's symphonic poem "Jeux." Mr. Monteux conducted this work with De Diaghileff's Russian Ballet in Paris when Nijinsky danced to its measures in a colorful Bakst setting.

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

Address: New York

Date 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

HERALD
ess New York City
JAN 4 - 1920

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's pre ude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto" waltz.

At the Saturday matinee concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6. The remainder of the programme will be Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" [illegible]play), which Mr. Monteux is [illegible]

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL
Address: New York
Date DEC 27

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Morning Telegraph
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux's January 8 Program Includes Debussy's "Danced Poem" for First Time.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From SUN
Address New York City
Date DEC 28 1919

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, is as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem, "Jenx," ("Play"), new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz.

HERALD
ss New York City
DEC 28 1919

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude, are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date D DE

Boston Symphony.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounow's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date DEC 28

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, Jan. 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude, are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

From EVENING SUN
New York City
DEC 27 1919

THE SYMPHONIES.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From SUN
ss New York City

programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Thursday evening is as follows: symphony, C minor; Gluck, "Iphigenie in Aulis"; Wagner, "Parsifal"; Liszt, "Mephisto" programme for the Saturday January 10 is as follows: symphony, "Pastoral"; Debost ou poem "Jeux," ("Play") new ly feedi unov, symphonic poem, re egg ne," (built upon Russian EED.

From HERALD
Address New York City
Date

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the great barytones of the day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under institute auspices in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural thrill.

Monteux Conducts a Fine Performance of Brahms and Wagner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third visit of the season, gave cause for rejoicing to its friends at Carnegie Hall last night, first by a beautiful performance of Brahms's C-minor symphony, led by the French conductor, Pierre Monteux, and second, both in this work and in Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude, by a superb quality of strings, which defied a night of soft, soggy weather. After the symphony Mr. Monteux rightly beckoned the band to rise with him in acknowledging the applause.

In the "Parsifal" music, of which a dramatic revival is pending, it is certain no finer sonorities have been attained during the recent years of little Wagner; the conductor took two recalls before the house insisted on having the whole orchestra stand again. Before Wagner's prelude came Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and after it Liszt's intended diabolic dance, the "Mephisto Waltz," composed for a village tavern scene in Lenau's "Faust."

From Times
New York

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will appear in recital tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy.

Emilio de Gogorza is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert on Friday evening.

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 4

UNDER INSTITUTE AUSPI

Rachmaninoff Recital M
Boston Symphony
Evening.

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening. He will sing familiar arias from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore" and Gluck's "Iphegenie en Aulide." The purely orchestral numbers will disclose further Mr. Monteux's ability in the Brahms C Minor Symphony, a symphonic poem by Glyzounov, and two selections from Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

From EAGLE
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From CITIZEN
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCER

Emilio de Gogorza to Be Assisting Artist.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under Institute auspices, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 9, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural thrill.

From EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
JAN 3 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening as its chief number the first Symphony of Brahms, and at the Saturday matinee Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, as well as a first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

From EVENING POST,
New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinée on January 10, the Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral." A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony Programs.

the season's third Boston Symconcert to be given in Carnegie rsday evening, Pierre Monteux t the First Symphony in C Brahms, Gluck's Overture to a in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude sifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto For the Saturday matinee, the will be Beethovens "Pastoral" d the rest of the program Deanced Poem, "Joux" ("Play"), Monteux is introducing to and Glazounoff's Symphonic Razine."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Morning Telegraph
New York City
JAN 4 192

Boston Symphony Concerts.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the Symphony will be Beethoven's Pastorale No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk

From EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
JAN 3 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening as its chief number the first Symphony of Brahms, and at the Saturday matinee Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, as well as a first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

From TELEGRAM
New York City
JAN 3

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephis to Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.
JAN 3 - 1920

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gorgorza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B-flat, considered one of the finest achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this co-called "Dance Poem," under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. On that occasion Nijinsky staged and danced an accompaniment of love and tennis balls in a garden. There will be still further interest in the final number — Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folksongs for its themes.

Baltimore, Md.

NEW SYMPHONY ARTIST

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night.

Mr. De Gogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Debussy's a dance poem, "Jeux"; MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, and Giatounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From EVENING JOURNAL
New York City
JAN 19 192

A TWENTY-CONCERT WEEKEND.

There were twenty-one concerts scheduled to take place on Saturday and Sunday, a number probably unequalled in the record. One of them, that of the Society of the Friends of Music at the Ritz, was wisely postponed to a less jammed-up period next Sunday. Of the score that remained, not more than a half-dozen were attended by paying audiences. Some of the twenty deserved these and got them not, others got them and deserved them not. But most of them got what they deserved. So wags the world in its only roughly just appraisements.

One seeks to wag no better than the rest of the world in the face of twenty concerts in halls, theatres and opera houses. So one may merely single out for bare mention a few of the twenty—the continuation of Walter Damrosch's pleasant and profitable argosy to children on Saturday mornings at Aeolian Hall; the third matinee of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall, notable for a first performance of Debussy's "Jeux," made from a lawn tennis dance-pantomime; an evening of plenteous Wagnerian excerpts on Saturday at Carnegie Hall played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, hugely enjoyed by a very large audience and thus attesting the hunger of the people for this music in spite of its indifferent revelation; a recital by the ineffably placid [illegible]atz yesterday afternoon similar in all re[illegible]eam, to the other preceding; [illegible]drome

From TELEGRAM
ress New York City
JAN 10 1920

This afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux leads the brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra through the cheerful mazes of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

A symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounoff is also on the programme.

The most interesting feature of the programme, however, is Debussy's symphonic poem "Jeux." Mr. Monteux conducted this work with De Diaghileff's Russian Ballet in Paris when Nijinsky danced to its measures in a colorful Bakst setting.

From HERALD
ess New York City
JAN 4 - 1920

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night, Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's pre ude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto" waltz.

At the Saturday matinee concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6. The remainder of the programme will be Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (play), which Mr. Monteux conducted

From CITIZEN
Address: New York
Date JAN 3 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL

Address: New York

Date DEC 27

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux's January 8 Program Includes Debussy's "Danced Poem" for First Time.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From SUN

Address New York City

Date DEC 28 1919

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, is as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem, "Jenx," ("Play"), new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz.

HERALD

ss New York City

Mrs. Charles [illegible]

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

* * *

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, Jan. 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm, and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude, are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of this concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's Memphisto Waltz.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Boston Symphony.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounow's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 1920

EVENING SUN

New York City

JAN 3 - 1920

THE SYMPHONIES.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

SUN

ess New York City

The programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening is as follows: Brahms, symphony, C minor; Gluck, overture, "Iphigenie in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude, "Parsifal"; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz. The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem "Jeux," ("Play") new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz; Glazounoff, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," (built upon Russian folk themes).

From HERALD

Address New York City

Date

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the great barytones of the day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under institute auspices in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore." The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural thrill.

Monteux Conducts a Fine Performance of Brahms and Wagner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third visit of the season, gave cause for rejoicing to its friends at Carnegie Hall last night, first by a beautiful performance of Brahms's C-minor symphony, led by the French conductor, Pierre Monteux, and second, both in this work and in Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude, by a superb quality of strings, which defied a night of soft, soggy weather. After the symphony Mr. Monteux rightly beckoned the band to rise with him in acknowledging the applause.

In the "Parsifal" music, of which a dramatic revival is pending, it is certain no finer sonorities have been attained during the recent years of little Wagner; the conductor took two recalls before the house insisted on having the whole orchestra stand again. Before Wagner's prelude came Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and after it Liszt's intended diabolic dance, the "Mephisto Waltz," composed for a village tavern scene in Lenau's "Faust."

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

ESTABLISHED 1881

JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony Programs.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethovens "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Joux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

ESTABLISHED 1881

JAN 4 19

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the Symphony will be Beethoven's Pastorale No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk

From Times

New York

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will appear in recital tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy.

Emilio de Gogorza is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert next Friday evening.

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 4

UNDER INSTITUTE AUSPICES

Rachmaninoff Recital Monday; Boston Symphony Friday Evening.

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening. He will sing familiar arias from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore" and Gluck's "Iphegenie en Aulide." The purely orchestral numbers will disclose further Mr. Monteux's ability in the Brahms C Minor Symphony, a symphonic poem by Glyzounov, and two selections from Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From CITIZEN

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Emilio de Gogorza to Be Assisting Artist.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under Institute auspices, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 9, Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climaxes and beauty of lyrical episodes make it a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," of orchestral brilliance and supernatural

From JAN 3 - 1920

Evening Star

Baltimore, Md.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gorgorza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B-flat, considered one of the finest achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this co-called "Dance Poem," under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. On that occasion Nijinsky staged and danced an accompaniment of love and tennis balls in a garden. There will be still further interest in the final number — Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folksongs for its themes.

EVENING

Baltimore, Md.

NEW SYMPHONY ARTIST

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night.

Mr. De Gogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Debussy's a dance poem, "Jeux"; MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, and Glatounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From EVENING JOURNAL

Address New York City

Date JAN 1 9 192

A TWENTY-CONCERT WEEKEND.

There were twenty-one concerts scheduled to take place on Saturday and Sunday, a number probably unequalled in the record. One of them, that of the Society of the Friends of Music at the Ritz, was wisely postponed to a less jammed-up period next Sunday. Of the score that remained, not more than a half-dozen were attended by paying audiences. Some of the twenty deserved these and got them not, others got them and deserved them not. But most of them got what they deserved. So wags the world in its only roughly just appraisements.

One seeks to wag no better than the rest of the world in the face of twenty concerts in halls, theatres and opera houses. So one may merely single out for bare mention a few of the twenty—the continuation of Walter Damrosch's pleasant and profitable argosy to children on Saturday mornings at Aeolian Hall; the third matinee of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall, notable for a first performance of Debussy's "Jeux," made from a lawn tennis dance-pantomime; an evening of plenteous Wagnerian excerpts on Saturday at Carnegie Hall played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, hugely enjoyed by a very large audience and thus attesting the hunger of the people for this music in spite of its indifferent revelation; a recital by the ineffably placid Heifetz yesterday afternoon [illegible] similar in all respects, to the other [illegible] preceding; [illegible] drome

From EVENING POST,

New York City

Boston Symphony Concerts.

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz." For the Saturday matinée on January 10, the Symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral." A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk

EVENING JOURNAL

New York City

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening as its chief number the first Symphony of Brahms, and at the Saturday matinee Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, as well as a first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

TELEGRAM

New York City

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on January 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

ROBERT GILBERT WELSH.

Address: New York

Date 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

TELEGRAM

New York City

JAN 1

This afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux leads the brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra through the cheerful mazes of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

A symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounoff is also on the programme.

The most interesting feature of the programme, however, is Debussy's symphonic poem "Jeux." Mr. Monteux conducted this work with De Diaghileff's Russian Ballet in Paris when Nijinsky danced to its measures in a colorful Bakst setting.

HERALD

ess New York City

JAN 1

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto" waltz.

At the Saturday matinee concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6. The remainder of the programme will be Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (play), which Mr. Monteux is

From N. Y. COMMERCIAL

Address: New York

Date DEC 27

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BRILLIANT PROGRAM

Conductor Monteux's January 8 Program Includes Debussy's "Danced Poem" for First Time.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From SUN

Address New York City

Date DEC 28 1911

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, January 8, is as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Gluck, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem, "Jenx," ("Play"), new here; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz.

HERALD

ss New York City

DEC 28 1911

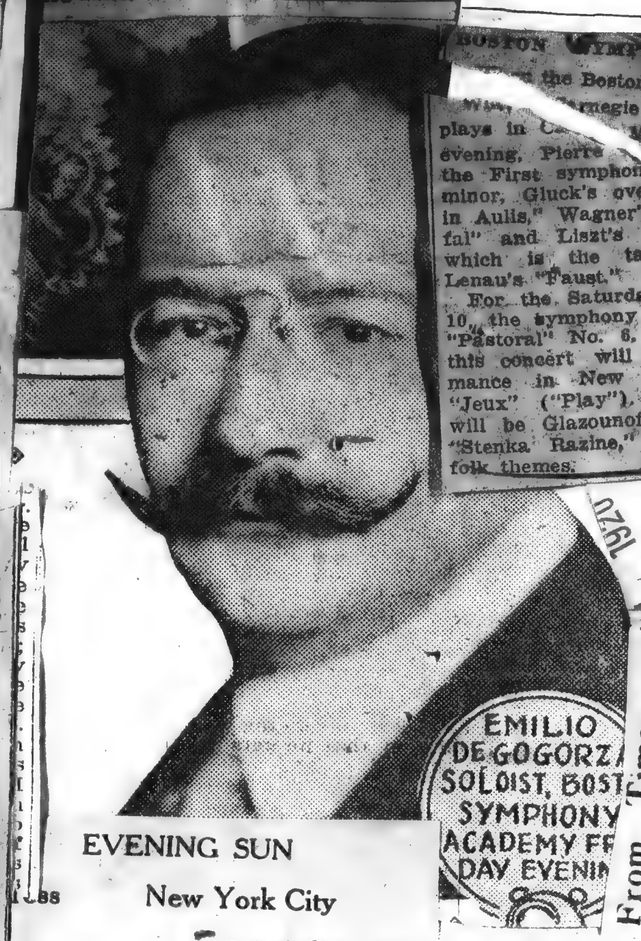
Mrs. Clements and Mr. [illegible]

At the season's third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, to take place on Friday evening, January 9, the soloist will be Emilio de Gogorza, whose interpretive charm and whose voice of particular lustrous amplitude are unrivalled upon the concert stage. He is to sing the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." For the symphonic portion of his concert Pierre Monteux will conduct Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony No. 5, Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

CITIZEN

ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 28



EVENING SUN

New York City

JAN 3 - 192

THE SYMPHONIES.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10 the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

SUN

ss New York City

The programme for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening is as follows: Brahms, symphony, C minor; Gluck, overture, "Iphigenie in Aulis"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Liszt, "Mephisto" waltz. The programme for the Saturday matinee on January 10 is as follows: Beethoven, symphony, "Pastoral"; Debussy, dance poem "Jeux," ("Play") new here; Glazounov, symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," (built upon Russian folk themes).

From HERALD

Address New York City

Date

$10 Monthly Until Paid.

6 Used Upright Pianos under $250

$5 Monthly Until Paid.

4 Used Upright Pianos under $225

ESTABLISHED 1881

JAN - 9 1920

From Times

New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Monteux Conducts a Fine Performance of Brahms and Wagner.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its third visit of the season, gave cause for rejoicing to its friends at Carnegie Hall last night, first by a beautiful performance of Brahms's C-minor symphony, led by the French conductor, Pierre Monteux, and second, both in this work and in Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude, by a superb quality of strings, which defied a night of soft, soggy weather. After the symphony Mr. Monteux rightly beckoned the band to rise with him in acknowledging the applause.

In the "Parsifal" music, of which a dramatic revival is pending, it is certain no finer sonorities have been attained during the recent years of little Wagner; the conductor took two recalls because the house insisted on having the orchestra stand again. Before the prelude came Gluck's to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and after it Liszt's interesting dance, the "Mephisto Waltz," composed for a village tavern scene in Lenau's "Faust."

From EAGLE

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date DEC

Boston Symphony.

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Glazounow's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine." For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

EVENING MAIL

ess: New York City

JAN 3 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephis to Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee, January 10, the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," built upon Russian folk themes.

From Times

New York City

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

Eddy Brown with the Philadelphia and Boston Orchestras are visitors to New York this week, with programs announced in this column last Sunday.

From Times

New York City

JAN 4 1920

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will appear in recital tomorrow evening at the Brooklyn Academy.

Emilio de Gogorza is announced as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Brooklyn concert next Friday evening.

m EAGLE

dress Brooklyn, N. Y.

te JAN 4 1920

UNDER INSTITUTE AUSPICES

Rachmaninoff Recital Monday. Boston Symphony Friday Evening.

Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music Friday evening. He will sing familiar arias from Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore" and Gluck's "Iphegenie en Aulide." The purely orchestral numbers will disclose further Mr. Monteux's ability in the Brahms C Minor Symphony, a symphonic poem by Glyzounov, and two selections from Liszt's Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust."

EAGLE

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 4 1920

Boston Symphony.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). Since Mr. Monteux also conducted the first public performance of the piece under the composer's personal direction, an authoritative reading may be expected. The final number will be [illegible]noff's Symph[illegible] ress: [illegible]d, N. Y.

e JAN 4

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Emilio de Gogorza to Be Assisting Artist.

With his seeming fondness for music that echoes Parisian opera stages, Emilio de Gogorza, one of the greatest baritones of our day, will sing at the Boston Symphony concert, given under Institute auspices, in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 9. Gluck's aria, "Pitiless Diana," from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Massenet "Promesse de mon avenir," from Massenet's "King of Lahore."

The first symphony of Brahms in C minor, whose broad sweep, fine climax and beauty of lyrical episodes make a perennial favorite, will be heard at this concert, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" of orchestral brilliance and supe[illegible]

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

Boston Symphony Programs.

[illegible] the season's third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Pierre Monteux will conduct the First Symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust."

For the Saturday matinee, the symphony will be Beethovens "Pastoral" No. 6, and the rest of the program Debussy's Danced Poem, "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine."

ESTABLISHED 1881

JAN 4 19[illegible]

From Morning Telegraph

New York City

[illegible]phony Concerts.

[illegible]e Singin

[illegible]on Symphony Orchestra [illegible]e Hall next Thursday, 8, Pierre Monteux will [illegible] symphony of Brahms [illegible]k's Overture to "Iphi- Wagner's Prelude to [illegible]iszt's "Mephisto Waltz," [illegible]rn episode from Lenau's [illegible]he Saturday matinee on [illegible]ly strong Symphony will be Bee- [illegible]rale No. 6. A notable [illegible]oncert will be the first [illegible]New York of Debussy's [illegible]. Since Mr. Monteux [illegible]first public performance [illegible]der the composer's per- [illegible]an authoritative reading [illegible]. The final number will [illegible] symphonic poem, "Stenbuilt upon Russian folk

[illegible]NING POST,

York City

Concerts.

Symphony Orchestra Hall next Thursday will conduct the [illegible]k's overture [illegible]'s Prelude [illegible]Waltz."

[illegible]ary [illegible]ersons as artists [illegible]riters" [illegible]who have faithfully and [illegible]'s [illegible]ack during the past twelve [illegible]by instructed to go out on [illegible]of their [illegible]com- [illegible]icative [illegible]al num- [illegible]ic Poem, [illegible]Russian folk

EVENING JOURNAL

New York City

JAN 8 -

The Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible]ys in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening as its chief number the [illegible]st Symphony of Brahms, and at Saturday matinee Beethoven's [illegible]storal" Symphony, as well as a [illegible]t performance in New York of Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play").

TELEGRAM

New York City

JAN [illegible]

[illegible]n the Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible]n Carnegie Hall next Thursday January 8, Pierre Monteux will [illegible]e first symphony of Brahms in [illegible]uck's overture to "Iphigenia in [illegible]ner's prelude to "Parsifal" [illegible]ephis to Waltz," which is [illegible]de from Lenau's "Faust." [illegible] matinee on January [illegible] will be Beethoven's [illegible] notable part of this [illegible]st performance in [illegible]Jeux" ("Play"). [illegible] conducted the [illegible]e piece under [illegible]rection, an [illegible]ected. [illegible]ounoff's [illegible]e," built

From N. [illegible]

Address: New York

Date [illegible]3 1920

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony of Brahms in C minor, Gluck's, overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust." For the Saturday matinee on Jan. 10, the symphony will be, Beethoven's "Pastoral" No. 6. A notable part of this concert will be the first performance in New York [illegible] Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"). The final number will be Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

From Evening Star

Baltimore, Md.

JAN 3 - 1920

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

As soloist at the Boston Symphony concert, to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, Emilio de Gorgorza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct at this concert Chausson's powerful and eloquent symphony in B-flat, considered one of the finest achievements of the French school of music. Notable also will be Debussy's "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America. Since he also conducted the first public performance of this co-called "Danced Poem," under the personal guidance of Debussy himself, an authoritative reading may be expected. On that occasion Nijinsky staged and danced an accompaniment of love and tennis balls in a garden. There will be still further interest in the final number — Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," which uses noted Russian folksongs for its themes.

EVENING [illegible]

Baltimore, Md.

NEW SYMPHONY ARTIST

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place at the Lyric Theatre tomorrow night.

Mr. De Gogorza, who was announced to be soloist at this concert, has contracted a severe cold and will be unable to sing. He will be replaced by Leo Ornstein, noted composer and pianist, who will play MacDowell's brilliant concerto in D minor, No. 2, a work which he recently played at the symphony concerts in Boston with marked success.

As changed the program will read: Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Debussy's a dance poem, "Jeux"; MacDowell's piano concerto in D minor, and Giatounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

[illegible] EVENING JOURNAL

ddress New York City

ate JAN 19 1921

A TWENTY-CONCERT WEEKEND.

There were twenty-one concerts scheduled to take place on Saturday and Sunday, a number probably unequalled in the record. One of them, that of the Society of the Friends of Music at the Ritz, was wisely postponed to a less jammed-up period next Sunday. Of the score that remained, not more than a half-dozen were attended by paying audiences. Some of the twenty deserved these and got them not, others got them and deserved them not. But most of them got what they deserved. So wags the world in its only roughly just appraisements.

One seeks to wag no better than the rest of the world in the face of twenty concerts in halls, theatres and opera houses. So one may merely single out for bare mention a few of the twenty—the continuation of Walter Damrosch's pleasant and profitable argosy to children on Saturday mornings at Aeolian Hall; the third matinee of the Boston Orchestra on Saturday morning at Carnegie Hall, notable for a first performance of Debussy's "Jeux," made from a lawn tennis dance-pantomime; an evening of plenteous Wagnerian excerpts on Saturday at Carnegie Hall played by the Philharmonic Orchestra, hugely enjoyed by a very large audience and thus attesting the hunger of the people for this music in spite of its indifferent revelation; a recital by the ineffably placid [illegible]fetz yesterday afternoon [illegible] similar in all re- [illegible]am, to the other preceding; [illegible]drome

TELEGRAM

ress New York City

L JAN 10 1920

This afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux leads the brilliant Boston Symphony Orchestra through the cheerful mazes of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

A symphonic poem by the Russian Glazounoff is also on the programme.

The most interesting feature of the programme, however, is Debussy's symphonic poem "Jeux." Mr. Monteux conducted this work with De Diaghileff's Russian Ballet in Paris when Nijinsky danced to its measures in a colorful Bakst setting.

HERALD

ess New York City

JAN 4 - 1920

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday night Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's pre ude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz.

At the Saturday matinee concert the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6. The remainder of the programme will be Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (play), which Mr. Monteux [illegible]

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

JAN -9 1920

Boston Symphony Concert.

In the evening at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, delivered a capital program with splendid effect and to the entire satisfaction of a large audience. Brahms's First Symphony in C-minor was, probably, the best-played and the most cordially appreciated event of the evening. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the precious tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust," was beautifully played and there were fine performances of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal."

From Tribune
New York City

JAN -9 1920

Boston Symphony Is Heard in a Recital

Monteux Conducts Program Which Includes Works of Brahms and Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a large audience at Carnegie Hall last evening, giving an opportunity to observe M. Pierre Monteux as a conductor of the music of Brahms, Gluck, Wagner and Liszt.

Perhaps the least familiar work on the program was the overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," the first opera written by Gluck for Paris, sung in 1774. The other pieces were Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Op. 68; then Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust" and "The Dance in the Village Tavern," with the famous Mephisto Waltz.

M. Monteux's readinf of the symphony was massive and concrete. Still less inspired was his conducting of the prelude from "Parsifal," which he divided into fragmentary sections, separated by exaggerated pauses, the whole woefully lackiny in psirit and fundamental driving force.

From American
New York City

Boston Symphony Features Brahms; Farrar at Opera

By MAX SMITH.

PIERRE MONTEAUX tackled Brahms at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while it can hardly be said that he disclosed any interpretative qualities hitherto unsuspected, he bore the test with colors flying more conspicuously than one might have anticipated.

The German master's symphony, in which the conductor elected to measure his strength, was the one in C minor, No. 1. New Yorkers have heard it under the direction of various wielders of the baton, big and small, among them, to mention a few, Nikisch, Dr. Muck, Fiedler, Damrosch, Stransky, Oberdorffer, Stokowski and Bodanzky.

In characterizing Monsieur Monteux's reading briefly it may be said that it was straightforward and unaffected, if somewhat rigid, heavy, stolid and lacking in rythmical incisiveness.

Considered in its entirety, the symphony was played with too much dynamic stress and with too little variety of tone modulation. Hardly once did Monteux produce a genuine pianissimo, and usually he induced the strings to overemphasize their cantilena. Thus he permitted his concert master. Mr. Fradkin, to play the lovely solo in the andante altogether too robustly.

Monsieur Monteux's main tempi, though lacking in pliancy, were on the whole fairly satisfactory. Generally speaking, he showed an inclination to set a pace somewhat faster than is usually adopted. That was not the case, however, in the famous Beethovenish "Allegro non troppo ma con brio" in the Finale, though he took it somewhat faster than either Damrosch or Stransky. Other selections on the programme were Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis"—perhaps the most satisfactory contribution; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Dance in the Village Tavern," popularly known as the Mephisto Waltz.

The audience was large and demonstrative.

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

As soloist of the Boston Symphony concert to be given in the Academy of Music under Institute auspices next Friday evening, Jan. 9, Emilio de Gorgoza, the famous baritone, will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, a perennial favorite, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From Herald
New York City

JAN -9 1920

Boston Men Play Brahms' Symphony

While there were many interesting things in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, the programme was not selected to display the special talents of the men from Massachusetts and their French conductor, Pierre Monteux, at their best. Brahms' first symphony was the most important offering, and the performance went smoothly and in an orderly manner from its calm start to the tempestuous ending.

But New York music lovers have become used to readings of a more virile character than the one Mr. Monteux gave. In Paris, no doubt, his interpretation would have been considered excellent. He has been schooled in the French way of doing the classics. So it is not altogether his fault that his Brahms readings fail here. There was not enough dramatic force. There was too much smoothness and lightness. This is a gigantic work. The climaxes in the final movement are tremendous. But there were no thrills. New York likes its Brahms done with a more sturdy beat.

The orchestra sounded very well. Precision of attack was commendable and the tone was ingratiating. Parts were set off against each other with proper balance. It was all well done, but not brilliant or thrilling.

The remainder of the programme was devoted to the beautiful overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Tauride," the prelude to "Parsifal" and two Liszt numbers.

The audience was large and it received the Boston visitors enthusiastically.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Boston Men Play Brahms's First Symphony

By Sylvester Rawling.

PIERRE MONTEUX and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night presented a programme of marked contrasts. The mood of each number was well maintained and the playing of the band throughout was of such sterling quality that the critical audience was aroused to reward it with unusually warm applause. Mr. Monteux began with Brahms's noble first symphony, which he interpreted with fine breadth, the first and last movements with fitting sonority and the second with rare delicacy. Between Gluck's charming "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture and Liszt's sardonic "Mephisto Waltz" there came an impressive pronouncement of Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude. Mr. Monteux was wise in making the pauses before and after it long.

Date

The Bostons in New York.

Brahms's late born first symphony, over which the theorists have argued mightily while famous conductors fought for its premiere playing in New York, was the chief work upon the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It was the third Thursday evening concert of the season by Mr. Monteux and his men.

Eclectic indeed was the remainder of the programme, though its gaze was wholly backward. No newcomer like Griffes this time. Gluck's stately overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" gave way to the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," timely enough in its advance upon the February revival at the Metropolitan. Completing the evening came Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust"—the "Memphisto Waltz" in more familiar terms, which Liszt wished all in vain to be forever and inalienably joined to the first episode.

Terrific indeed was the battle of words which followed a first hearing of this waltz in various cities. Faust and the black eyed peasant girl are far from the pinkly quilted interpretation which Gounod chose, for example—or even from the sombre, uncanny pageant of horrors and philosophies the other opera makers set to marching. For here in the Liszt piece first hearers found a sickening sensuality, an ugliness of brutish lust and crazed desire. Yet nowadays . . . . well, the work still stirs and tingles. But most of that fiercely, purposely perpetrated ugliness the English critics hissed at is as telling and pictorial of theme as some of to-day's French symphonies. Portions, for instance, of the D'Indy one latest heard here. Only D'Indy chose the horizon blue of la Patrie for his cloak's color, while Liszt preferred to go to the devil and borrow his scarlet.

The audience, as large as always and as much as always reverent of the excellent ensemble of instruments, took its most evident pleasure from the exquisite reading Mr. Monteux

VENING GLOBE
New York City

JAN

Music.

Ovation for Monteux as Leader of Brahms Symphony.

The first symphony of Brahms, the mighty C minor, headed the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Has any symphony been played oftener in New York in the last fifteen years? Has any symphony enlisted the attentions of more conductors of high rank? I recall a Saturday and the succeeding Sunday some years ago which brought three performances of the work within the span of two days to Carnegie Hall alone. I recall a performance of the work by the London Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, which made even the supposedly arid spots of the andante and the allegretto blossom like the rose.

And yet the performance last evening by the matchless band from Boston, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, was one of the most remarkable and one of the most heartily applauded that this town has known. I do not remember ever hearing the andante played with the perfection of balance, the exquisite transparency of tone in every part, the eloquent treatment of detail, and the firm modelling of the whole design that marked the performance of yesterday. But such praise is academic, chilling. It gives no idea of the vital, bright, compelling thing that was the playing of this andante.

In the allegretto Mr. Monteux was exceedingly free in his dynamics, his tempi, his use of rubato. But never did he hint remotely at dulness, and the suggestion of triviality that has marred this movement was absent. The finale was majestic in its mass and sonority, and at the same time superbly impetuous in its invincible march. The audience (not quite as large as is usual at these concerts) was deeply impressed by the performance of the symphony and after the andante and again at the close gave Mr. Monteux and his men an ovation. The conductor properly had the men rise each time to share with him in acknowledging the tribute of the house.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture (with the Richard Wagner ending), the prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" ("The Dance in the Village Tavern" after Lenau's "Faust").

The performance of the Gluck overture was classic, romantic, what you will—as beautiful as a Phidian marble, and alive. The prelude to "Parsifal" Mr. Monteux laid on the background of silence in the great strokes of some supreme fresco, heroic in scale, of unplumbed richness in pigment. The first attack of the Boston violins, drenched in color and radiant of light, gave the keynote of the picture. More than any Wagner prelude (except that to "Das Rheingold") the prelude to "Parsifal" is music of the theatre. One expects the darkened Metropolitan, the expectant hush of the audience, the huge golden curtain bellying in the light that never was on land or sea. But the performance last evening in the crude glare of the unmitigated concert hall was an evocation that obliterated memories and transported the mind. With its close the concert should have ended. It did end there for some of the audience, who went out into the night, gladly missing the meretricious blandishments of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

PITTS SANBORN.

From WORLD,
New York City

JAN -9 1920

MUSIC
by
James Gibbons Huneker

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A nasty night for strings; a nasty night for music-making; a nasty night for musicians, above all, for music critics and all sorts of temperamental cats. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Brahms as if the skies were azure, full of fiddles and angels, as the old saying goes. To come back to earth, the third concert of the season was heard in Carnegie Hall. It was the most interesting affair thus far of the series, because the band played beautifully and Conductor Pierre Monteux read the first symphony of Brahms in an eloquent manner. So, wind and weather, musically speaking, were propitious, after all.

Mr. Monteux's musicianship was put to a stern test in the Brahms, and we do not hesitate to state that we have never heard him interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. "Ce cher copain Pierre" has suffered the lot of the versatile; when he was at the Metropolitan Opera we were sure that he would be better placed in the concert room. When he assumed the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra we praised his finished reading of "Le Coq d'Or." And last night he presented a large and delighted audience with a satisfactory version of the C minor symphony. The blue bird of happiness seldom beats its wings about the head of any conductor. No, not even Mr. Wolff's.

Not to go into details, the symphony was massive and passionate in the first movement, tenderly poetic in the second, of a just tempo and balance in the allegretto and spirited in the finale. There were homogeneity, elasticity, power and tonal plangency. The principal performers in their brief solos were gratifying, the concertmaster, the first hornist and Mr. Longy, who swallowed a certain phrase, the length of which bespoke his wonderful breath control, and on that teasing and charming instrument, the oboe. The drummer is a demon. We said so last season. A Dempsey, a Carpentier, in one. It's rather curious too that whenever we assert that the New York Symphony Orchestra is the best band in the land, the Boston boys creep over and steal a base from the home team. But this is elevating criticism to the dignity of a sport. Suffice to say that Mr. Monteux and his men wore aureoles after the playing of that Brahms symphony.

Nor did they dim those emblems of glory when the Gluck overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" was finished. It was charming in setiment and color, and again the string choirs were of a noble sonorousness. The prelude to "Parsifal" followed, and the programme, a well-contrasted one, closed with the brilliant Liszt setting of several episodes in Lenau's "Faust." We did not hear it. But the Brahms we shall long remember.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

By KATHARINE LANE.

THAT breath of false spring in the air last night forced its way into Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing for its rapt audience. It was caught up in the majestic rejoicing of the last movement of Brahms' first symphony; the brass had a kind of splendid jubilation that was like the stirring of new life, blended with the contemplation of an ancient fabric woven from human hearts since the first pulse began to beat. Mr. Monteux, never very subtle in his varying lights and shadows, led his men through the Brahms with solemn ardor.

There was graceful simplicity in his reading of Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Tauride"; he treated the Parsifal prelude with a kind of rigid wholesomeness and finished with Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," from Lenau's "Faust," in which he released something of the Latin abandon that one expects from a French conductor. The Liszt music, that was denounced as diabolical in 1870, falls with gentle reason on our sophisticated ears.

n TELEGRAM
ress New York City

JAN 8 - 1920 B

Taking its place in a crowded period of local orchestral music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in Carnegie Hall last night with Pierre Monteux conducting.

The programme was an eclectic one, including a symphony—the first—by Brahms, an overture by Gluck, the "Parsifal" prelude and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz.

Brahms' symphony was given a noble reading. The other numbers were well played and the subscribers to the Big Band from Boston went home last night in the happy consciousness of having listened to a widely divergent programme.

EVENING POST,
New York City

Music

Henry T. Finck

When he arrived in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra had finished the first symphony of Brahms, and was, under M. Monteux, giving a fine performance of Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" overture, in the French style, which is all right, for Gluck was, musically at any rate, a Parisian. The audience was also very glad to hear a performance of the "Parsifal" prelude, which gave M. Monteux a chance to display the mellow richness of his orchestral tints. Less satisfactory was the performance of Liszt's "Dance in the Village Tavern," which might have been considerably more orgiastic without violating the laws of musical propriety. The hall was crowded and there was much applause for both orchestra and

SUN
ess New York City
e

JAN -9 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS MANY MOODS

Brahms, Gluck, Wagner and Liszt Featured in the Programme.

AN IMPETUOUS RENDITION

Prelude to "Parsifal" and "Mephisto" Waltz Among Other Numbers Heard.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening was an entertainment of various moods and styles, yet perhaps the imaginative, introspective or mystical might have found in it a sort of increasing purpose such as Tennyson found running through the ages. The symphony was the first of Brahms, the tenth of the eclectic series of Von Buelow. The other numbers were the "Iphigenie in Aulis" overture of Gluck as prepared for concert use by Wagner. This led up to a more modern prelude, that of the sacred festival play, "Parsifal," and then by way of epilogue and, perhaps, sardonic commentary on the whole, the "Mephisto" waltz of that good old man, the Abbe Liszt.

The Brahms music constituted the first part of the overture. A ten minute intermission separated it from the songs of the ungodly, who might have been regarded by Hanslick as all being allied against it. But like the mother of Spartacus we may bid the children to speak no more of those old wars and savage chiefs. Peace reigns to-day between the serpent and the seed of Gluck. The Brahms symphony is heard pretty often. The Boston orchestra has played it here many times, but never before quite in the same manner as it did last evening.

Pierre Monteux is the conductor of the orchestra now, a Frenchman addicted to operas and ballet a la Russe. But evidently he too loves Brahms. His enthusiasms do not lead him in the direction of dalliance with tender nuance, but rather into the blasts of a fiery furnace of impetuosity. He thunders in the index and blazes throughout. The first movement of the symphony went almost furiously. There was smoke around it. Little of elegant clarity was to be found, but of nervous energy a plenty.

Matters improved in the slow movement, in which certain solo players had opportunities to exhibit the excellence of their art. One remembers the long breathed phrases of the great oboist Longy and the clean violin playing of the earnest Fradkin. And, generally speaking, there was a nicer ensemble.

The third movement was just a movement, steady and regular, without any special point. It seemed to suggest little to the sincere Mr. Monteux. Of course the finale made an effect. It is impossible to rob this movement of its entire importance. Mr. Monteux's energetic style suited it. To be sure the brass could have been a little more considerate, but on the whole the rushing performance of the music had a certain rude eloquence. The tone of the orchestra was good and one rejoiced to hear the golden voice of the flute repeating in rich accent the long drawn phrase of the horns.

The third matinee will be given tomorrow afternoon, when a symphony of far different type will be performed, to wit: Beethoven's "Pastoral." There will also be some Debussy and a little Glazounov.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

JAN 1 - 1920 B

NOTED BARITONE HERE WEDNESDAY

Emilio de Gogorza, who will be special soloist at the third Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Mr. Gogorza was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., of Spanish ancestry. He married Mme. Emma Eames, noted soprano, in 1911.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

JAN -9 1920

Boston Symphony Concert.

In the evening at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, delivered a capital program with splendid effect and to the entire satisfaction of a large audience. Brahms's First Symphony in C minor was, probably, the best-played and the most cordially appreciated event of the evening. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which is the precious tavern episode from Lenau's "Faust," was beautifully played and there were fine performances of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal."

JAN -9 1920

From
Tribune
New York City

Boston Symphony Is Heard in a Recital

Monteux Conducts Program Which Includes Works of Brahms and Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a large audience at Carnegie Hall last evening, giving an opportunity to observe M. Pierre Monteux as a conductor of the music of Brahms, Gluck, Wagner and Liszt.

Perhaps the least familiar work on the program was the overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide," the first opera written by Gluck for Paris, sung in 1774. The other pieces were Brahms' first symphony in C minor, Op. 68; then Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust" and "The Dance in the Village Tavern," with the famous Mephisto Waltz.

M. Monteaux's readinf of the symphony was massive and concrete. Still less inspired was his conducting of the prelude from "Parsifal," which he divided into fragmentary sections, separated by exaggerated pauses, the whole woefully lackiny in psirit and fundamental driving force.

From American
New York City

Boston Symphony Features Brahms; Farrar at Opera

By MAX SMITH.

PIERRE MONTEAUX tackled Brahms at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while it can hardly be said that he disclosed any interpretative qualities hitherto unsuspected, he bore the test with colors flying more conspicuously than one might have anticipated.

The German master's symphony, in which the conductor elected to measure his strength, was the one in C minor, No. 1. New Yorkers have heard it under the direction of various wielders of the baton, big and small, among them, to mention a few, Nikisch, Dr. Muck, Fiedler, Damrosch, Stransky, Oberdorffer, Stokowski and Bodanzky.

In characterizing Monsieur Monteux's reading briefly it may be said that it was straightforward and unaffected, if somewhat rigid, heavy, stolid and lacking in rythmical incisiveness.

Considered in its entirety, the symphony was played with too much dynamic stress and with too little variety of tone modulation. Hardly once did Monteux produce a genuine pianissimo, and usually he induced the strings to overemphasize their cantilena. Thus he permitted his concert master, Mr. Fradkin, to play the lovely solo in the andante altogether too robustly.

Monsieur Monteux's main tempi, though lacking in pliancy, were on the whole fairly satisfactory. Generally speaking, he showed an inclination to set a pace somewhat faster than is usually adopted. This was not the case, however, in the famous Beethovenish "Allegro non troppo ma con brio" in the Finale, though he took it somewhat faster than either Damrosch or Stransky.

Other selections on the programme were Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis"—perhaps the most satisfac[tory] contribution; the Prelude to [Wag]ner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's [Dan]ce in the Village Tavern, [wide]ly known as the Mephisto [Wal]tz.

The audience was large a[nd] demonstrative.

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

As soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert to be given in the Academy of Music under Institute auspices next Friday evening, Jan. 9, Emilio de Gorgoza, the famous baritone will sing arias from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will conduct Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, a perennial favorite, also Glazounoff's thoroughly Russian symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From Herald
New York City

JAN -9 1920

Boston Men Play Brahms' Symphony

While there were many interesting things in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, the programme was not selected to display the special talents of the men from Massachusetts and their French conductor, Pierre Monteux, at their best. Brahms' first symphony was the most important offering, and the performance went smoothly and in an orderly manner from its calm start to the tempestuous ending.

But New York music lovers have become used to readings of a more virile character than the one Mr. Monteux gave. In Paris, no doubt, his interpretation would have been considered excellent. He has been schooled in the French way of doing the classics. So it is not altogether his fault that his Brahms readings fail here. There was not enough dramatic force. There was too much smoothness and lightness. This is a gigantic work. The climaxes in the final movement are tremendous. But there were no thrills. New York likes its Brahms done with a more sturdy beat.

The orchestra sounded very well. Precision of attack was commendable and the tone was ingratiating. Parts were set off against each other with proper balance. It was all well done, but not brilliant or thrilling.

The remainder of the programme was devoted to the beautiful overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Tauride," the prelude to "Parsifal" and two Liszt numbers.

The audience was large and it received the Boston visitors enthusiastically.

From
EVENING WORLD,
New York City

Boston Men Play Brahms's First Symphony

By Sylvester Rawling.

PIERRE MONTEUX and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night presented a programme of marked contrasts. The mood of each number was well maintained and the playing of the band throughout was of such sterling quality that the critical audience was aroused to reward it with unusually warm applause. Mr. Monteux began with Brahms's noble first symphony, which he interpreted with fine breadth, the first and last movements with fitting sobority and the second with rare delicacy. Between Gluck's charming "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture and Liszt's sardonic "Mephisto Waltz" there came an impressive pronouncement of Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude. Mr. Monteux was wise in making the pauses before and after it long.

late

Bostons in New York.

[Brahms]'s late born first symphony, [which] the theorists have argued [about] while famous conductors [have] for its premiere playing in [New] York, was the chief work upon [the] programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. It was the third Thursday evening concert of the season by Mr. [Monteux] and his men.

[Classic] indeed was the remainder of the programme, though its gaze [turned] wholly backward. No newcomer [to the] riffes this time. Gluck's stately [overture] to "Iphigenia in Aulis" gave [way to] the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," timely enough in its advance [notice] of the February revival at the Metropolitan. Completing the evening [were] Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust"—the "Memphisto Waltz" [and] more familiar terms, which Liszt [had] called all in vain to be forever and [forever] unbenably joined to the first episode. [The] terrific indeed was the battle of [words] which followed a first hearing of [Liszt's] waltz in various cities. Faust [and] the black eyed peasant girl are far [away] from the pinkly quilted interpretation which Gounod chose, for example—or even from the sombre, uncanny pageant of horrors and philosophies the other opera makers set to marching. For here in the Liszt piece first hearers found a sickening sensuality, an ugliness of brutish lust and crazed desire. Yet nowadays . . . . well, the work still stirs and tingles. But most of that fiercely, purposely perpetrated ugliness the English critics hissed at is as telling and pictorial of theme as some of to-day's French symphonies. Portions, for instance, of the D'Indy one latest heard here. Only D'Indy chose the horizon blue of la Patrie for his cloak's color, while Liszt preferred to go to the devil and borrow his scarlet.

The audience, as large as always and as much as always reverent of the excellent ensemble of instruments, took its most evident pleasure from the exquisite reading Mr. Monteux

VENING GLOBE
New York City

E JAN

Music.

Ovation for Monteux as Leader of Brahms Symphony.

The first symphony of Brahms, the mighty C minor, headed the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. Has any symphony been played oftener in New York in the last fifteen years? Has any symphony enlisted the attentions of more conductors of high rank? I recall a Saturday and the succeeding Sunday some years ago which brought three performances of the work within the span of two days to Carnegie Hall alone. I recall a performance of the work by the London Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, which made even the supposedly arid spots of the andante and the allegretto blossom like the rose.

And yet the performance last evening by the matchless band from Boston, under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, was one of the most remarkable and one of the most heartily applauded that this town has known. I do not remember ever hearing the andante played with the perfection of balance, the exquisite transparency of tone in every part, the eloquent treatment of detail, and the firm modelling of the whole design that marked the performance of yesterday. But such praise is academic, chilling. It gives no idea of the vital, bright, compelling thing that was the playing of this andante.

In the allegretto Mr. Monteux was exceedingly free in his dynamics, his tempi, his use of rubato. But never did he hint remotely at dulness, and the suggestion of triviality that has marred this movement was absent. The finale was majestic in its mass and sonority, and at the same time superbly impetuous in its invincible march. The audience (not quite as large as is usual at these concerts) was deeply impressed by the performance of the symphony and after the andante and again at the close gave Mr. Monteux and his men an ovation. The conductor properly had the men rise each time to share with him in acknowledging the tribute of the house.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture (with the Richard Wagner ending), the prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" ("The Dance in the Village Tavern" after Lenau's "Faust").

The performance of the Gluck overture was classic, romantic, whatever will—as beautiful as a Phidian frieze, and alive. The prelude to "Parsifal" Mr. Monteux laid on the ground of silence in the great strokes of some supreme fresco, heroic in scale, of unplumbed richness in pigment. The first attack of the Boston violins, drenched in color and radiant of light, gave the keynote of the picture. More than any Wagner prelude (except that to "Das Rheingold") the prelude to "Parsifal" is music of the theatre. One expects the curtained Metropolitan, the expectant hush of the audience, the huge golden curtain bellying in the light that never was on land or sea. But the performance last evening in the crude glare of the unmitigated concert hall was an evocation that obliterated memories and transported the mind. With its close the concert should have ended. It did end there for some of the audience, who went out into the night, gladly missing the meretricious blandishments of Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

PITTS SANBORN.

From WORLD, JAN -9 1920
New York City

MUSIC

by

James Gibbons Huneker

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A nasty night for strings; a nasty night for music-making; a nasty night for musicians, above all, for music critics and all sorts of temperamental cats. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Brahms as if the skies were azure, full of fiddles and angels, as the old saying goes. To come back to earth, the third concert of the season was heard in Carnegie Hall. It was the most interesting affair thus far of the series, because the band played beautifully and Conductor Pierre Monteux read the first symphony of Brahms in an eloquent manner. So, wind and weather, musically speaking, were propitious, after all.

Mr. Monteux's musicianship was put to a stern test in the Brahms, and we do not hesitate to state that we have never heard him interpret a great symphony like this with such authority and sympathetic understanding. "Ce cher copain Pierre" has suffered the lot of the versatile; when he was at the Metropolitan Opera we were sure that he would be better placed in the concert room. When he assumed the conductorship of the Boston Orchestra we praised his finished reading of "Le Coq d'Or." And last night he presented a large and delighted audience with a satisfactory version of the C minor symphony. The blue bird of happiness seldom beats its wings about the head of any conductor. No, not even Mr. Wolff's.

Not to go into details, the symphony was massive and passionate in the first movement, tenderly poetic in the second, of a just tempo and balance in the allegretto and spirited in the finale. There were homogeneity, elasticity, power and tonal plangency. The principal performers in their brief solos were gratifying, the concertmaster, the first hornist and Mr. Longy, who swallowed a certain phrase, the length of which bespoke his wonderful breath control, and on that teasing and charming instrument, the oboe. The drummer is a demon. We said so last season. A Dempsey, a Carpentier, in one. It's rather curious too that whenever we assert that the New York Symphony Orchestra is the best band in the land, the Boston boys creep over and steal a base from the home team. But this is elevating criticism to the dignity of a sport. Suffice to say that Mr. Monteux and his men wore aureoles after the playing of that Brahms symphony.

Nor did they dim those emblems of glory when the Gluck overture to "Iphegenia in Aulis" was finished. It was charming in setiment and color, and again the string choirs were of a noble sonorousness. The prelude to "Parsifal" followed, and the programme, a well-contrasted one, closed with the brilliant Liszt setting of several episodes in Lenau's "Faust." We did not hear it. But the Brahms we shall long remember.

EVENING MAIL
New York City

By KATHARINE LANE.

THAT breath of false spring in the air last night forced its way into Carnegie Hall, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra was playing for its rapt audience. It was caught up in the majestic rejoicing of the last movement of Brahms' first symphony; the brass had a kind of splendid jubilation that was like the stirring of new life, blended with the contemplation of an ancient fabric woven from human hearts since the first pulse began to beat. Mr. Monteux, never very subtle in his varying lights and shadows, led his men through the Brahms with solemn ardor.

There was graceful simplicity in his reading of Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie en Tauride"; he treated the Parsifal prelude with a kind of rigid wholesomeness and finished with Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," from Lenau's "Faust," in which he released something of the Latin abandon that one expects from a French conductor. The Liszt music, that was denounced as diabolical in 1870, falls with gentle reason on our sophisticated ears.

n TELEGRAM
ress New York City

JAN 8 - 1920 B

Taking its place in a crowded period of local orchestral music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in Carnegie Hall last night with Pierre Monteux conducting.

The programme was an eclectic one, including a symphony—the first—by Brahms, an overture by Gluck, the "Parsifal" prelude and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz.

Brahms' symphony was given a noble reading. The other numbers were well played and the subscribers to the Big Band from Boston went home last night in the happy consciousness of having listened to a widely divergent programme.

EVENING POST,
New York City

Music

Henry T. Finck

When he arrived in Carnegie Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra had finished the first symphony of Brahms, and was, under M. Monteux, giving a fine performance of Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide" overture, in the French style, which is all right, for Gluck was, musically at any rate, a Parisian. The audience was also very glad to hear a performance of the "Parsifal" prelude, which gave M. Monteux a chance to display the mellow richness of his orchestral tints. Less satisfactory was the performance of Liszt's "Dance in the Village Tavern," which might have been considerably more orgiastic without violating the laws of musical propriety. The hall was crowded and there was much applause for both orchestra and

h SUN
ess New York City
e 1-9 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY SHOWS MANY MOODS

Brahms, Gluck, Wagner and Liszt Featured in the Programme.

AN IMPETUOUS RENDITION

Prelude to "Parsifal" and "Mephisto" Waltz Among Other Numbers Heard.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening was an entertainment of various moods and styles, yet perhaps the imaginative, introspective or mystical might have found in it a sort of increasing purpose such as Tennyson found running through the ages. The symphony was the first of Brahms, the tenth of the eclectic series of Von Buelow. The other numbers were the "Iphigenie in Aulis" overture of Gluck as prepared for concert use by Wagner. This led up to a more modern prelude, that of the sacred festival play, "Parsifal," and then by way of epilogue and, perhaps, sardonic commentary on the whole, the "Mephisto" waltz of that good old man, the Abbe Liszt.

The Brahms music constituted the first part of the overture. A ten minute intermission separated it from the songs of the ungodly, who might have been regarded by Hanslick as all being allied against it. But like the mother of Spartacus we may bid the children to speak no more of those old wars and savage chiefs. Peace reigns to-day between the serpent and the seed of Gluck. The Brahms symphony is heard pretty often. The Boston orchestra has played it here many times, but never before quite in the same manner as it did last evening.

Pierre Monteux is the conductor of the orchestra now, a Frenchman addicted to operas and ballet a la Russe. But evidently he too loves Brahms. His enthusiasms do not lead him in the direction of dalliance with tender nuance, but rather into the blasts of a fiery furnace of impetuosity. He thunders in the index and blazes throughout. The first movement of the symphony went almost furiously. There was smoke around it. Little of elegant clarity was to be found, but of nervous energy a plenty.

Matters improved in the slow movement, in which certain solo players had opportunities to exhibit the excellence of their art. One remembers the long breathed phrases of the great oboist Longy and the clean violin playing of the earnest Fradkin. And, generally speaking, there was a nicer ensemble.

The third movement was just a movement, steady and regular, without any special point. It seemed to suggest little to the sincere Mr. Monteux. Of course the finale made an effect. It is impossible to rob this movement of its entire importance. Mr. Monteux's energetic style suited it. To be sure the brass could have been a little more considerate, but on the whole the rushing performance of the music had a certain rude eloquence. The tone of the orchestra was good and one rejoiced to hear the golden voice of the flute repeating in rich accent the long drawn phrase of the horns.

The third matinee will be given tomorrow afternoon, when a symphony of far different type will be performed, to wit: Beethoven's "Pastoral." There will also be some Debussy and a little Glazounov.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

JAN 1 - 1920 E

NOTED BARITONE HERE WEDNESDAY

Emilio de Gogorza, who will be special soloist at the third Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Mr. Gogorza was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., of Spanish ancestry. He married Mme. Emma Eames, noted soprano, in 1911.

ESTABLISHED 1861
From Times JAN 11 1920
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a program that was made up of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; a ballet or "danced poem," "Jeux," by Debussy, and Glazunoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

Debussy's piece was heard for the first time in New York, apparently, and is one of his later compositions, having been produced in Paris in 1913, under Mr. Monteux's direction. The "choreography" of the occasion is Nijinsky's invention and is something of new departure in "miming," in that it relates to the adventures of a young man with a tennis racket and two young girls searching for a lost tennis ball, during which they forget about the ball, and get involved in dancing and a mild triangular flirtation.

It may be doubted whether much is lost in this case when the music is divorced from the action for concert purposes. The music is no doubt fitted closely to the "argument," but it does not seem as if either could be of much importance with or without the other. The music is made on the late Debussy formula; but, as in so much of Debussy's output at that time, there is little but formula. The texture of the idea is of the thinnest and most insubstantial, and its insubstantiality has little that is suggestive or, what is generally called in speaking of Debussy, "evocative." There is orchestral color, much of it, to take the place of ideas. Some of it has an elusive and filmy grace. Much of it seems thin, metallic, with a wire edge. The score is difficult to play with anything like a consistent effect, and it was admirably played under Mr. Monteux's direction. But even this excellent performance failed to make the music seem really vital or to lift it above the faded level of Debussy's later products.

Alexander Glasunoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," is not unknown to New York, though it has not recently been much heard. It is one of the earliest and strongest works of a composer whose recent productions have shown altogether too much fluency and facility and obviousness to have a firm hold on life. "Stenka Razine" has none of those things; it is rugged and strong.

The chief theme is the Volga bargeman's song, "Ay Ouchnem," a well-known and highly characteristic fragment of Russian folk song that has attracted the attention of several composers. Few of them have used it with more power and stirring effect than Glazunoff in this piece. As Mr. Hale says in his note upon the program, it is that which vitalizes the whole composition, "forever appearing, transformed in a thousand ways." The other two themes on which the music is based count for less. The orchestration is strongly colored, and there are strangely original effects. This piece, too, was brilliantly played.

Mr. Monteux showed a due appreciation of Beethoven in his reading of the "Pastoral" Symphony, with which the program began. His tempos were elastic and vigorous. Thoughts by the brookside became involved in no over-sentimental sluggishness. There were some traces of a desire to expatiate on the thematic qualities of inner voices that one usually left to be merely pillars in the harmony. There was occasionally some uneasiness in the rhythmic quality of the movement. But it was, on the whole, a performance that showed forth the wholesome and al fresco feeling of the music.

From Herald JAN 11 1920
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS DEBUSSY'S BALLET "JEUX"

For a decade before his death in 1918, Claude Debussy, the greatest of recent French composers, was generally supposed to have been written out, and only one work appeared in that period which caused stir in the musical world, a ballet called "Jeux" (Play), which was danced by Woslav Nijinsky in Paris in 1913. In an arrangement for concert purposes without the dance, "Jeux" was played yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who conducted the work at the première with the Ballet Russe in Paris.

This much talked about work proved to be in Debussy's characteristic style, but it threw no new or startling lights upon his genius. In his limited field he was supreme, and had he not done "The Afternoon of the Faun" and "Pelleas and Melisande," his "Jeux" would, no doubt, be performed oftener. It is full of that elegant twilight charm which pervaded his dreamy music. It also reflected, surely, the monotony of augmented chords used in too great profusion, which is to be found in most modern French music. With the dancing, these dull motives would have passed unnoticed, but in concert every note must count, every nuance must have its reason for being.

There are snatches of beautiful melody in "Jeux," but they are so short and disconnected that they lose their charm almost before they are finished. Then there are massees of orchestral sound that delighted the ear, that carry the hearer into a dream world. A touch of color—in the ballet it represents a new light hearted dances, and a touch of feminine jealousy—that is about all the human interest in the piece. There is always present the dreamy atmosphere of twilight in a park, an atmosphere which no one could depict so well as Debussy.

The interpretation of "Jeux" by the orchestra was brilliant, but the work itself left little impression on the audience when it was played ad-

ss New York City
JAN 11 1920

DELIRIOUS TENNIS AT SYMPHONY MATINEE

Debussy's "Jeux" Disturbs Comfortable Programme.

The third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, was a comfortable entertainment, although perhaps one number may have disturbed the equanimity of the little group of serious thinkers. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Pastoral symphony "Jeux," described as a "danced poem," by Debussy, and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Rasine." The Debussy number was new here.

The poem, which is danced, tells the thrilling tale of a young man in delirious pursuit of a tennis ball. He meets two damsels, dances one of them into accepting a kiss, whereupon the other intimates that it isn't fair. So she does a little dancing on her own account and lures the youth and the kissing to herself, with the result that No. 1 becomes jealous. Finally this gay young tennis player wins a "love" set by kissing both at once, and so the poem ends in general satisfaction.

The composition does not belong to the youth of Hercules Debussy, and it is now the custom of his adorers to sigh heavily and admit that in his later years his powers showed a sad falling off. This is true, but some rude persons suspect that the fault was less Debussy's than that of his system. It is not possible to make many compositions out of mere whirlings and confusions of instruments.

If there was any idea in "Jeux," it was that trills cover a multitude of melodic rags. When the same musician wrote "The Afternoon of a Faun" he had something to say. When he arrived at "Jeux" he had precisely the same thing, but he had said it too often and had to try to conceal that fact in a mass of orchestration. "Jeux" is lamentably poor stuff. If we could see Mr. Nijinsky miming and mincing and prancing as the curly headed Don Juan in tennis flannels, possibly we might forget the poverty of the music. Yet there is room for doubt.

The other two numbers invited no close scrutiny. Mr. Monteux conducts the "Pastoral" symphony in a delightfully rustic style. There was much to admire in certain parts of the performance and the thunderstorm was not permitted to affright the ladies. The competent orchestra obediently answered the demands of the conductor.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
D JAN 9 1920

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Brahms's Symphony Reveals Conductor's Shortcomings. The Band's Excellence—Unusual French Songs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played in Carnegie Hall last evening the third of its Thursday series. The program included Brahms's C Minor Symphony, the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide," the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's setting of the Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto Waltz)...

Repeated hearings of the Boston Orchestra, as now constituted, serve but to confirm the original impression that in personnel the band is as thoroughly good as ever, even as in the heyday of Dr. Muck. In fact, an examination of the players of the present organization reveals the astonishing fact that with the exception of not more than a dozen men the orchestra of 1919-1920 is the same as that which played under Mr. Monteux's predecessor during the season of 1917-1918. Without entering into individual differences the statement may be ventured with confidence that such changes as were necessitated made for general improvement in the various choirs and particular betterment in the string section. So the question, "What is wrong with the Boston Symphony?" resolves itself into an unfortunate but necessary condemnation of the present conductor.

We have had no more emphatic manifestation of Mr. Monteux's shortcomings than in last evening's performance of Brahms's great symphony. There was no faltering on the players' part. They did the conductor's every bidding with the surety of expression, the reliability of execution, the wealth of tone and richness of color these musicians have always displayed. The frequent inaccuracy of attack, the almost sloppy ensemble, the lack of variety, balance and nuance, of, indeed, all the finer qualities of orchestral playing—these are faults traceable to but a single cause, the conductor's lack of authority. Mr. Monteux is no taskmaster and never has been, at least so far as his career in America is concerned. Without such qualities as are inherent in the term no conductor can produce more than mediocre results, no matter how excellent may be the material he has at his command.

Last evening's playing of the symphony was heavy, brusque and without finesse, a performance lacking those moments of delicacy, of nuance, of niceties of light and shade which count so much in the full revealment of the composition's musical mysteries. Mr. Monteux would charge this citadel of beauty armed cap-a-pie; but the sleeping beauty is not to be captured by such strenuous methods. She yields perforce only to subtle flattery. She must be wooed with the sweetmeats of conducting, cajoled with honeyed words. Then—and then alone—does the lady shower her gallant with the inexhaustible treasures of her soul.

What a dismal failure Mr. Monteux made of even so responsive a movement as the Finale! Where was the grace that lives in the Allegretto? Where the stalking majesty of the opening measures? We dreamed last evening of other days and other conductors; we still have dreams wherein Brahms is the archangel of symphonic composers.

The Gluck Overture went better. Its broad, mellow phrases need but the timebeat for their eloquent sounding. But the "Parsifal" Prelude begs for a wider scope than Mr. Monteux vouchsafed. Yet the consecrational heave of Wagner's religious aspiration cannot sound weak if the band has beauty of tone within its technical grasp. It was Monteux versus Wagner last evening, and Wagner won.

rom
RIBUNE, JAN 11
New York City

Boston Orchestra Heard in Concert Of Program Music

List Includes Characteristic Pieces by Noted Composers of Last Century, From Beethoven to Debussy

By H. E. Krehbiel

All the music at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was of the descriptive or programmatic kind. The oldest of the compositions was Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, written in 1808; the youngest Debussy's "Jeux," written in 1913. The third, which came last in the order of performance, was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Stanka Razine," composed in 1885—three distinct types, the second as far away from the third, despite its chronological nearness, as the third from the first, in matter, treatment, purpose and form.

As widely divergent, too, each from the other is the appeal made to the ear, the imagination and emotions.

Composer Explained Work

To his symphony Beethoven, though proclaiming that his aim was to give expression to feelings rather than to attempt to paint pictures in tones, gave a verbal commentary for each movement—the awakening of pleasurable sensations at the sight of rural landscapes; a scene by the side of a brook; a merrymaking of country folk interrupted by a storm of thunder, lightning and rain; a shepherd's song and the feeling of gratitude and joy after the storm.

Here the dilineation of externals was confined to the idealized murmuring of the brook, the suggestions of birdsong and the equally idealized tonal picture of the tempest. The cast was purely subjective impressionism.

A beautifully clear, unaffected performance, in which all instruments in the harmonious coterie spoke euphoniously and with the voices with which nature endowed them, made the symphony a delight. It was rapturously welcomed and rewarded with applause, long continued, unequivocal, hearty, sincere. The piece by Debussy was differently received. On its conclusion there was a moment of silence, as of doubt. Then came a perfunctory patter of complimentary handclapping, which gradually grew decorously and died away. The impression which it made was that the audience had recognized a duty of courtesy to a name and the performers, and had done it.

The people in our concert rooms are always polite. They have been taught that it is unpardonably rude to express disapprobation and bad manners to withhold a "Thank you" even if they feel no cause for gratitude. On this occasion we wish they had left their notion of good breeding at home, and had frankly given Mr. Monteux to understand that in playing this piece of Debussy's he had wasted fifteen or twenty minutes of time which might have been much more profitably employed.

Music Written for Ballet

The piece by Debussy called "Jeux" was written to order for the Russian dancers when they were in Paris six years ago. Listening to it before reading a discription of the ballet which it was designed to illustrate, or accompany, or expound, or justify, and guided only by its title we tried to imagine that the composer had aimed at music for playthings, and we tried to conjure them up in our fancy. But the dolls were headless and armless, the animals legless, the whole company a mere collection of disconnected members. That was the reason why the music was all spasmodic squeaks and grunts and creaks and wheezes, with now and then a shimmering harmony of strings and punctuations of drum taps and cadaverous rattle of bones, and multitudinous reiteration of phrases ended almost as soon as begun.

The rhythm seemed to be that of a waltz, but there was never sequence enough of phrases to break into even what Byron called "a damned, see-saw, up-and-down sort of time"; and so, in our mind, the playthings were simply tumbling about. We would not have known that they were playthings at all if it had not been for the illuminative title. After the performance we read the description of Mr. Nijinsky's "danced poem" for which this music had been written, and then learned that it was all about a tennis ball which had been knocked into a park where a young man and two girls went to look for it but fell to dancing and kissing each other instead. That was "Jinx," and Mr. Nijinsky is quoted by the ingenious Mr. Hale in the programbook as asseverating that all the sports—golf, polo, boxing, football—could be turned into ballets.

So they could if "Jeux" is a legitimate specimen of choreographic art and music like Debussy's will suffice.

Glazounoff brought us back into one of the modern zones of real program music with his symphonic poem "Stenka Razine." We do not care to associate the name or the story of the Cossack insurrectionist and robber with this composition, which is vivid and all aglow with imagination.

The Dominant Theme

Its dominant theme is the song of the river bargemen, "Ayouchnem," which has appealed to every Russian composer for a generation past at leat, and while Glazounoff has let this image of the freebooter Stenka (whose boldness in answer led Czar Alexis Mikhailovich to reward him with "a lofty dwelling in the midst of the plain, with two pillars and a cross-beam,") to fire his fecund fancy, we prefer, with Mr. Hale, to hear in it a personification of Mother Volga herself, "alive, enormous," bearing romance, tragedy, joy, sorrow, things unspeakable, upon its restless bosom.

From JAN 11 1920
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

by

James Gibbons Huneker

A DEBUSSY NOVELTY.

There was a novelty by Claude Debussy conducted by Pierre Monteux at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but it did not efface memories of his "Afternoon of a Faun" in search of lady fawns, nor did it loom large as music after another pastoral setting by a poor, deaf old chap named Beethoven. However, this Debussy number could not be fairly judged, for the reason that it was originally written for ballet, and, as Philip Hale tells us, its title is, "Jeux (Play), a Danced Poem," by Nijinsky, music by Achille Claude Debussy. Published in 1912, it was produced in Paris by the Russian Ballet May 15, 1913. Mr. Monteux was the conductor on that occasion.

The absence of choreographic gestures explains the episodical character of the piece, which is too long for the concert hall. The thematic material is not fresh, nor is it appealing; the familiar Debussy idiom is employed. The story of the ballet is simple. A young man searches for his tennis ball in a park. He encounters, instead, two girls. Undaunted, he proves to their satisfaction that three is company, two is none. A second tennis ball falls. Frightened, the girls "go bounding away and disappear." This fate of the young man, of his racket and ball, of the ecstatic kiss—ah! those are subtleties best left to the imaginative, but we confess that it is difficult to follow the clues, generously as they are furnished by the composer. The music fairly cries for action, wherein eye and ear can be enlisted. The result, therefore, of this purely orchestral version was tantalizing to the hearer, who was reminded at times of a snail in ecstasy, an amorous bullfrog—you surely noted its mottled green motive in the bassoons!—a muffled volcano and a passionate grasshopper.

The scoring, the best part of the composition, is of an acid sweetness. But it had its magical moments, and then you forget lawn tennis and the enigmatic girls. (This is tautalogical; girls are always supposed to be riddles, even when they are not.) Decidedly not Debussy at his high water mark, but, after all, Debussy, therefore delicious.

The afternoon began with an excellent, if not technically impeccable reading of the Pastoral Symphony and ended with a symphonic poem by Alexander Glazounoff entitled "Stenka Razine," which is said to have been first played here by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. It proved as substantial a banquet as the Debussy did not, which, even poetically considered, was a Barmecide's feast, where the hungry guests see the plates loaded with delicacies whisked away from under their noses. Glazounoff provides enough food for a normal music lover to last a week.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
JAN 12 1920

Music.

Unfamiliar Music at Boston Symphony Concert.

Debussy's "Jeux" was played for the first time in New York, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine" for almost the first time, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. They made the second part of the programme. The first consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which had been played here before.

It was played so very well on this occasion that there is no need of its being played here soon again, even with the insidious excuse of "educating" the young. True love for Beethoven does not express itself in making his compositions a public nuisance through too frequent and perfunctory performances.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Pastoral" was entirely orthodox, but with the lucky orthodoxy that is approved by the elders on the decanal benches and at the same time does not drive the Sunday school youngsters to mutual hair-pulling as an anodyne. The melodiousness and the sound workmanship of the symphony were agreeably set forth in a performance that had balance, design, euphony, and—heaven be praised!—vitality, just as Boston Symphony performances ought to have those qualities. Anybody who regretted the absence of Wagner from the programme had only to listen to Beethoven's thunderstorm and hear the Flying Dutchman plunging through angry seas.

Debussy's "Jeux" (officially translated "Play," but it is a question if "Sports" would not be a neater rendering) was written for the Diaghileff ballet company and produced at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, Paris, May 15, 1913. As a concert piece it made its début at a Colonne concert in Paris March 1, 1914. For concert use Debussy slightly curtailed the score.

This "danced poem," as it is defined, was the work of Nijinsky—that is, Nijinsky did the choreography; the "poem" is not a verbal matter, even in the explanatory notes. Nijinsky, Karsavina, and Schollar danced the three characters. The scenery and the costumes were by Bakst. Pierre Lalo, son of the composer and himself music critic of the Paris Temps, complained bitterly of the stage production. According to him Bakst was so noisy one couldn't hear Debussy! Nor did he like the conventionalized miming of the dancers (after the manner practised by Nijinsky in "The Afternoon of a Faun"). Perhaps many spectators agreed with him, for "Jeux" did not turn out to be one of the Diaghileff triumphs and was omitted from the American repertory of the company.

The argument of the "poem" is at least unusual. It presupposes a young man and two young girls in a park at twilight. "The artificial illumination of the great electric lamp-posts, which spreads about them a fantastical light, gives them the idea of youthful sports." . . . A tennis ball falls on the stage. The young man in tennis flannels, holding a racket, bounds in. The two young girls appear, "timorous and curious." There is dancing, there is kissing, three-cornered philandering. Another tennis ball falls at the feet of the dancers. This one frightens them and they bound away into the depths of the "nocturnal park." Curtain.

It is not the "vieux parc solitaire" of Verlaine. Remember the arc lights of the impinging boulevards! They must account for the acid drop in the current of Debussy's orchestration at the beginning and at the end. For Debussy's score is all orchestration. When he composed it mortal illness was impending. He was no longer inventive. The musical matter of the piece is mainly formula. Then there is the obvious reflection that music written for a stage representation loses something in the concert room. Nevertheless, I, for one, am grateful to Mr. Monteux for giving me the chance to hear this engrossing, at times ravishing, orchestral fabric. There are instrumental tints unprecedented in Debussy's work. For if the master's invention had failed, his orchestral cunning was finer than ever. And the men from Boston played it expertly, incomparably. Mr. Monteux is not only the prophet of Debussy, but the high priest!

Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine" seems to have been introduced here by the Russian Symphony Society. Did it then fall a victim to the most honorable Brahms cult? Like the symphonies of poor Bruckner, must it remain unheard because it is unfamiliar and somebody might find it dull? Well, "Stenka Razine" is not dull. Glazounoff was twenty when he composed it. In his imaginative youth he was Russian, fantastic, drunk with the enchantments of the Orient. "His suites and tone-poems," in the words of Philip Hale, "told of carnivals, funerals, the voluptuous East, the forest with wood sprites, water nymphs, and will-o-the-wisps, the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with all its holy and dramatic associations." Alas, Glazounoff un-

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Times JAN 11 1920
New York City

MUSIC

By Richard Aldrich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a program that was made up of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; a ballet or "danced poem," "Jeux," by Debussy, and Glazunoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

Debussy's piece was heard for the first time in New York, apparently, and is one of his later compositions, having been produced in Paris in 1913, under Mr. Monteux's direction. The "choreography" of the occasion is Nijinsky's invention and is something of new departure in "miming," in that it relates to the adventures of a young man with a tennis racket and two young girls searching for a lost tennis ball, during which they forget about the ball, and get involved in dancing and a mild triangular flirtation.

It may be doubted whether much is lost in this case when the music is divorced from the action for concert purposes. The music is no doubt fitted closely to the "argument," but it does not seem as if either could be of much importance with or without the other. The music is made on the late Debussy formula; but, as in so much of Debussy's output at that time, there is little but formula. The texture of the idea is of the thinnest and most insubstantial, and its insubstantiality has little that is suggestive or, what is generally called in speaking of Debussy, "evocative." There is orchestral color, much of it, to take the place of ideas. Some of it has an elusive and filmy grace. Much of it seems thin, metallic, with a wire edge. The score is difficult to play with anything like a consistent effect, and it was admirably played under Mr. Monteux's direction. But even this excellent performance failed to make the music seem really vital or to lift it above the faded level of Debussy's later products.

Alexander Glazunoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," is not unknown to New York, though it has not recently been much heard. It is one of the earliest and strongest works of a composer whose recent productions have shown altogether too much fluency and facility and obviousness to have a firm hold on life. "Stenka Razine" has none of those things; it is rugged and strong.

The chief theme is the Volga bargeman's song, "Ay Ouchnem," a well-known and highly characteristic fragment of Russian folk song that has attracted the attention of several composers. Few of them have used it with more power and stirring effect than Glazunoff in this piece. As Mr. Hale says in his note upon the program, it is that which vitalizes the whole composition, "forever appearing, transformed in a thousand ways." The other two themes on which the music is based count for less. The orchestration is strongly colored, and there are strangely original effects. This piece, too, was brilliantly played.

Mr. Monteux showed a due appreciation of Beethoven in his reading of the "Pastoral" Symphony, with which the program began. His tempos were elastic and vigorous. Thoughts by the brookside became involved in no over-sentimental sluggishness. There were some traces of a desire to expatiate on the thematic qualities of inner voices that one usually left to be merely pillars in the harmony. There was occasionally some uneasiness in the rhythmic quality of the movement. But it was, on the whole, a performance that showed forth the wholesome and al fresco feeling of the music.

From Herald JAN 11 1920
New York City

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS DEBUSSY'S BALLET "JEUX"

For a decade before his death in 1918, Claude Debussy, the greatest of recent French composers, was generally supposed to have been written out, and only one work appeared in that period which caused stir in the musical world, a ballet called "Jeux" (Play), which was danced by Woslav Nijninsky in Paris in 1913. In an arrangement for concert purposes without the dance, "Jeux" was played yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who conducted the work at the première with the Ballet Russe in Paris.

This much talked about work proved to [illegible] in Debussy's characteristic style, but it threw no new or startling lights upon his genius. In his limited field he was supreme, and had he not done "The Afternoon of the Faun" and "Pelleas and Melisande," his "Jeux" would, no doubt, be performed oftener. It is full of that elegant twilight charm which pervaded his dreamy music. It also reflected, surely, the monotony of augmented chords used in too great profusion, which is to be found in most modern French music. With the dancing, these dull moments would have passed unnoticed, but in concert every note must count, every nuance must have its reason for being.

There are snatches of beautiful melody in "Jeux," but they are so short and disconnected that they lose their charm al[illegible] before they are finished. Then [illegible] are massees of orchestral sound [illegible] delighted the ear, that carry the [illegible] into a dream world. A touch of [illegible] for the [illegible]—in the ballet it represents a [illegible] new light hearted dances, and a [illegible] feminine jealousy—that is about [illegible] the human interest in the piece. [illegible] is always present the dreamy [illegible] twilight in a park, an atmos[illegible] which no one could depict so well [illegible].

[illegible] sentation of "Jeux" by the or[illegible] was brilliant, but the work itself [illegible] great impression on the audience [illegible] was flatless.

[illegible] was played ad-

SUN
ss New York City
JAN 11 1920

DELIRIOUS TENNIS AT SYMPHONY MATINEE

Debussy's "Jeux" Disturbs Comfortable Programme.

The third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, was a comfortable entertainment, although perhaps one number may have disturbed the equanimity of the little group of serious thinkers. The programme consisted of Beethoven's Pastoral symphony "Jeux," described as a "danced poem," by Debussy, and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Rasine." The Debussy number was new here.

The poem, which is danced, tells the thrilling tale of a young man in delirious pursuit of a tennis ball. He meets two damsels, dances one of them into accepting a kiss, whereupon the other intimates that it isn't fair. So she does a little dancing on her own account and lures the youth and the kissing to herself, with the result that No. 1 becomes jealous. Finally this gay young tennis player wins a "love" set by kissing both at once, and so the poem ends in general satisfaction.

The composition does not belong to the youth of Hercules Debussy, and it is now the custom of his adorers to sigh heavily and admit that in his later years his powers showed a sad falling off. This is true, but some rude persons suspect that the fault was less Debussy's than that of his system. It is not possible to make many compositions out of mere whirlings and confusions of instruments.

If there was any idea in "Jeux," it was that trills cover a multitude of melodic rags. When the same musician wrote "The Afternoon of a Faun" he had something to say. When he arrived at "Jeux" he had precisely the same thing, but he had said it too often and had to try to conceal that fact in a mass of orchestration. "Jeux" is lamentably poor stuff. If we could see Mr. Nijinsky miming and mincing and prancing as the curly headed Don Juan in tennis flannels, possibly we might forget the poverty of the music. Yet there is room for doubt.

The other two numbers invited no close scrutiny. Mr. Monteux conducts the "Pastoral" symphony in a delightfully rustic style. There was much to admire in certain parts of the performance and the thunderstorm was not permitted to affright the ladies. The competent orchestra obediently answered the demands of the conductor.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 9 1920

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AGAIN

Brahms's Symphony Reveals Conductor's Shortcomings. The Band's Excellence—Unusual French Songs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, played in Carnegie Hall last evening the third of its Thursday series. The program included Brahms's C Minor Symphony, the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide," the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's setting of the Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto Waltz).

Repeated hearings of the Boston Orchestra, as now constituted, serve but to confirm the original impression that in personnel the band is as thoroughly good as ever, even as in the heyday of Dr. Muck. In fact, an examination of the players of the present organization reveals the astonishing fact that with the exception of not more than a dozen men the orchestra of 1919-1920 is the same as that which played under Mr. Monteux's predecessor during the season of 1917-1918. Without entering into individual differences the statement may be ventured with confidence that such changes as were necessitated made for general improvement in the various choirs and particular betterment in the string section. So the question, "What is wrong with the Boston Symphony?" resolves itself into an unfortunate but necessary condemnation of the present conductor.

We have had no more emphatic manifestation of Mr. Monteux's shortcomings than in last evening's performance of Brahms's great symphony. There was no faltering on the players' part. They did the conductor's every bidding with the surety of expression, the reliability of execution, the wealth of tone and richness of color these musicians have always displayed. The frequent inaccuracy of attack, the almost sloppy ensemble, the lack of variety, balance and nuance, of, indeed, all the finer qualities of orchestral playing—these are faults traceable to but a single cause, the conductor's lack of authority. Mr. Monteux is no taskmaster and never has been, at least so far as his career in America is concerned. Without such qualities as are inherent in the term no conductor can produce more than mediocre results, no matter how excellent may be the material he has at his command.

Last evening's playing of the symphony was heavy, brusque and without finesse, a performance lacking those moments of delicacy, of nuance, of niceties of light and shade which count so much in the full revealment of the composition's musical mysteries. Mr. Monteux would charge this citadel of beauty armed cap-a-pie; but the sleeping beauty is not to be captured by such strenuous methods. She yields perforce only to subtle flattery. She must be wooed with the sweetmeats of conducting, cajoled with honeyed words. Then—and then alone—does the lady shower her gallant with the inexhaustible treasures of her soul.

What a dismal failure Mr. Monteux made of even so responsive a movement as the Finale! Where was the grace that lives in the Allegretto? Where the stalking majesty of the opening measures? We dreamed last evening of other days and other conductors; we still have dreams wherein Brahms is the archangel of symphonic composers.

The Gluck Overture went better. Its broad, mellow phrases need but the timebeat for their eloquent sounding. But the "Parsifal" Prelude begs for a wider scope than Mr. Monteux vouchsafed. Yet the consecrational heave of Wagner's religious aspiration cannot sound weak if the band has beauty of tone within its technical grasp. It was Monteux versus Wagner last evening, and Wagner won.

rom
RIBUNE,
New York City
JAN

Boston Orchestra Heard in Concert Of Program Music

List Includes Characteristic Pieces by Noted Composers of Last Century, From Beethoven to Debussy

By H. E. Krehbiel

All the music at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was of the descriptive or programmatic kind. The oldest of the compositions was Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, written in 1808; the youngest Debussy's "Jeux," written in 1913. The third, which came last in the order of performance, was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Stanka Razine," composed in 1885—three distinct types, the second as far away from the third, despite its chronological nearness, as the third from the first, in matter, treatment, purpose and form.

As widely divergent, too, each from the other is the appeal made to the ear, the imagination and emotions.

Composer Explained Work

To his symphony Beethoven, though proclaiming that his aim was to give expression to feelings rather than to attempt to paint pictures in tones, gave a verbal commentary for each movement—the awakening of pleasurable sensations at the sight of rural landscapes; a scene by the side of a brook; a merrymaking of country folk interrupted by a storm of thunder, lightning and rain; a shepherd's song and the feeling of gratitude and joy after the storm.

Here the dilineation of externals was confined to the idealized murmuring of the brook, the suggestions of birdsong and the equally idealized tonal picture of the tempest. The cast was purely subjective impressionism.

A beautifully clear, unaffected performance, in which all instruments in the harmonious coterie spoke euphoniously and with the voices with which nature endowed them, made the symphony a delight. It was rapturously welcomed and rewarded with applause, long continued, unequivocal, hearty, sincere. The piece by Debussy was differently received. On its conclusion there was a moment of silence, as of doubt. Then came a perfunctory patter of complimentary handclapping, which gradually grew decorously and died away. The impression which it made was that the audience had recognized a duty of courtesy to a name and the performers, and had done it.

The people in our concert rooms are always polite. They have been taught that it is unpardonably rude to express disapprobation and bad manners to withhold a "Thank you" even if they feel no cause for gratitude. On this occasion we wish they had left their notion of good breeding at home, and had frankly given Mr. Monteux to understand that in playing this piece of Debussy's he had wasted fifteen or twenty minutes of time which might have been much more profitably employed.

Music Written for Ballet

The piece by Debussy called "Jeux" was written to order for the Russian dancers when they were in Paris six years ago. Listening to it before reading a discription of the ballet which it was designed to illustrate, or accompany, or expound, or justify, and guided only by its title we tried to imagine that the composer had aimed at music for playthings, and we tried to conjure them up in our fancy. But the dolls were headless and armless, the animals legless, the whole company a mere collection of disconnected members. That was the reason why the music was all spasmodic squeaks and grunts and creaks and wheezes, with now and then a shimmering harmony of strings and punctuations of drum taps and cadaverous rattle of bones, and multitudinous reiteration of phrases ended almost as soon as begun.

The rhythm seemed to be that of a waltz, but there was never sequence enough of phrases to break into even what Byron called "a damned, see-saw, up-and-down sort of time"; and so, in our mind, the playthings were simply tumbling about. We would not have known that they were playthings at all if it had not been for the illuminative title. After the performance we read the description of Mr. Nijinsky's "danced poem" for which this music had been written, and then learned that it was all about a tennis ball which had been knocked into a park where a young man and two girls went to look for it but fell to dancing and kissing each other instead. That was "Jinx," and Mr. Nijinsky is quoted by the ingenious Mr. Hale in the programbook as asseverating that all the sports—golf, polo, boxing, football—could be turned into ballets.

So they could if "Jeux" is a legitimate specimen of choreographic art and music like Debussy's will suffice.

Glazounoff brought us back into one of the modern zones of real program music with his symphonic poem "Stenka Razine." We do not care to associate the name or the story of the Cossack insurrectionist and robber with this composition, which is vivid and all aglow with imagination.

The Dominant Theme

Its dominant theme is the song of the river bargemen, "Ayouchnem," which has appealed to every Russian composer for a generation past at leat, and while Glazounoff has let this image of the freebooter Stenka (whose boldness in answer led Czar Alexis Mikhailovich to reward him with "a lofty dwelling in the midst of the plain, with two pillars and a cross-beam,") to fire his fecund fancy, we prefer, with Mr. Hale, to hear in it a personification of Mother Volga herself, "alive, enormous," bearing romance, tragedy, joy, sorrow, things unspeakable, upon its restless bosom.

From JAN 11 1920
WORLD,
New York City

MUSIC

by

James Gibbons Huneker

A DEBUSSY NOVELTY.

There was a novelty by Claude Debussy conducted by Pierre Monteux at the matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, but it did not efface memories of his "Afternoon of a Faun" in search of lady fawns, nor did it loom large as music after another pastoral setting by a poor, deaf old chap named Beethoven. However, this Debussy number could not be fairly judged, for the reason that it was originally written for ballet, and, as Philip Hale tells us, its title is, "Jeux (Play), a Danced Poem," by Nijinsky, music by Achille Claude Debussy. Published in 1912, it was produced in Paris by the Russian Ballet May 15, 1913. Mr. Monteux was the conductor on that occasion.

The absence of choreographic gestures explains the episodical character of the piece, which is too long for the concert hall. The thematic material is not fresh, nor is it appealing; the familiar Debussy idiom is employed. The story of the ballet is simple. A young man searches for his tennis ball in a park. He encounters, instead, two girls. Undaunted, he proves to their satisfaction that three is company, two is none. A second tennis ball falls. Frightened, the girls "go bounding away and disappear." This fate of the young man, of his racket and ball, of the ecstatic kiss—ah! those are subtleties best left to the imaginative, but we confess that it is difficult to follow the clues, generously as they are furnished by the composer. The music fairly cries for action, wherein eye and ear can be enlisted. The result, therefore, of this purely orchestral version was tantalizing to the hearer, who was reminded at times of a snail in ecstasy, an amorous bullfrog—you surely noted its mottled green motive in the bassoons!—a muffled volcano and a passionate grasshopper.

The scoring, the best part of the composition, is of an acid sweetness. But it had its magical moments, and then you forget lawn tennis and the enigmatic girls. (This is tautalogical; girls are always supposed to be riddles, even when they are not.) Decidedly not Debussy at his high water mark, but, after all, Debussy, therefore delicious.

The afternoon began with an excellent, if not technically impeccable reading of the Pastoral Symphony and ended with a symphonic poem by Alexander Glazounoff entitled "Stenka Razine," which is said to have been first played here by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. It proved as substantial a banquet as the Debussy dish not, which, even poetically considered, was a Barmecide's feast, where the hungry guests see the plates loaded with delicacies whisked away from under their noses. Glazounoff provides enough food for a normal music lover to last a week.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City
JAN

Music.

Unfamiliar Music at Boston Symphony Concert.

Debussy's "Jeux" was played for the first time in New York, and Glazouroff's "Stenka Razine" for almost the first time, at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. They made the second part of the programme. The first consisted of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which had been played here before.

It was played so very well on this occasion that there is no need of its being played here soon again, even with the insidious excuse of "educating" the young. True love for Beethoven does not express itself in making his compositions a public nuisance through too frequent and perfunctory performances.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Pastoral" was entirely orthodox, but with the lucky orthodoxy that is approved by the elders on the decanal benches and at the same time does not drive the Sunday school youngsters to mutual hair-pulling as an anodyne. The melodiousness and the sound workmanship of the symphony were agreeably set forth in a performance that had balance, design, euphony, and—heaven be praised!—vitality, just as Boston Symphony performances ought to have those qualities. Anybody who regretted the absence of Wagner from the programme had only to listen to Beethoven's thunderstorm and hear the Flying Dutchman plunging through angry seas.

Debussy's "Jeux" (officially translated "Play," but it is a question if "Sports" would not be a neater rendering) was written for the Diaghileff ballet company and produced at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, Paris, May 15, 1913. As a concert piece it made its début at a Colonne concert in Paris March 1, 1914. For concert use Debussy slightly curtailed the score.

This "danced poem," as it is defined, was the work of Nijinsky—that is, Nijinsky did the choreography; the "poem" is not a verbal matter, even in the explanatory notes. Nijinsky, Karsavina, and Schollar danced the three characters. The scenery and the costumes were by Bakst. Pierre Lalo, son of the composer and himself music critic of the Paris Temps, complained bitterly of the stage production. According to him Bakst was so noisy one couldn't hear Debussy! Nor did he like the conventionalized miming of the dancers (after the manner practised by Nijinsky in "The Afternoon of a Faun"). Perhaps many spectators agreed with him, for "Jeux" did not turn out to be one of the Diaghileff triumphs and was omitted from the American repertory of the company.

The argument of the "poem" is at least unusual. It presupposes a young man and two young girls in a park at twilight. "The artificial illumination of the great electric lamp-posts, which spreads about them a fantastical light, gives them the idea of youthful sports." . . . A tennis ball falls on the stage. The young man in tennis flannels, holding a racket, bounds in. The two young girls appear, "timorous and curious." There is dancing, there is kissing, three-cornered philandering. Another tennis ball falls at the feet of the dancers. This one frightens them and they bound away into the depths of the "nocturnal park." Curtain.

It is not the "vieux parc solitaire" of Verlaine. Remember the arc lights of the impinging boulevards! They must account for the acid drop in the current of Debussy's orchestration at the beginning and at the end. For Debussy's score is all orchestration. When he composed it mortal illness was impending. He was no longer inventive. The musical matter of the piece is mainly formula. Then there is the obvious reflection that music written for a stage representation loses something in the concert room. Nevertheless, I, for one, am grateful to Mr. Monteux for giving me the chance to hear this engrossing, at times ravishing, orchestral fabric. There are instrumental tints unprecedented in Debussy's work. For if the master's invention had failed, his orchestral cunning was finer than ever. And the men from Boston played it expertly, incomparably. Mr. Monteux is not only the prophet of Debussy, but the high priest!

Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine" seems to have been introduced here by the Russian Symphony Society. Did it then fall a victim to the most honorable Brahms cult? Like the symphonies of poor Bruckner, must it remain unheard because it is unfamiliar and somebody might find it dull? Well, "Stenka Razine" is not dull. Glazounoff was twenty when he composed it. In his imaginative youth he was Russian, fantastic, drunk with the enchantments of the Orient. "His suites and tone-poems," in the words of Philip Hale, "told of carnivals, funerals, the voluptuous East, the forest with wood sprites, water nymphs, and will-of-the-wisps, the ocean, the Kremlin of Moscow with all its holy and dramatic associations." Alas, Glazounoff un-

...forwent the academic German influence and became as harmless as Mendelssohn at his most genteel. At last accounts he is still living.

Stenka Razine was an interesting person, a wild Cossack chieftain who once ruled the Volga and made unholy war in Holy Russia. It was his fate to be actually broken on the wheel in 1672, after being captured by the forces of the Czar Alexis. In this symphonic poem he is the lover of a captive Persian princess, with whom he navigates the Volga in a most sumptuously appointed barge. When the soldiers of the czar have hemmed him in he determines that at least they shall not possess the princess. So, declaring that he will give unto Mother Volga what in his eyes is the most precious of earthly treasures, he throws the princess into the river. Then, with his savage band, he rushes on the soldiers.

The symphonic poem is not a closely wrought and meticulously sustained composition. It is not the work of Brahms. But in spite of some padding, of some youthful incoherence, it is a glorious affair, romantic, imaginative, richly colored, a riot to the ear. Particularly impressive is the opening, built musically on the well-known chant of the Volga bargemen, epic in its portrayal of the Volga River. The music depicting the Persian princess is a real seduction; the catastrophe thunders in tones appropriately dramatic. And throughout the length of the piece there is the haunting and mighty presence of the Volga River.

Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of the work. The large audience seemed to like it. It also liked the "Pastoral" symphony. The effect of "Jeux" was more problematic. It is recorded of the Colonne audience which first heard "Jeux" as a concert piece that "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They 'waited.'" Nobody hissed on Saturday, but several giggled. Some people always giggle when they don't know what else to do.

PITTS SANBORN.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Recent Concerts

Debussy's later compositions are not much admired even by the full-blooded Debussyites. One of them, "Jeux," had what was called its first performance in New York at the Saturday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one of those works which help explain why this Parisian never carried out his threat of composing a Tristan that would drive Wagner's from the opera houses—an amusing ambition in view of the fact that there isn't a drop of red blood or a moment of real passion in even the youthful works of Debussy. Those of his last period, exemplified by "Jeux," are mere phantoms—echoes of mannerisms. Under M. Monteux the novelty was played admirably.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

TWO SYMPHONIES DRAW THOUSANDS

Boston Orchestra in Great Performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" at Matinee.

PHILHARMONIC AT CARNEGIE

A notable performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony (sixth) gave special joy to a large audience assembled yesterday at Carnegie Hall at the third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Society. Debussy's Dance Poem, "Jeux," set free with singularly happy vivacity, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine," a Symphonic Poem susceptible of more display and deserving of less importance than Mr. Monteux gave it, comprised the latter half of an exceedingly well-played program

The Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall in the evening divided an interesting program between Tschaikowsky and Wagner. "Rienzi," "Tannhaeuser," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tristan und Isolde" were signally represented, and Tschaikowskys Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and "Marche Slav," which concluded the concert, made up the musical contrasts and won much approval from the congregation.

Edward Morris, the sterling young American pianist, again pleased a fine audience with his recital at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon. Beethoven's Sonate (opus. 57), delivered with scholarly authority and poise, a group of five Chopin numbers played with exquisite understanding and skill, numbers by Scarlatti, Palmgren, Leschetizky and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 6) fulfilled a most successful recital.

In the evening at Aeolian Hall Mary Cavan, well known as a soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, and Otakar Marak, her husband, who was also a leading tenor with Campanini, gave an interesting recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening. Frank Bibb was at the piano.

From American
New York City

AUDITORS COLD TO DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fails to Create Enthusiasm with the Piece—Music in "Sermons of Stone" Essentially Theatrical

By MAX SMITH.

AS coryphaeus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux introduced to New Yorkers a week ago Saturday Debussy's "Jeux."

This work was written probably in 1911, or perhaps in 1912, and presumably as a ballet. At any rate the redoubtable Diaghelift, promoter of the Ballet Russe, produced it in that form on May 15, 1913, at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, Paris, the chereorgraphic embellishments having been designed by Nijinski, and the scenery and costumes by Bakst. It is interesting to note, however, that the composer's piano arrangement, dedicated to Mme. Jacques Durand, was published in 1912, while the score did not appear until 1913.

On March 1, 1914, at a Colonne concert in Paris, conducted by Gabriel Pierne, "Jeux" was first performed as an orchestral piece. The composer himself had made a slight cut in the score. Mr. Philip Hale, distinguished programme annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells us that the "audience was undecided, cold." According to a French chronicler, "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They waited.'"

◎ ◎ ◎

NEW YORKERS received the work in much the same way the other day. There was no hissing, to be sure. Sibilant disapproval is not tolerated in American music halls and opera houses. It might be well if it were. For now that the claque is an established fact in our lyric theatres at least, if not in the concert world, what other means have those who are displeased to counteract organized applause and expose it?

But no hissing was needed to show how little Debussy's "Jeux" caught the fancy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's audience; for no one tried to create any spurious enthusiasm. A few polite listeners clapped their hands to save Monsieur from embarrassment. But that was all. As in Paris, "the majority remained passive." They "waited."

◎ ◎ ◎

TWO tennis balls figures in the pantomimic scheme of "Jeux." The scene is supposed to be a park at twilight. One of the balls lands on the stage as the curtain rises, and is sought in vain by a sportive swain, who is joined by "two timorous and curious young girls." The other, "thrown by some malicious hand," with the sole purpose, no doubt, of spoiling the fun, checks the amorous saltatorical play of the three, sends them scooting into arboreal shadows, and brings the music to a stop, somewhat to the relief of the way-worn listener, it must be confessed.

The explicit explanatory notes presented in the pianoforte arrangement of the score give the plot of the ballet in considerable detail. Each of the dancing damsels would have the tennis player for herself. That flannelled fawn prances about with the first. He kisses her. "The other girl is peevish and slightly jealous, while the couple remain amorously ecstatic." She tip-toes by herself "in an ironical, mocking manner." Suddenly the youth's interest in the second flares up. He leaves the first to grieve, while he dallies with her companion. Maiden No. 2 tries to prevent Maiden No. 1 from running away. "She succeeds in embracing her. The young man gently puts their heads apart. They look about them: The beauty of the night, the joy of the light, everything urges them to give way to their fantasie. Henceforth, the three dance together. The young man, with a passionate gesture brings the three heads together and a triple kiss melts them into ecstasy."

◎ ◎ ◎

IN devising this scenario the eminent Nijinski perhaps intended to advocate what, to coin a word, might be called duogamy. It would almost seem so. But surely Debussy's music, while it is thoroughly characteristic of the composer's style and is brilliantly scored, of course, seems as hollow as a bounding tennis ball and quite as elusive. It is, indeed, one of the emptiest bubbles of shimmering tonal tints that the great French innovator ever blew, and shows from every point of view evidences of labor without the impulse of inspiration or even desire.

The refined impotence of "Jeux" was made the more conspicuous at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee because it followed Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which received a performance enjoyable, if rhythmically blurred, and because it preceded Glazounoff's virile, colorful and dramatically eloquent symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," a work that surely deserves to be heard more often than it is.

◎ ◎ ◎

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The best balanced, interesting and most enjoyable programme of this season's Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, was that given at the Academy of Music last Friday evening, it being the third of the organization's annual five appearances in this borough. Mr. Monteux showed splendid judgment in choice and arrangement of the evening's music offering, opening his programme with Brahm's C mind symphony as bulwark for the first half, and devoting the second to Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and the "Mephisto Waltz" by Franz Liszt, these two being separated by the vocal numbers of the soloist, Emilio De Gogorza. Mr. Monteux, pre-eminently French in patriotic sentiment, will be remembered as having balked at conducting German music during his first American season some three or four seasons past. But at Friday evening's concert he lent himself "con amore" to the performance of the first symphonic work from the pen of that Teuton giant, Johannes Brahms, a work that the Boston players have frequently given to Brooklyn audiences in former seasons, under the batons of Gericke, Muck and Fiedler. In comparison with the readings of these illustrious predecessors, Mr. Monteux's interpretation holds its own as an intellectual, powerful and emotional exposition of the full breadth, depth and sustained beauty of this magnificent score, which, though mystic in its philosophical outreachings, is, nevertheless, governed by the sanity of a clear, pervading, calm faith. Through the hazy mists of its brooding beauties flows a classical outline akin to that of Beethoven; indeed, it would seem to be a continuation of Beethoven's symphonic mood. Upon this occasion, as aforesaid, the performance was noticeably distinguished, the entire orchestra playing with superb body of tone color and unanimity of execution. Messrs. Fradkin, Longy and Mueller imparted special distinction to the solo episodes for violin, oboe and horn. Fine contrast, as "programme" music against that of Brahm's "absolute," was afforded in the Glazounoff poem, an early work of this gifted Russian composer, and one that attracted the admiration of Tschaikowsky. Built on three themes, his score narrates the historical folk song of the Cossack river pirate, Stenka Razine, who ruled the river Volga in the latter part of the seventeenth century, devastating and pillaging, with his band of terrible hetmen, the villages and towns along its shores. After thirty years he gives to "Mother Volga" a "gift," his most precious earthly treasure, the captive Persian princess, who was his mistress, throwing her into the blue, iced, majestic stream. The orchestration and instrumentation employed by Glazounoff in this composition might well excite the envy of devotees to the so-called ultra-modern music of today. Liszt's village tavern waltz, the second episode from his three settings of Lenau's "Faust," has long figured on Boston Symphony programmes. The New England critic, John Sullivan Dwight, allowed, far back as 1870, that this music was "positively devilish * * * simply diabolical, shutting out every ray of light and heaven, from when music sprang." To-day the same criticism seems appropriate, although the public attitude towards latitude in art has considerably relaxed since the years of Dwight's critical activities.

The inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music frequently detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mr. De Gogorza's two recitations and airs from Gluck and Massenet. These were the "Diane Impitoyable" from "Iphigenie en Aulide" and "Promesse de Mon Avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore." Emma Eames' distinguished husband, Emilio De Gorgoza, is every inch an artist, fully worthy of the position that he holds as one of the few concert world's foremost baritones. His voice is rich, resonant, admirably controlled, and to its qualities are added those of the singer's perfect French diction, his elegance of style in delivery, his commanding stage presence.

Throughout the evening the playing of the orchestra revealed frequent flashes of its former supremacy. In Mr. Monteux the players have a leader who possesses all the potential elements of a great symphonic conductor. His is a wonderfully expanding genius, one that claims an ever-growing regard.

From Times
New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert on Thursday, Jan. 8, Mr. Monteux will conduct Brahms's First symphony, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." On Saturday afternoon, Jan. 10, the program includes Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" or "Play," a novelty, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

The New York Symphony...

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 10 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

De Gogorza, the Soloist, Gets an Ovation.

That sterling singer Emilio de Gogorza had an ovation last night at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy for his broad, sympathetic and moving singing of the air "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from Massenet's "Le Roi De Lahore." The air is so attractive, or, at least, it was sung last night, that one wondered what the weak spots in the opera must be which keep it from revival in a season when the opera house is shaking the ragbag of the earlier Italian repertory for "novelties." Before he came to the Massenet air Mr. Gogorza had sung broadly melodious and noble melody from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide." Gluck is out of the repertory at the opera because there are no singers in the company having the breadth of style and the command of legato which his music demands, but the opera singers revel in Massenet.

The concert opened with the First Symphony of Brahms, which was reviewed in detail on this page yesterday, following its performance in Manhattan. The other numbers were an attractive symphonic poem by Glazanoff, "Stenka Razine," in which the rich melody evoked a lovely picture of the noble flowing River Volga and which rose into eloquence at the climax of the tragedy on which the music is based. The performance closed with Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," based on Lenau's "Faust." This music has those dramatic and theatrical qualities which call out the best work of Pierre Monteux, the conductor. It is not subtle, but it is stirring, and it is even fierce, and Mr. Monteux, as well as his brilliant band, revelled in it.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS CONVINCINGLY

Continues Progressive Policy in Lyric; Ornstein's Work Excellent.

From beginning to end the third Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Leo Ornstein, pianist and composer, as special soloist, given in the Lyric Theater last night, was interesting. The works produced were of the kind classified variously and humorously as "music," "modern music" and "ultra-modern music" (each term subject to different meanings!); therefore, there was something on the program suited, at least in type, to some one of the different degrees of musical attainment represented in the audience. The audience aws large, although there were a few vacant seats, and particuirly demonstrative after the performance of the concerto.

Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Opus 20, was the first number of the program. This was followed by the "ultra-modern" work of the program—the orchestral version of Debussy's "danced poem," "Jeux" ("Play"); this by the Concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23, for piano and orchestra, composed by MacDowell, native of the United States; and this by Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem entitled "Sten. Razine" (the name of the leader of a pillaging band on the Volga, who operated in style.

Under Mr. Monteux the orchestra played brilliantly, fervently, and with pervading, sustained depth. Their work throughout all the intracacies of the complex music was adjusted so well as to be convincing and enable all to hear "that hath an ear." Mr. Ornstein—appearing instead of Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who was ill—played in the concerto in a straightforward manner. His work was firm, clean cut, accurate, precise, his style simplicity itself, and it demonstrated afresh the entire compatability of sanity and "advanced thought." He gave an effective presentation of a work quite unlike the pioneer products of his own composition. Applause recalled him to the stage many times.

Progressiveness of Mr. Monteux's programs in Baltimore is most satisfying.

J. N. H.

m CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y. 94
e A JAN 10

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Gives Splendid Concert at the Academy of Music.

Disagreeable weather had no unmusical effects on the strings and other musical instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. The band played beautifully, and Conductor Pierre Monteux read his numbers eloquently. There were many interesting things in the concert. Brahms' first symphony was the important offering. It is in four movements, full of wonderful beauties, and the treatment of the thematic material was masterly, the precision of attack was commendable and the tone ingratiating.

The soloist of the evening was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone. The audience, large and enthusiastic, greeted him with an ovation. Mr. De Gogorza's style is all that could be desired in songs requiring breadth and refinement. His rich and well-equalized voice did ample justice to his French songs, Gluck's "Diane Impitoyable" and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir."

The remainder of the programme was devoted to the beautiful symphonic poem, Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "The Dance of the Village Tavern" (Mephisto waltz). The audience received the Boston visitors enthusiastically.

From JAN 8 1920 E
VENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Pierre Monteux, last night was one of unusual excellence in that the organization itself proved to be in fine trim and the program of great interest, the Chausson symphony in B flat major, opus 20, serving as a splendid introduction. This work is operatic rather than symphonic, but contains numerous passages of great charm. It may be said to represent the transition in French musical development from its earlier forms, before this development had attained the ultra-modern shape it now bears, and there is in the symphony much that is suggestive of Wagner, who seems to have influenced Chausson greatly. This influence, however, has had happy results, for there is no impairment of originality, while adding to the inherent strength of the composer. It was played in an admirable manner.

In the Debussy number this French composer appears at his best or at his worst, according to how one feels about it. It is entitled "Jeux" (Play), and by way of explanation the program adds "A Danced Poem." Those who believe that music means harmony will view the composition rather as a dream made up of the most impossible and unexpected happenings, in which figures and circumstances present a continuous phantasmagoria, never appearing normal or logical, running along in a perfect maze of incongruities and passing with bewildering suddenness from one disjointed situation to another even more distorted. It is such a dream as leaves one on awakening in a state of confusion and unable to recount exactly what occurred.

Debussy in "Jeux" observes a certain rhythm, to be sure, but he seems morbidly anxious to avoid anything like harmony. For a few beats he starts expectations that presently there shall follow a real appeal, but always the hopes of the auditor are dashed, and the orchestra trails off into other dissonances perhaps more radical than those that have gone before. At several points there is obvious an attempt at continuous development of a theme, a figure being repeated by various instruments in succession, but the attempt comes to nothing and the hearer finds himself floundering in a dream world again.

The handling of such difficult and rambling work by the orchestra was excellent, but all of the organization's refinements and the director's resourcefulness in infusing color could not make the offering really palatable. Like certain relishes which some persons with a reputation as epicures profess to be very fond of, but which the general run of humanity makes a wry face over, "Jeux" is a dish for the musical epicure.

The substitution of the McDowell concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23, with Leo Ornstein as the pianist, for Emilio de Gogorza, who had been taken ill, was fortuitous in more respects than one. In the first place, the audience got an opportunity to hear a dignified and impressive work by an American composer, who deserves to figure far more frequently on concert programs than he does, and, in the second place, the audience gained the chance to listen to a magnetic and brilliant artist, who unites a tremendous technique with temperament and profound sentiment, and who invested his performance with a wealth of color and a breadth of tone that imparted a real thrill. His broken octaves in the second movement proved to be something of a revelation, while his runs derwent the academic German influence and became as harmless as Mendelssohn at his most genteel! At last accounts he is still living.

Stenka Razine was an interesting person, a wild Cossack chieftain who once ruled the Volga and made unholy war in Holy Russia. It was his fate to be actually broken on the wheel in 1672, after being captured by the forces of the Czar Alexis. In this symphonic poem he is the lover of a captive Persian princess, with whom he navigates the Volga in a most sumptuously appointed barge. When the soldiers of the czar have hemmed him in he determines that at least they shall not possess the princess. So, declaring that he will give unto Mother Volga what in his eyes is the most precious of earthly treasures, he throws the princess into the river. Then, with his savage band, he rushes on the soldiers.

The symphonic poem is not a closely wrought and meticulously sustained composition. It is not the work of Brahms. But in spite of some padding, of some youthful incoherence, it is a glorious affair, romantic, imaginative, richly colored, a riot to the ear. Particularly impressive is the opening, built musically on the well-known chant of the Volga bargemen, epic in its portrayal of the Volga River. The music depicting the Persian princess is a real seduction; the catastrophe thunders in tones appropriately dramatic. And throughout the length of the piece there is the haunting and mighty presence of the Volga River.

Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of the work. The large audience seemed to like it. It also liked the "Pastoral" symphony. The effect of "Jeux" was more problematic. It is recorded of the Colonne audience which first heard "Jeux" as a concert piece that "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They 'waited.'" Nobody hissed on Saturday, but several giggled. Some people always giggle when they don't know what else to do.

PITTS SANBORN.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Recent Concerts

Debussy's later compositions are not much admired even by the full-blooded Debussyites. One of them, "Jeux," had what was called its first performance in New York at the Saturday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one of those works which help explain why this Parisian never carried out his threat of composing a Tristan that would drive Wagner's from the opera houses—an amusing ambition in view of the fact that there isn't a drop of red blood or a moment of real passion in even the youthful works of Debussy. Those of his last period, exemplified by "Jeux," are mere phantoms—echoes of mannerisms. Under M. Monteux the novelty was played admirably.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

TWO SYMPHONIES DRAW THOUSANDS

Boston Orchestra in Great Performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" at Matinee.

PHILHARMONIC AT CARNEGIE

A notable performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony (sixth) gave special joy to a large audience assembled yesterday at Carnegie Hall at the third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Society. Debussy's Dance Poem, "Jeux," set free with singularly happy vivacity, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine," a Symphonic Poem susceptible of more display and deserving of less importance than Mr. Monteux gave it, comprised the latter half of an exceedingly well-played program

The Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall in the evening divided an interesting program between Tschaikowsky and Wagner. "Rienzi," "Tannhaeuser," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tristan und Isolde" were signally represented, and Tschaikowskys Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and "Marche Slav," which concluded the concert, made up the musical contrasts and won much approval from the congregation.

Edward Morris, the sterling young American pianist, again pleased a fine audience with his recital at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon. Beethoven's Sonate (opus. 57), delivered with scholarly authority and poise, a group of five Chopin numbers played with exquisite understanding and skill, numbers by Scarlatti, Palmgren, Leschetizky and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 6) fulfilled a most successful recital.

In the evening at Aeolian Hall Mary Cavan, well known as a soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, and Otakar Marak, her husband, who was also a leading tenor with Campanini, gave an interesting recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening. Frank Bibb was at the piano.

From American
New York City
JAN 16 1920

AUDITORS COLD TO DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fails to Create Enthusiasm with the Piece—Music in "Sermons of Stone" Essentially Theatrical

By MAX SMITH.

As coryphaeus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux introduced to New Yorkers a week ago Saturday Debussy's "Jeux."

This work was written probably in 1911, or perhaps in 1912, and presumably as a ballet. At any rate the redoubtable Diaghelff, promoter of the Ballet Russe, produced it in that form on May 15, 1913, at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, Paris, the choreorgraphic embellishments having been designed by Nijinski, and the scenery and costumes by Bakst. It is interesting to note, however, that the composer's piano arrangement, dedicated to Mme. Jacques Durand, was published in 1912, while the score did not appear until 1913.

On March 1, 1914, at a Colonne concert in Paris, conducted by Gabriel Pierne, "Jeux" was first performed as an orchestral piece. The composer himself had made a slight cut in the score. Mr. Philip Hale, distinguished programme annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells us that the "audience was undecided, cold." According to a French chronicler, "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They waited.'"

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

NEW YORKERS received the work in much the same way the other day. There was no hissing, to be sure. Sibilant disapproval is not tolerated in American music halls and opera houses. It might be well if it were. For now that the claque is an established fact in our lyric theatres at least, if not in the concert world, what other means have those who are displeased to counteract organized applause and expose it?

But no hissing was needed to show how little Debussy's "Jeux" caught the fancy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's audience; for no one tried to create any spurious enthusiasm. A few polite listeners clapped their hands to save Monsieur from embarrassment. But that was all. As in Paris, "the majority remained passive." They "waited."

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

TWO tennis balls figures in the pantomimic scheme of "Jeux." The scene is supposed to be a park at twilight. One of the balls lands on the stage as the curtain rises, and is sought in vain by a sportive swain, who is joined by "two timorous and curious young girls." The other, "thrown by some malicious hand," with the sole purpose, no doubt, of spoiling the fun, checks the amorous saltatorical play of the three, sends them scooting into arboreal shadows, and brings the music to a stop, somewhat to the relief of the way-worn listener, it must be confessed.

The explicit explanatory notes presented in the pianoforte arrangement of the score give the plot of the ballet in considerable detail. Each of the dancing damsels would have the tennis player for herself. That flannelled fawn prances about with the first. He kisses her. "The other girl is peevish and slightly jealous, while the couple remain amorously ecstatic." She tip-toes by herself "in an ironical, mocking manner." Suddenly the youth's interest in the second flares up. He leaves the first to grieve, while he dallies with her companion. Maiden No. 2 tries to prevent Maiden No. 1 from running away. "She succeeds in embracing her. The young man gently puts their heads apart. They look about them: The beauty of the night, the joy of the light, everything urges them to give way to their fantasie. Henceforth, the three dance together. The young man, with a passionate gesture brings the three heads together and a triple kiss melts them into ecstasy."

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

IN devising this scenario the eminent Nijinski perhaps intended to advocate what, to coin a word, might be called duogamy. It would almost seem so. But surely Debussy's music, while it is thoroughly characteristic of the composer's style and is brilliantly scored, of course, seems as hollow as a bounding tennis ball and quite as elusive. It is, indeed, one of the emptiest bubbles of shimmering tonal tints that the great French innovator ever blew, and shows from every point of view evidences of labor without the impulse of inspiration or even desire.

The refined impotence of "Jeux" was made the more conspicuous at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee because it followed Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which received a performance enjoyable, if rhythmically blurred, and because it preceded Glazounoff's virile, colorful and dramatically eloquent symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," a work that surely deserves to be heard more often than it is.

⊙ ⊙ ⊙

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The best balanced, interesting and most enjoyable programme of this season's Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, was that given at the Academy of Music last Friday evening, it being the third of the organization's annual five appearances in this borough. Mr. Monteux showed splendid judgment in choice and arrangement of the evening's music offering, opening his programme with Brahm's C minor symphony as bulwark for the first half, and devoting the second to Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and the "Mephisto Waltz" by Franz Liszt, these two being separated by the vocal numbers of the soloist, Emilio De Gogorza. Mr. Monteux, pre-eminently French in patriotic sentiment, will be remembered as having balked at conducting German music during his first American season some three or four seasons past. But at Friday evening's concert he lent himself "con amore" to the performance of the first symphonic work from the pen of that Teuton giant, Johannes Brahms, a work that the Boston players have frequently given to Brooklyn audiences in former seasons, under the batons of Gericke, Muck and Fiedler. In comparison with the readings of these illustrious predecessors, Mr. Monteux's interpretation holds its own as an intellectual, powerful and emotional exposition of the full breadth, depth and sustained beauty of this magnificent score, which, though mystic in its philosophical outreachings, is, nevertheless, governed by the sanity of a clear, pervading, calm faith. Through the hazy mists of its brooding beauties flows a classical outline akin to that of Beethoven; indeed, it would seem to be a continuation of Beethoven's symphonic mood. Upon this occasion, as aforesaid, the performance was noticeably distinguished the entire orchestra playing with superb body of tone color and unanimity of execution. Messrs. Fradkin Longy and Mueller imparted special distinction to the solo episodes for violin, oboe and horn. Fine contrast, as "programme" music against that of Brahm's "absolute," was afforded in the Glazounoff poem, an early work of this gifted Russian composer, and one that attracted the admiration of Tschaikowsky. Built on three themes, his score narrates the historical folk song of the Cossack river pirate, Stenka Razine, who ruled the river Volga in the latter part of the seventeenth century, devastating and pillaging, with his band of terrible hetmen, the villages and towns along its shores. After thirty years he gives to "Mother Volga" a "gift," his most precious earthly treasure, the captive Persian princess, who was his mistress, throwing her into the blue, iced, majestic stream. The orchestration and instrumentation employed by Glazounoff in this composition might well excite the envy of devotees to the so-called ultra-modern music of today. Liszt's village tavern waltz, the second episode from his three settings of Lenau's "Faust," has long figured on Boston Symphony programmes. The New England critic, John Sullivan Dwight, allowed, far back as 1870, that this music was "positively devilish * * * simply diabolical, shutting out every ray of light and heaven, from which music sprang." To-day the same criticism seems appropriate, although the public attitude towards latitude in art has considerably relaxed since the years of Dwight's critical activities.

The inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music frequently detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mr. De Gogorza's two recitations and airs from Gluck and Massenet. These were the "Diane Impitoyable" from "Iphigenie en Aulide" and "Promesse de Mon Avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore." Emma Eames' distinguished husband, Emilio De Gorgoza, is every inch an artist, fully worthy of the position that he holds as one of the few concert world's foremost baritones. His voice is rich, resonant, admirably controlled, and to its qualities are added those of the singer's perfect French diction, his elegance of style in delivery, his commanding stage presence.

Throughout the evening the playing of the orchestra revealed frequent flashes of its former supremacy. In Mr. Monteux the players have a leader who possesses all the potential elements of a great symphonic conductor. His is a wonderfully expanding genius, one that claims an ever-growing regard.

From Times
New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert on Thursday, Jan. 8, Mr. Monteux will conduct Brahms's First symphony, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." On Saturday afternoon, Jan. 10, the program includes Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" or "Play," a novelty, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

The New York Symphony Orchestra's

From
EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
D JAN 19 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

De Gogorza, the Soloist, Gets an Ovation.

That sterling singer Emilio de Gogorza had an ovation last night at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy for his broad, sympathetic and moving singing of the air "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from Massenet's "Le Roi De Lahore." The air is so attractive, or, at least, it was sung last night, that one wondered what the weak spots in the opera must be which keep it from revival in a season when the opera house is shaking the ragbag of the earlier Italian repertory for "novelties." Before he came to the Massenet air Mr. Gogorza had sung broadly melodious and noble melody from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide." Gluck is out of the repertory at the opera because there are no singers in the company having the breadth of style and the command of legato which his music demands, but the opera singers revel in Massenet.

The concert opened with the First Symphony of Brahms, which was reviewed in detail on this page yesterday, following its performance in Manhattan. The other numbers were an attractive symphonic poem by Glazanoff, "Stenka Razine," in which the rich melody evoked a lovely picture of the noble flowing River Volga and which rose into eloquence at the climax of the tragedy on which the music is based. The performance closed with Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," based on Lenau's "Faust." This music has those dramatic and theatrical qualities which call out the best work of Pierre Monteux, the conductor. It is not subtle, but it is stirring, and it is even fierce, and Mr. Monteux, as well as his brilliant band, revelled in it.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS CONVINCINGLY

Continues Progressive Policy in Lyric; Ornstein's Work Excellent.

From beginning to end the third Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Leo Ornstein, pianist and composer, as special soloist, given in the Lyric Theater last night, was interesting. The works produced were of the kind classified variously and humorously as "music," "modern music" and "ultra-modern music" (each term subject to different meanings!); therefore, there was something on the program suited, at least in type, to some one of the different degrees of musical attainment represented in the audience. The audience aws large, although there were a few vacant seats, and particularly demonstrative after the performance of the concerto.

Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Opus 20, was the first number of the program. This was followed by the "ultra-modern" work of the program—the orchestral version of Debussy's "danced poem," "Jeux" ("Play"); this by the Concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23, for piano and orchestra, composed by MacDowell, native of the United States; and this by Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem entitled "Sten Razine" (the name of the leader of a pillaging band on the Volga, who operated in style.

Under Mr. Monteux the orchestra played brilliantly, fervently, and with pervading, sustained depth. Their work throughout all the intracacies of the complex music was adjusted so well as to be convincing and enable all to hear "that hath an ear." Mr. Ornstein—appearing instead of Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who was ill—played in the concerto in a straightforward manner. His work was firm, clean cut, accurate, precise, his style simplicity itself, and it demonstrated afresh the entire compatability of sanity and "advanced thought." He gave an effective presentation of a work quite unlike the pioneer products of his own composition. Applause recalled him to the stage many times.

Progressiveness of Mr. Monteux's programs in Baltimore is most satisfying.

J. N. H.

m CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Gives Splendid Concert at the Academy of Music.

Disagreeable weather had no unmusical effects on the strings and other musical instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. The band played beautifully, and Conductor Pierre Monteux read his numbers eloquently. There were many interesting things in the concert. Brahms' first symphony was the important offering. It is in four moveemnts, full of wonderful beauties, and the treatment of the thematic material was masterly, the precision of attack was commendable and the tone ingratiating.

The soloist of the evening was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone. The audience, large and enthusiastic, greeted him with an ovation. Mr. De Gogorza's style is all that could be desired in songs requiring breadth and refinement. His rich and well-equalized voice did ample justice to his French songs, Gluck's "Diane Impitoyable" and Massenet's "Promesse de mon avenir."

The remainder of the programme was devoted to the beautiful symphonic poem, Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine," and Liszt's "The Dance of the Village Tavern" (Mephisto waltz). The audience received the Boston visitors enthusiastically.

From
EVENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

LYRIC

Boston Symphony.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of M. Pierre Monteux, last night was one of unusual excellence in that the organization itself proved to be in fine trim and the program of great interest, the Chausson symphony in B flat major, opus 20, serving as a splendid introduction. This work is operatic rather than symphonic, but contains numerous passages of great charm. It may be said to represent the transition in French musical development from its earlier forms, before this development had attained the ultra-modern shape it now bears, and there is in the symphony much that is suggestive of Wagner, who seems to have influenced Chausson greatly. This influence, however, has had happy results, for there is no impairment of originality, while adding to the inherent strength of the composer. It was played in an admirable manner.

In the Debussy number this French composer appears at his best or at his worst, according to how one feels about it. It is entitled "Jeux" (Play), and by way of explanation the program adds "A Danced Poem." Those who believe that music means harmony will view the composition rather as a dream made up of the most impossible and unexpected happenings, in which figures and circumstances present a continuous phantasmagoria, never appearing normal or logical, running along in a perfect maze of incongruities and passing with bewildering suddenness from one disjointed situation to another even more distorted. It is such a dream as leaves one on awakening in a state of confusion and unable to recount exactly what occurred.

Debussy in "Jeux" observes a certain rhythm, to be sure, but he seems morbidly anxious to avoid anything like harmony. For a few beats he starts expectations that presently there shall follow a real appeal, but always the hopes of the auditor are dashed, and the orchestra trails off into other dissonances perhaps more radical than those that have gone before. At several points there is obvious an attempt at continuous development of a theme, a figure being repeated by various instruments in succession, but the attempt comes to nothing and the hearer finds himself floundering in a dream world again.

The handling of such difficult and rambling work by the orchestra was excellent, but all of the organization's refinements and the director's resourcefulness in infusing color could not make the offering really palatable. Like certain relishes which some persons with a reputation as epicures profess to be very fond of, but which the general run of humanity makes a wry face over, "Jeux" is a dish for the musical epicure.

The substitution of the McDowell concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23, with Leo Ornstein as the pianist, for Emilio de Gogorza, who had been taken ill, was fortuitous in more respects than one. In the first place, the audience got an opportunity to hear a dignified and impressive work by an American composer, who deserves to figure far more frequently on concert programs than he does, and, in the second place, the audience gained the chance to listen to a magnetic and brilliant artist, who unites a tremendous technique with temperament and profound sentiment, and who invested his performance with a wealth of color and a breadth of tone that imparted a real thrill. His broken octaves in the second movement proved to be something of a revelation, while his runs derwent the academic German influence and became as harmless as Mendelssohn at his most genteel! At last accounts he is still living.

Stenka Razine was an interesting person, a wild Cossack chieftain who once ruled the Volga and made unholy war in Holy Russia. It was his fate to be actually broken on the wheel in 1672, after being captured by the forces of the Czar Alexis. In this symphonic poem he is the lover of a captive Persian princess, with whom he navigates the Volga in a most sumptuously appointed barge. When the soldiers of the czar have hemmed him in he determines that at least they shall not possess the princess. So, declaring that he will give unto Mother Volga what in his eyes is the most precious of earthly treasures, he throws the princess into the river. Then, with his savage band, he rushes on the soldiers.

The symphonic poem is not a closely wrought and meticulously sustained composition. It is not the work of Brahms. But in spite of some padding, of some youthful incoherence, it is a glorious affair, romantic, imaginative, richly colored, a riot to the ear. Particularly impressive is the opening, built musically on the well-known chant of the Volga bargemen, epic in its portrayal of the Volga River. The music depicting the Persian princess is a real seduction; the catastrophe thunders in tones appropriately dramatic. And throughout the length of the piece there is the haunting and mighty presence of the Volga River.

Mr. Monteux led a superb performance of the work. The large audience seemed to like it. It also liked the "Pastoral" symphony. The effect of "Jeux" was more problematic. It is recorded of the Colonne audience which first heard "Jeux" as a concert piece that "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They waited." Nobody hissed on Saturday, but several giggled. Some people always giggle when they don't know what else to do.

PITTS SANBORN.

From
EVENING POST,
New York City

Recent Concerts

Debussy's later compositions are not much admired even by the full-blooded Debussyites. One of them, "Jeux," had what was called its first performance in New York at the Saturday afternoon performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one of those works which help explain why this Parisian never carried out his threat of composing a Tristan that would drive Wagner's from the opera houses—an amusing ambition in view of the fact that there isn't a drop of red blood or a moment of real passion in even the youthful works of Debussy. Those of his last period, exemplified by "Jeux," are mere phantoms—echoes of mannerisms. Under M. Monteux the novelty was played admirably.

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

TWO SYMPHONIES DRAW THOUSANDS

Boston Orchestra in Great Performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" at Matinee.

PHILHARMONIC AT CARNEGIE

A notable performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony (sixth) gave special joy to a large audience assembled yesterday at Carnegie Hall at the third matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Society. Debussy's Dance Poem, "Jeux," set free with singularly happy vivacity, and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine," a Symphonic Poem susceptible of more display and deserving of less importance than Mr. Monteux gave it, comprised the latter half of an exceedingly well-played program.

The Philharmonic Society at Carnegie Hall in the evening divided an interesting program between Tschaikowsky and Wagner. "Rienzi," "Tannhaeuser," "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tristan und Isolde" were signally represented, and Tschaikowskys Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," and "Marche Slav," which concluded the concert, made up the musical contrasts and won much approval from the congregation.

Edward Morris, the sterling young American pianist, again pleased a fine audience with his recital at Aeolian Hall in the afternoon. Beethoven's Sonate (opus. 57), delivered with scholarly authority and poise, a gronp of five Chopin numbers played with exquisite understanding and skill, numbers by Scarlatti, Palmgren, Leschetizky and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody (No. 6) fulfilled a most successful recital.

In the evening at Aeolian Hall Mary Cavan, well known as a soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, and Otakar Marak, her husband, who was also a leading tenor with Campanini, gave an interesting recital at Aeolian Hall in the evening. Frank Bibb was at the piano.

From American
New York City

JAN 18 1920

AUDITORS COLD TO DEBUSSY'S "JEUX"

Boston Symphony Orchestra Fails to Create Enthusiasm with the Piece—Music in "Sermons of Stone" Essentially Theatrical

By MAX SMITH.

AS coryphaeus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux introduced to New Yorkers a week ago Saturday Debussy's "Jeux."

This work was written probably in 1911, or perhaps in 1912, and presumably as a ballet. At any rate the redoubtable Diaghelliff, promoter of the Ballet Russe, produced it in that form on May 15, 1913, at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, Paris, the choreorgraphic embellishments having been designed by Nijinski, and the scenery and costumes by Bakst. It is interesting to note, however, that the composer's piano arrangement, dedicated to Mme. Jacques Durand, was published in 1912, while the score did not appear until 1913.

On March 1, 1914, at a Colonne concert in Paris, conducted by Gabriel Pierne, "Jeux" was first performed as an orchestral piece. The composer himself had made a slight cut in the score. Mr. Philip Hale, distinguished programme annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells us that the "audience was undecided, cold." According to a French chronicler, "some applauded; some hissed; the majority remained passive and distrustful, cautious. They waited."

◎ ◎ ◎

NEW YORKERS received the work in much the same way the other day. There was no hissing, to be sure. Sibilant disapproval is not tolerated in American music halls and opera houses. It might be well if it were. For now that the claque is an established fact in our lyric theatres at least, if not in the concert world, what other means have those who are displeased to counteract organized applause and expose it?

But no hissing was needed to show how little Debussy's "Jeux" caught the fancy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's audience; for no one tried to create any spurious enthusiasm. A few polite listeners clapped their hands to save Monsieur from embarrassment. But that was all. As in Paris, "the majority remained passive." They "waited."

◎ ◎ ◎

TWO tennis balls figures in the pantomimic scheme of "Jeux." The scene is supposed to be a park at twilight. One of the balls lands on the stage as the curtain rises, and is sought in vain by a sportive swain, who is joined by "two timorous and curious young girls." The other, "thrown by some malicious hand," with the sole purpose, no doubt, of spoiling the fun, checks the amorous saltatorical play of the three, sends them scooting into arboreal shadows, and brings the music to a stop, somewhat to the relief of the way-worn listener, it must be confessed.

The explicit explanatory notes presented in the pianoforte arrangement of the score give the plot of the ballet in considerable detail. Each of the dancing damsels would have the tennis player for herself. That flannelled fawn prances about with the first. He kisses her. "The other girl is peevish and slightly jealous, while the couple remain amorously ecstatic." She tip-toes by herself "in an ironical, mocking manner." Suddenly the youth's interest in the second flares up. He leaves the first to grieve, while he dallies with her companion. Maiden No. 2 tries to prevent Maiden No. 1 from running away. "She succeeds in embracing her. The young man gently puts their heads apart. They look about them: The beauty of the night, the joy of the light, everything urges them to give way to their fantasie. Henceforth, the three dance together. The young man, with a passionate gesture brings the three heads together and a triple kiss melts them into ecstasy."

◎ ◎ ◎

IN devising this scenario the eminent Nijinski perhaps intended to advocate what, to coin a word, might be called duogamy. It would almost seem so. But surely Debussy's music, while it is thoroughly characteristic of the composer's style and is brilliantly scored, of course, seems as hollow as a bounding tennis ball and quite as elusive. It is, indeed, one of the emptiest bubbles of shimmering tonal tints that the great French innovator ever blew, and shows from every point of view evidences of labor without the impulse of inspiration or even desire.

The refined impotence of "Jeux" was made the more conspicuous at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee because it followed Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which received a performance enjoyable, if rhythmically blurred, and because it preceded Glazounoff's virile, colorful and dramatically eloquent symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," a work that surely deserves to be heard more often than it is.

◎ ◎ ◎

From STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 19 1920

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The best balanced, interesting and most enjoyable programme of this season's Brooklyn series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, was that given at the Academy of Music last Friday evening, it being the third of the organization's annual five appearances in this borough. Mr. Monteux showed splendid judgment in choice and arrangement of the evening's music offering, opening his programme with Brahm's C minor symphony as bulwark for the first half, and devoting the second to Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine" and the "Mephisto Waltz" by Franz Liszt, these two being separated by the vocal numbers of the soloist, Emilio De Gogorza. Mr. Monteux, pre-eminently French in patriotic sentiment, will be remembered as having balked at conducting German music during his first American season some three or four seasons past. But at Friday evening's concert he lent himself "con amore" to the performance of the first symphonic work from the pen of that Teuton giant, Johannes Brahms, a work that the Boston players have frequently given to Brooklyn audiences in former seasons, under the batons of Gericke, Muck and Fiedler. In comparison with the readings of these illustrious predecessors, Mr. Monteux's interpretation holds its own as an intellectual, powerful and emotional exposition of the full breadth, depth and sustained beauty of this magnificent score, which, though mystic in its philosophical outreachings, is, nevertheless, governed by the sanity of a clear, pervading, calm faith. Through the hazy mists of its brooding beauties flows a classical outline akin to that of Beethoven; indeed, it would seem to be a continuation of Beethoven's symphonic mood. Upon this occasion, as aforesaid, the performance was noticeably distinguished, the entire orchestra playing with superb body of tone color and unanimity of execution. Messrs. Fradkin, Longy and Mueller imparted special distinction to the solo episodes for violin, oboe and horn. Fine contrast, as "programme" music against that of Brahm's "absolute," was afforded in the Glazounoff poem, an early work of this gifted Russian composer, and one that attracted the admiration of Tschaikowsky. Built on three themes, his score narrates the historical folk song of the Cossack river pirate, Stenka Razine, who ruled the river Volga in the latter part of the seventeenth century, devastating and pillaging, with his band of terrible hetmen, the villages and towns along its shores. After thirty years he gives to "Mother Volga" a "gift," his most precious earthly treasure, the captive Persian princess, who was his mistress, throwing her into the blue, iced, majestic stream. The orchestration and instrumentation employed by Glazounoff in this composition might well excite the envy of devotees to the so-called ultra-modern music of today. Liszt's village tavern waltz, the second episode from his three settings of Lenau's "Faust," has long figured on Boston Symphony programmes. The New England critic, John Sullivan Dwight, allowed, far back as 1870, that this music was "positively devilish * * * simply diabolical, shutting out every ray of light and heaven, from when music sprang." To-day the same criticism seems appropriate, although the public attitude towards latitude in art has considerably relaxed since the years of Dwight's critical activities.

The inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music frequently detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mr. De Gogorza's two recitations and airs from Gluck and Massenet. These were the "Diane Impitoyable" from "Iphigenie en Aulide" and "Promesse de Mon Avenir" from "Le Roi de Lahore." Emma Eames' distinguished husband, Emilio De Gorgoza, is every inch an artist, fully worthy of the position that he holds as one of the few concert world's foremost baritones. His voice is rich, resonant, admirably controlled, and to its qualities are added those of the singer's perfect French diction, his elegance of style in delivery, his commanding stage presence.

Throughout the evening the playing of the orchestra revealed frequent flashes of its former supremacy. In Mr. Monteux the players have a leader who possesses all the potential elements of a great symphonic conductor. His is a wonderfully expanding genius, one that claims an ever-growing regard.

From Times
New York City

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third evening concert on Thursday, Jan. 8, Mr. Monteux will conduct Brahms's First symphony, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razine." On Saturday afternoon, Jan. 10, the program includes Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, Debussy's "Jeux" or "Play," a novelty, and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

From
EAGLE
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

D JAN 19 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

De Gogorza, the Soloist, Gets an Ovation.

That sterling singer Emilio de Gogorza had an ovation last night at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy for his broad, sympathetic and moving singing of the air "Promesse de Mon Avenir," from Massenet's "Le Roi De Lahore." The air is so attractive, or, at least, it was sung last night, that one wondered what the weak spots in the opera must be which keep it from revival in a season when the opera house is shaking the ragbag of the earlier Italian repertory for "novelties." Before he came to the Massenet air Mr. Gogorza had sung broadly melodious and noble melody from Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulide." Gluck is out of the repertory at the opera because there are no singers in the company having the breadth of style and the command of legato which his music demands, but the opera singers revel in Massenet.

The concert opened with the First Symphony of Brahms, which was reviewed in detail on this page yesterday, following its performance in Manhattan. The other numbers were an attractive symphonic poem by Glazanoff, "Stenka Razine," in which the rich melody evoked a lovely picture of the noble flowing River Volga and which rose into eloquence at the climax of the tragedy on which the music is based. The performance closed with Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," based on Lenau's "Faust." This music has those dramatic and theatrical qualities which call out the best work of Pierre Monteux, the conductor. It is not subtle, but it is stirring, and it is even fierce, and Mr. Monteux, as well as his brilliant band, revelled in it.

From
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS CONVINCINGLY

Continues Progressive Policy in Lyric; Ornstein's Work Excellent.

From beginning to end the third Baltimore concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, with Leo Ornstein, pianist and composer, as special soloist, given in the Lyric Theater last night, was interesting. The works produced were of the kind classified variously and humorously as "music," "modern music" and "ultra-modern music" (each term subject to different meanings!); therefore, there was something on the program suited, at least in type, to some one of the different degrees of musical attainment represented in the audience. The audience aws large, although there were a few vacant seats, and particularly demonstrative after the performance of the concerto.

Chausson's symphony in B flat major, Opus 20, was the first number of the program. This was followed by the "ultra-modern" work of the program—the orchestral version of Debussy's "danced poem," "Jeux" ("Play"); this by the Concerto in D minor, No. 2, Opus 23, for piano and orchestra, composed by MacDowell, native of the United States; and this by Glazounoff's Symphonic Poem entitled "Sten Razine" (the name of the leader of a pillaging band on the Volga, who operated in style.

Under Mr. Monteux the orchestra played brilliantly, fervently, and with pervading, sustained depth. Their work throughout all the intracacies of the complex music was adjusted so well as to be convincing and enable all to hear "that hath an ear." Mr. Ornstein—appearing instead of Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, who was ill—played in the concerto in a straightforward manner. His work was firm, clean cut, accurate, precise, his style simplicity itself, and it demonstrated afresh the entire compatability of sanity and "advanced thought." He gave an effective presentation of a work quite unlike the pioneer products of his own composition. Applause recalled him to the stage many times.

Progressiveness of Mr. Monteux's programs in Baltimore is most satisfying.

J. N. H.

m CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Gives Splendid Concert at the Academy of Music.

Disagreeable weather had no unmusical effects on the strings and other musical instruments of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy of Music. The band played beautifully, and Conductor Pierre Monteux read his numbers eloquently. There were many interesting things in the concert. Brahms' first symphony was the important offering. It is in four moveemnts, full of wonderful beauties, and the treatment of the thematic material was masterly, the precision of attack was commendable and the tone ingratiating.

The soloist of the evening was Emilio de Gogorza, baritone. The audience, large and enthusiastic, greeted him with an ovation. Mr. De Gogorza's style is all that could be desired in songs requiring breadth and refinement. His rich and well-equalized voice did ample justice to his French songs, Gluck's "Diane Impitoyable" and Massenet's "Pro

The devot poem and Tar ence thusi are like the soughing of the wind through trees, rising to a tempest or sinking to a barely audible murmur. With all of his astonishing facility, he is exceedingly virile and vibrant and his interpretation of the number can, in truth, be called authoritative.

VE Ba

The concerto presents an unmistakable American touch or atmosphere. There are introduced in it syncopations of a refined order that suggest quite distinctly negro melodies, though the work as a whole moves along with almost classic stateliness, the main theme in the first movement being revived in the third in changed form.

Not less interesting was the symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," by Glazounoff, a work typically Russian, with more than a barbaric touch, but with its cacophonous bursts so deftly handled that one not only gets no sense of garishness, but actually comes to expect and relish them. Russians have a way of introducing these methods, which composers of some oth countries try to imitate and only s ed in making incongruous.

The tone poem, after a few introductory passages, runs into the familiar Volga boat song, rendered in deep, melancholy, almost tragic vein, passing through a sustained harmonious and wholly consecutive treatment to what may be designated as a reflection of the soul of the people, almost cheerful, yet with an atmosphere of melancholy brooding over all. The longing for freedom is expressed. From discussion the tone picture passes on to tumult, which rises higher and higher as masses and repressive bodies clash, and culminates in a bang. The would-be deliverer of the people from tyranny has fallen, and the Volga boat song is heard again, double bass and celli giving a mournful strain like a dirge.

The composition expresses in music what the police of the Czars would never have permitted in words. It was played in admirable style and made a deep impression.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Jan. 16
Transcript.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concerts despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stowjowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1000, there or thereabouts; it has been played—once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue of its own. None the less with all deference to the diligent and aspiring Stojowski, symphonies of this sort were written by the sheaf in Europe at the end of the nineties, at the beginning of this precious century. They court tonal energy and tonal volume. Wherever the composer may be employs a full modern orchestra and, as it seems, likes to see and to hear it at energetic work. Strenuous are his rhythms; vigorous, his progressions; firm-limned his modulations. Thick flow his harmonies; ample-voiced are his instruments. Full tilt, as with palette-knife or thumb, the composer, be it Mr. Stojowski or another of the species, lays on his colors. With tireless, nervous energy, he weaves a full-fibred web of music, keeps it in an unflagging and nervous motion; sets in sharp contrast, deploys his instrumental voices, like Mr. Stojowski with the hollow tones of the bass-clarinet, as freshly and individually as he may. In particular, upon the Scherzo, he bestows whatever fancies may be stirring in his spirit, whatever dexterities may tip his fingers. Light-paced, light-rhythmed shall it be, teeming with apt and tricky suspensions and syncopations, bright with jets of harmonic and instrumental color, piquant with swift, apt turns of modulation. Such a scherzo Mr. Stojowski has written with appreciable fancy, with supple resource.

So runs the nervous energy of these secondary "symphonists" of the late nineties and the earliest years of the new century; for that energy, even when it did no more than "thrash about," was oftenest their mutual trait. The mold into which they cast and confined these energies was usually the orthodox symphonic form, slightly liberalized by the unexpected appearance of past or future motivs in succeeding or presaging divisions of the music. The moods that each movement reflected were the conventional states of music-making mind and expression—the slow and deep-voiced preluding; the abrupt and turbulent Allegro; the Adagio or Andante like to the introductory measures; the glinting and gleeful Scherzo; the emphatic, broad-measured, largely mounting Finale. As lacking in individuality, as routine as the form were the motivs whence the music sprang. Upon his manipulation and coloring the composer depended much; upon his big voice, thick textures and far-flung energies he depended yet more. Exactly such a symphony of twenty years agone is Mr. Stojowski's. Like his concerto for piano through which Mr. Paderewski and Dr. Muck once swept at Symphony Hall, it is neither better nor worse than the average of its kind. Only, to ears of January, 1920, it is distinctly written in the fashion before the last. Another sort of workmanship—finesse instead of energy, transparency rather than thickness, flights of fancy more than sweeps of power—are now the mode.

Not too advisedly, if Mr. Monteux were considering the composer "as guest," did he follow Mr. Stojowski's symphony with Gluck's overture to his opera of Agamemnon's daughter, offered in sacrifice by the Greeks held on their voyage to Troy by a pettiless Artemis who for the maid and for the warriors at last rolented. Gluck uses the relatively small orchestra of 1774; Gluck is content with transparent harmonies, limpid progress, few and thin instrumental colorings, what seems to us a formal workmanship, bitterly as the Parisians of that distant day debated the composer's departures from orthodoxy. Yet there is the music, after nearly a century and a half, is the gentle and submissive Iphigenia, the imperious chiefs, perhaps the haughty goddess; while there surely are the pity and the pang of the old legend; with the glamors of Gluck's music, and many a tender embroidery—his own or the librettist's—to soften it. Better would Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which lacks neither diabolic energy nor vigor of voice and illusion, have companioned Mr. Stojowski's symphony. By this time Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra near to perfection in this tonal devilment. Would that Mr. Nijinsky had visualized it, as he proposed, on the stage! The eye, no less than the ear, it quickens.

And Mr. Bedetti chose Schumann's concerto, least seldom played of all the canonized concertos for violoncello—perhaps for that very reason chose it. Rich upon the ear, warm with fancy, lustrous or deep of voice flows the song of the Andante—the richer, the warmer, the more glowing for the tone in which the 'cellist released and enhanced it, for the intelligence, the sensibility, the artistry with which at every turn he measured and guided it. Call so much of the concerto a Canzone for violoncello and orchestra as it deserves to endure and to be played by a musician of Mr. Bedetti's mettle. But the rest—the "passage-work" of the beginning, the cadenza, the figuration, the trippings hither and yon of the finale—are near to the dryest bones of composer's jugglery and virtuoso's skill. It is of record that the dutiful Clara, Schumann's wife, admired them. Has anybody done so since? Yet perhaps Mr. Bedetti shared this admiration. Anyhow, flawlessly he played them.

H. T. P.

The merits of Mr. Laurent as first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra are beginning to penetrate the ears of the reviewers in New York. The other day The Sun "rejoiced to hear the golden voice of Mr. Laurent's flute" in sundry measures of Brahms's symphony in C minor.

Trans. Jan 17
Tribune. Jan. 17

Novel Programme

TWO long and exacting pieces, a test upon conductor, orchestra and audiences, divide Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. The first is the long-anticipated second symphony of d'Indy, too seldom played in Boston and unheard here since the days of Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall. By common consent, the piece is not only the composer's most austere and exalted music, but the symphony as the above all other French symphonies of the immediate time. It is a work of the intellect and the spirit as well as of the small skill and of a highly individual temperament. As d'Indy plies all his resources, so also he demands much of his hearers. The other number of the programme is Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra, again music of abstract content and austere voice, asking not little of all concerned with it. In it, Mr. Kreisler, auspiciously returned to the Symphony Concerts, will play the violin part—for the first time in years in Boston.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Evening Star

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, delighted a large audience at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at its third concert of the present season. Especially pleasing was the Mendelssohn "Symphony, No. 5, in D Minor," the famous "Reformation Symphony." The first and third movements of the symphony were sympathetically rendered, but the orchestra was at its best in the second movement, allegro vivace, with its dainty melody and captivating rhythm.

Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust," the truly devilish "Mephisto Waltz," as it is known, pleased or shocked auditors according to their individual preferences, but there was no gainsaying the fact the majority of the audience yesterday did not know exactly what to make of the number. According to tradition, this attitude has always been that of audiences, except where the number has been branded "unutterably ugly" and let go at that. The main theme of the waltz is unusual and not unpleasing. The orchestra finished its part on the program with Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," given with discrimination.

Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein was the soloist of the afternoon. He quite captivated the audience with his playing of MacDowell's "Concerto in D Minor, No. 2," for pianoforte and orchestra. Although the accompaniment was a bit loud in several portions of the concerto, Mr. Ornstein triumphantly overcame this slight handicap and demonstrated an exceptional technique. He was forced to bow acknowledgment time and time again.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
EVENING SUN,

It is delightful news that Leo Ornstein is to play the second MacDowell piano concerto at the Lyric this evening with the Boston Orchestra. He is an extraordinarily interesting artist, one who, in many ways, possesses the greatest imaginative distinction. He will at least, this evening, have an opportunity to play in Baltimore before a dignified audience that will take his performance seriously. The bad manners of the auditors at his recital a season or so ago is one of the unforgettable and unforgivable things in Baltimore's musical history.

Newcomer Who Has Proved His Worth

an Bedetti (Photograph by Horner)
First Violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra

RALD
ashington, D. C.
JAN 7 - 1920 P

Boston Symphony Rises To Heights of Olden Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave its third concert of this season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein, pianist, was substituted as soloist.

The program, as changed, was a peculiar mixture, and poorly arranged. Beginning with the Mendelssohn Symphony, in D minor, "Reformation," which typifies the triumph of right over wrong, followed by the Liszt Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto Waltz), which has been termed by many as the typification of hell, then on to the McDowell Concerto and after these tacking on to what was a finished program the great tone poem of Glazounoff. It would have seemed more fitting to have begun with the Liszt number, then on through the Mendelssohn, closing with the Concerto, leaving the Glazounoff number for some future time.

It seemed hard to believe that this was the same orchestra which accompanied Mr. Rachmininoff and struggled through the program of the first of the season's series. Mr. Monteux has accomplished what seemed the impossible, having brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to the perfection of other days. It is a little saddening to think that Maj. Higginson is no longer here to enjoy with us the orchestra's return to its own.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Reformation" symphony brought out the similarity of the "Good Friday" motif of "Parsifal" in the first movement, the accompaniment giving the feelings of the war of evil forces against the right. The second movement, handled in a manner which conveyed the thought of numerous forces, each working without a particular purpose, led up to the third movement, built on Luther's hymn "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The whole symphony carried a wonderful sermon.

The Liszt selection was played no less brilliantly and with no less meaning, but, coming as it did, after the lesson which had been conveyed by the Symphony, struck a jarring note.

Mr. Ornstein was in the unenviable position of a substitute, but played the McDowell Concerto with a cleanness of technique, precision of expression and fire of realism.

The Glazounoff Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," which followed really seemed to belong to another concert, although it was beautifully played and its interpretation left nothing to be desired.

A. W. H.

m EVENING SUN
dress New York City
e

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the programme Debussy's danced poem "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Sun
Baltimore, Md. JAN 8 1919

Gogorza To Be Soloist.

THE fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the third Boston symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 7, is one of the most admired barytones on the concert stage may be in part attributed to his Spanish descent, which lends a peculiar charm to his interpretations, and in part to his American birth and affiliations, which bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity lies in the quality of his tones.

At this concert he will be heard to advantage in the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will provide a rich treasure for the purely symphonic portion of this concert in the eloquent symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, considered with Cesar Franck's as the highest and noblest achievement of the French school. Because the composer met an early death by an accident in the prime of his career his masterpiece is the more cherished. The remainder of the concert will be occupied by two works hitherto unheard here—Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (Play) and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Leo Ornstein, Wizard of Piano, Occupies Solo Place on Program.

Leo Ornstein, with the MacDowell piano concerto in D minor, held the solo place in the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The usual capacity audience greeted the orchestra, and the young wizard Ornstein reiceived many recalls for his virtuoso performance of the brilliant concerto.

The orchestra ranged from Mendelssohn to a typical Russian sketch of Glazounoff, rich in orchestral texture, deep with the plaintive melody of national Russia, yet full of that mad abandon of the race.

It was given with most spirited impulse, holding deep tremulous feeling in the Russian "Song of the Volga Boatmen," then going into a tender pastorale in which the winds carried themes with rare perfection until in fine sound of the cymbals it fades into a vibrant silence—the nature painting of Russia. Its climax was splendidly wrought.

Whirlwind In Technique.

Ornstein, a slip of a lad, is a whirlwind in technique and tempos. His runs and trills amaze by their smoothness and fleetness, and he has poise in theme painting that is yet full of his pianistic facility. His tone is more exquisitely fine than broad and big; thus at times he is overshadowed by orchestra.

That insistent thing that captivates, his rhythm that is buoyant and sweeping, brings his playing to a virtuoso place that is bewildering. And in all his execution there is music—music, with the charm of caprice in biting figures or phrases of exquisite delicacy.

He gave the concerto with beauty, breadth and dynamic values that brought him spontaneous appreciation, while the orchestra held the atmosphere in bright color and at times in ominous shadows of tone that supplemented the artist.

"Reformation" Is Heavy.

The Mendelssohn Symphony, the "Reformation," was somewhat heavy in its big brass introduction. It carries the churchly sedateness of a Luther hymn, that hel da deep choral, but was most insistent in its precision.

Grace, however, characterized the bright allegro vivace, and the melody of the violins in the finale was given with a lovely simplicity.

The Liszt music for Lenau's "Faust" was the second orchestral offering. Not Nch in musical content, it is yet descriptive of the rugged village dancing, but M. Monteux gave it little rhythmic lure in the "Mephisto Waltz." But Faust is immortalized by Gounod, and the comparisor makes it suffer.

J. MacB.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Jan. 16
Transcript.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

A New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concerts despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stowjowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1900, there or thereabouts; it has been played—once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue of its own. None the less with all deference to the diligent and aspiring Stojowski, symphonies of this sort were written by the sheaf in Europe at the end of the nineties, at the beginning of this precious century. They court tonal energy and tonal volume. Wherever the composer may he employs a full modern orchestra and, as it seems, likes to see and to hear it at energetic work. Strenuous are his rhythms; vigorous, his progressions; firm-lined his modulations. Thick flow his harmonies; ample-voiced are his instruments. Full tilt, as with palette-knife or thumb, the composer, be it Mr. Stojowski or another of the species, lays on his colors. With tireless, nervous energy, he weaves a full-fibred web of music, keeps it in as unflagging and nervous motion; sets in sharp contrast, deploys his instrumental voices, like Mr. Stojowski with the hollow tones of the bass-clarinet, as freshly and individually as he may. In particular, upon the Scherzo, he bestows whatever fancies may be stirring in his spirit, whatever dexterities may tip his fingers. Light-paced, light-rhythmed shall it be, teeming with apt and tricky suspensions and syncopations, bright with jets of harmonic and instrumental color, piquant with swift, apt turns of modulation. Such a scherzo Mr. Stojowski has written with appreciable fancy, with supple resource.

So runs the nervous energy of these secondary "symphonists" of the late nineties and the earliest years of the new century; for that energy, even when it did no more than "thrash about," was oftenest their mutual trait. The mold into which they cast and confined these energies was usually the orthodox symphonic form, slightly liberalized by the unexpected appearance of past or future motivs in succeeding or presaging divisions of the music. The moods that each movement reflected were the conventional states of music-making mind and expression—the slow and deep-voiced preluding; the abrupt and turbulent Allegro; the Adagio or Andante like to the introductory measures; the glinting and gleeful Scherzo; the emphatic, broad-measured, largely mounting Finale. As lacking in individuality, as routine as the form were the motivs whence the music sprang. Upon his manipulation and coloring the composer depended much; upon his big voice, thick textures and far-flung energies he depended yet more. Exactly such a symphony of twenty years agone is Mr. Stojowski's. Like his concerto for piano through which Mr. Paderewski and Dr. Muck once swept at Symphony Hall, it is neither better nor worse than the average of its kind. Only, to ears of January, 1920, it is distinctly written in the fashion before the last. Another sort of workmanship—finesse instead of energy, transparency rather than thickness, flights of fancy more than sweeps of power—are now the mode.

Not too advisedly, if Mr. Monteux were considering the composer "as guest," did he follow Mr. Stojowski's symphony with Gluck's overture to his opera of Agamemnon's daughter, offered in sacrifice by the Greeks held on their voyage to Troy by a pitiless Artemis who for the maid and for the warriors at last relented. Gluck uses the relatively small orchestra of 1774; Gluck is content with transparent harmonies, limpid progress, few and thin instrumental colorings, what seems to us a formal workmanship, bitterly as the Parisians of that distant day debated the composer's departures from orthodoxy. Yet there is the music, after nearly a century and a half, is the gentle and submissive Iphigenia, the imperious chiefs, perhaps the haughty goddess; while there surely are the pity and the pang of the old legend, with the glamors of Gluck's music, and many a tender embroidery—his own or the librettist's—to soften it. Better would Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which lacks neither diabolic energy nor vigor or voice and illusion, have companioned Mr. Stojowski's symphony. By this time Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra near to perfection in this tonal deviltment. Would that Mr. Nijinsky had visualized it, as he proposed, on the stage! The eye, no less than the ear, it quickens.

And Mr. Bedetti chose Schumann's concerto, least seldom played of all the canonized concertos for violoncello—perhaps for that very reason chose it. Rich upon the ear, warm with fancy, lustrous or deep of voice flows the song of the Andante—the richer, the warmer, the more glowing for the tone in which the 'cellist released and enhanced it, for the intelligence, the sensibility, the artistry with which at every turn he measured and guided it. Call so much of the concerto Canzone for violoncello and orchestra as it deserves to endure and to be played by a musician of Mr. Bedetti's mettle. But the rest—the "passage-work" of the beginning, the cadenza, the figuration, the trippings hither and yon of the finale—a near to the dryest bones of composer jugglery and virtuoso's skill. It is of record that the dutiful Clara, Schumann's wife, admired them. Has anybody done so since? Yet perhaps Mr. Bedetti shared this admiration. Anyhow, flawlessly he played them.

H. T. P.

The merits of Mr. Laurent as first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra are beginning to penetrate the ears of the reviewers in New York. The other day The Sun "rejoiced to hear the golden voice of Mr. Laurent's flute" in sundry measures of Brahms's symphony in C minor.

Trans. Jan 17
Tribune. Jan. 17

Novel Programme

TWO long and exacting pieces, as upon conductor, orchestra and audiences, divide Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. The first is the long-anticipated second symphony of d'Indy, too seldom played in Boston and unheard here since the days of Mr. Fiedler in Symphony Hall. By common consent, the piece is not only the composer's most austere and exalted music, but the symphony as yet above all other French symphonic of immediate time. It is a work of the intellect and the spirit as well as of small skill and of a highly individual temperament. As d'Indy plies all his resources, so also he demands much of his hearers. The other number of the programme is Brahms's concerto for violin and orchestra, again music of abstract content and austere voice, asking not a little of all concerned with it. In it, Mr. Kreisler, auspiciously returned to the Symphony Concerts, will play the violin part—for the first time in years in Boston.

ESTABLISHED 1881
Christian Science Monitor
Boston, Mass.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Pierre Monteux, conductor, delighted a large audience at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at its third concert of the present season. Especially pleasing was the Mendelssohn "Symphony, No. 5, in D Minor," the famous "Reformation Symphony." The first and third movements of the symphony were sympathetically rendered, but the orchestra was at its best in the second movement, allegro vivace, with its dainty melody and captivating rhythm.

Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust," the truly devilish "Mephisto Waltz," as it is known, pleased or shocked auditors according to their individual preferences, but there was no gainsaying the fact the majority of the audience yesterday did not know exactly what to make of the number. According to tradition, this attitude has always been that of audiences, except where the number has been branded "unutterably ugly" and let go at that. The main theme of the waltz is unusual and not unpleasing. The orchestra finished its part on the program with Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," given with discrimination.

Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein was the soloist of the afternoon. He quite captivated the audience with his playing of MacDowell's "Concerto in D Minor, No. 2," for pianoforte and orchestra. Although the accompaniment was a bit loud in several portions of the concerto, Mr. Ornstein triumphantly overcame this slight handicap and demonstrated an exceptional technique. He was forced to bow acknowledgment time and time again.

ESTABLISHED 1881
EVENING SUN,

It is delightful news that Leo Ornstein is to play the second MacDowell piano concerto at the Lyric this evening with the Boston Orchestra. He is an extraordinarily interesting artist, one who, in many ways, possesses the greatest imaginative distinction. He will at least, this evening, have an opportunity to play in Baltimore before a dignified audience that will take his performance seriously. The bad manners of the auditors at his recital a season or so ago is one of the unforgettable and unforgivable things in Baltimore's musical history.

Newcomer Who Has Proved His Worth

Jan Bedetti (Photograph by Horner)
First Violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
JAN 7 1920

Boston Symphony Rises To Heights of Olden Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave its third concert of this season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein, pianist, was substituted as soloist.

The program, as changed, was a peculiar mixture, and poorly arranged. Beginning with the Mendelssohn Symphony, in D minor, "Reformation," which typifies the triumph of right over wrong, followed by the Liszt Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto Waltz), which has been termed by many as the typification of hell, then on to the McDowell Concerto and after these tacking on to what was a finished program the great tone poem of Glazounoff. It would have seemed more fitting to have begun with the Liszt number, then on through the Mendelssohn, closing with the Concerto, leaving the Glazounoff number for some future time.

It seemed hard to believe that this was the same orchestra which accompanied Mr. Rachmininoff and struggled through the program of the first of the season's series. Mr. Monteux has accomplished what seemed the impossible, having brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to the perfection of other days. It is a little saddening to think that Maj. Higginson is no longer here to enjoy with us the orchestra's return to its own.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Reformation" symphony brought out the similarity of the "Good Friday" motif of "Parsifal" in the first movement, the accompaniment giving the feelings of the war of evil forces against the right. The second movement, handled in a manner which conveyed the thought of numerous forces, each working without a particular purpose, led up to the third movement, built on Luther's hymn "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The whole symphony carried a wonderful sermon.

The Liszt selection was played no less brilliantly and with no less meaning, but, coming as it did, after the lesson which had been conveyed by the Symphony, struck a jarring note.

Mr. Ornstein was in the unenviable position of a substitute, but played the McDowell Concerto with a cleanness of technique, precision of expression and fire of realism.

The Glazounoff Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," which followed really seemed to belong to another concert, although it was beautifully played and its interpretation left nothing to be desired.

A. W. H.

m EVENING SUN
dress New York City
e

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the programme Debussy's danced poem "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Sun
Baltimore, Md.

Gogorza To Be Soloist.

THE fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the third Boston symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 7, is one of the most admired barytones on the concert stage may be in part attributed to his Spanish descent, which lends a peculiar charm to his interpretations, and in part to his American birth and affiliations, which bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity lies in the quality of his tones.

At this concert he will be heard to advantage in the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will provide a rich treasure for the purely symphonic portion of this concert in the eloquent symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, considered with Cesar Franck's as the highest and noblest achievement of the French school. Because the composer met an early death by an accident in the prime of his career his masterpiece is the more cherished. The remainder of the concert will be occupied by two works hitherto unheard here—Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (Play) and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Leo Ornstein, Wizard of Piano, Occupies Solo Place on Program.

Leo Ornstein, with the MacDowell piano concerto in D minor, held the solo place in the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The usual capacity audience greeted the orchestra, and the young wizard Ornstein received many recalls for his virtuoso performance of the brilliant concerto.

The orchestra ranged from Mendelssohn to a typical Russian sketch of Glazounoff, rich in orchestral texture, deep with the plaintive melody of national Russia, yet full of that mad abandon of the race.

It was given with most spirited impulse, holding deep tremulous feeling in the Russian "Song of the Volga Boatmen," then going into a tender pastorale in which the winds carried themes with rare perfection until to the fine sound of the cymbals it fades into a vibrant silence the nature painting of Russia. Its climax was splendidly wrought.

Whirlwind In Technique.

Ornstein, a slip of a lad, is a whirlwind in technique and tempos. His runs and trills amaze by their smoothness and fleetness, and he has poise in theme painting that is yet full of his pianistic facility. His tone is more exquisitely fine than broad and big; thus at times he is overshadowed by orchestra.

That insistent thing that captivates, his rhythm that is buoyant and sweeping, brings his playing to a virtuoso place that is bewildering. And in all his execution there is music—music, with the charm of caprice in biting figures or phrases of exquisite delicacy.

He gave the concerto with beauty, breadth and dynamic values that brought him spontaneous appreciation, while the orchestra held the atmosphere in bright color and at times in ominous shadows of tone that supplemented the artist.

"Reformation" Is Heavy.

The Mendelssohn Symphony, the "Reformation," was somewhat heavy in its big brass introduction. It carries the churchly sedateness of a Luther hymn, that hel da deep choral, but was most insistent in its precision.

Grace, however, characterized the bright allegro vivace, and the melody of the violins in the finale was given with a lovely simplicity.

The Liszt music for Lenau's "Faust" was the second orchestral offering. Not rich in musical content, it is yet descriptive of the rugged village dancing, but M. Monteux gave it little rhythmic lure in the "Mephisto Waltz." But Faust is immortalized by Gounod, and the comparison makes it suffer.

J. MacB.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Jan. 16 Transcript.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

New Symphony in the Fashion Before the Last at Cambridge—Gluck and Liszt as Well, and Mr. Bedetti in Schumann's Concerto for Violoncello—The Pleasures of Bach from Mr. Pattison—Miss Brard in a Recital of Her Own—A Visit from the Philharmonic Society—Programmes in Prospect

LIKE dutiful children in the old story-books, the audience at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge is wont to be grateful for that which it receives in pieces and performance. If Mr. Monteux chooses to set before it music that he has lately played on the other bank of the Charles, it hears it gladly. If, instead, he assembles numbers that he will utilize on the morrow in Symphony Hall, it seems as well pleased. If the "direction" of the concerts despatches to Sanders Theatre an interesting "soloist," say like Miss Janacopulos of last November, it answers eagerly; if on the other hand, it is exposed to less tested and stimulating abilities, it is resignedly polite. From the standpoint of both conductor and manager, an ideal audience to which to minister—and therefore an audience deserving compensations. In measure it received them last evening when but one of the chosen pieces—Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—was of recent performance in Symphony Hall; when another—Gluck's overture to his opera, "Iphigenia in Aulis"—has not yet been heard across the Charles; and when a third—Mr. Stowjowski's symphony in D minor, announced for today in Boston—was played for the first time hereabouts with the pleasantly excited composer—exactly the bearded, loose-clothed, loose-jointed, nervous figure of many a "portrait of an artist"—listening intently and smilingly receiving many plaudits. As though all this were not enough, Mr. Bedetti, the masterful first violoncellist of the orchestra, was "soloist" with it for the first time at home; while his choice of piece fell upon the seldom heard concerto of Schumann. As Symphony Concerts in Cambridge go, decidedly an interesting evening.

Yet in the vernacular of this New England, Mr. Stojowski's symphony seemed "no great shakes." It dates from 1900, there or thereabouts; it has been played—once—in various cities of Europe from Paris unto Warsaw; it is not unknown in New York: the Scherzo, according to the learned compiler of the programme-book, has even enjoyed at Mr. Nikisch's concerts a vogue of its own. None the less with all deference to the diligent and aspiring Stojowski, symphonies of this sort were written by the sheaf in Europe at the end of the nineties, at the beginning of this precious century. They court tonal energy and tonal volume. Wherever the composer may he employs a full modern orchestra and, as it seems, likes to see and to hear it at energetic work. Strenuous are his rhythms; vigorous, his progressions; firm-lined his modulations. Thick flow his harmonies; ample-voiced are his instruments. Full tilt, as with palette-knife or thumb, the composer, be it Mr. Stojowski or another of the species, lays on his colors. With tireless, nervous energy, he weaves a full-fibred web of music, keeps it in an unflagging and nervous motion; sets in sharp contrast, deploys his instrumental voices, like Mr. Stojowski with the hollow tones of the bass-clarinet, as freshly and individually as he may. In particular, upon the Scherzo, he bestows whatever fancies may be stirring in his spirit, whatever dexterities may tip his fingers. Light-paced, light-rhythmed shall it be, teeming with apt and tricky suspensions and syncopations, bright with jets of harmonic and instrumental color, piquant with swift, apt turns of modulation. Such a scherzo Mr. Stojowski has written with appreciable fancy, with supple resource.

So runs the nervous energy of these secondary "symphonists" of the late nineties and the earliest years of the new century; for that energy, even when it did no more than "thrash about," was oftenest their mutual trait. The mold into which they cast and confined these energies was usually the orthodox symphonic form, slightly liberalized by the unexpected appearance of past or future motivs in succeeding or presaging divisions of the music. The moods that each movement reflected were the conventional states of music-making mind and expression—the slow and deep-voiced preluding; the abrupt and turbulent Allegro; the Adagio or Andante like to the introductory measures; the glinting and gleeful Scherzo; the emphatic, broad-measured, largely mounting Finale. As lacking in individuality, as routine as the form were the motivs whence the music sprang. Upon his manipulation and coloring the composer depended much; upon his big voice, thick textures and far-flung energies he depended yet more. Exactly such a symphony of twenty years agone is Mr. Stojowski's. Like his concerto for piano through which Mr. Paderewski and Dr. Muck once swept at Symphony Hall, it is neither better nor worse than the average of its kind. Only, to ears of January, 1920, it is distinctly written in the fashion before the last. Another sort of workmanship—finesse instead of energy, transparency rather than thickness, flights of fancy more than sweeps of power—are now the mode.

Not too advisedly, if Mr. Monteux were considering the composer "as guest," did he follow Mr. Stojowski's symphony with Gluck's overture to his opera of Agamemnon's daughter, offered in sacrifice by the Greeks held on their voyage to Troy by a pitiless Artemis who for the maid and for the warriors at last rolented. Gluck uses the relatively small orchestra of 1774. Gluck is content with transparent harmonies, limpid progress, few and thin instrumental colorings, what seems to us a formal workmanship, bitterly as the Parisians of that distant day debated the composer's departures from orthodoxy. Yet there is the music, after nearly a century and a half, is the gentle and submissive Iphigenia, the imperious chiefs, perhaps the haughty goddess; while there surely are the pity and the pang of the old legend; with the glamors of Gluck's music, and many a tender embroidery—his own or the librettist's—to soften it. Better would Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," which lacks neither diabolic energy nor vision or grace and invention, have companioned Mr. Stojowski's symphony. By this time Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra near to perfection in this tonal deviltment. Would that Mr. Nijinsky had visualized it, as he proposed, on the stage! The eye, no less than the ear, it quickens.

And Mr. Bedetti chose Schumann's concerto, least seldom played of all the canonized concertos for violoncello—perhaps for that very reason chose it. Rich upon the ear, warm with fancy, lustrous or deep of voice flows the song of the Andante—the richer, the warmer, the more glowing for the tone in which the 'cellist released and enhanced it, for the intelligence, the sensibility, the artistry with which at every turn he measured and guided it. Call so much of the concerto a Canzone for violoncello and orchestra as it deserves to endure and to be played by a musician of Mr. Bedetti's mettle. But the rest—the "passage-work" of the beginning, the cadenza, the figuration, the trippings hither and yon of the finale—is near to the dryest bones of composed jugglery and virtuoso's skill. It is of record that the dutiful Clara, Schumann's wife, admired them. Has anybody done so since? Yet perhaps Mr. Bedetti shared this admiration. Anyhow, flawlessly he played them.

H. T. P.

The merits of Mr. Laurent as first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra are beginning to penetrate the ears of the reviewers in New York. The other day The Sun "rejoiced to hear the golden voice of Mr. Laurent's flute" in sundry measures of Brahms's symphony in C minor.

Trans. Jan 1

Tribune. Jan. 17

Novel Programme

TWO long and exacting pieces, a upon conductor, orchestra and a ences, divide Mr. Monteux's gramme for the Symphony Concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday even next. The first is the long-anticipted ond symphony of d'Indy, too seld played in Boston and unheard here si the days of Mr. Fiedler in Symph Hall. By common consent, the piece not only the composer's most austere exalted music, but the symphony as above all other French symphonies of immediate time. It is a work of the tellect and the spirit as well as of small skill and of a highly individual temperament. As d'Indy plies all his sources, so also he demands much of hearers. The other number of the gramme is Brahms's concerto for vi and orchestra, again music of abstr content and austere voice, asking no little of all concerned with it. In it, Mr. Kreisler, auspiciously returned to the Symphony Concerts, will play the violin part—for the first time in years in Boston.

Chamber Music

In London

Newcomer Who Has Proved His Worth

Jan Bedetti (Photograph by Horner)

First Violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, delighted a large audience at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at its third concert of the present season. Especially pleasing was the Mendelsohn "Symphony, No. 5, in D Minor," the famous "Reformation Symphony." The first and third movements of the symphony were sympathetically rendered, but the orchestra was at its best in the second movement, allegro vivace, with its dainty melody and captivating rhythm.

Liszt's second episode from Lenau's "Faust," the truly devilish "Mephisto Waltz," as it is known, pleased or shocked auditors according to their individual preferences, but there was no gainsaying the fact the majority of the audience yesterday did not know exactly what to make of the number. According to tradition, this attitude has always been that of audiences, except where the number has been branded "unutterably ugly" and let go at that. The main theme of the waltz is unusual and not unpleasing. The orchestra finished its part on the program with Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," given with discrimination.

Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein was the soloist of the afternoon. He quite captivated the audience with his playing of MacDowell's "Concerto in D Minor, No. 2," for pianoforte and orchestra. Although the accompaniment was a bit loud in several portions of the concerto, Mr. Ornstein triumphantly overcame this slight handicap and demonstrated an exceptional technique. He was, forced to bow acknowledgment time and time again.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING SUN,

Md.

It is delightful news that Leo Ornstein is to play the second MacDowell piano concerto at the Lyric this evening with the Boston Orchestra. He is an extraordinarily interesting artist, one who, in many ways, possesses the greatest imaginative distinction. He will at least, this evening, have an opportunity to play in Baltimore before a dignified audience that will take his performance seriously. The bad manners of the audiitors at his recital a season or so ago is one of the unforgettable and unforgivable things in Baltimore's musical history.

RALD

ashington, D.C.

JAN 7 - 1920 P

Boston Symphony Rises To Heights of Olden Days

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Pierre Monteux conducting, gave its third concert of this season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, under the management of Mrs. Wilson-Greene. Owing to the illness of Emilo de Gogorza, Leo Ornstein, pianist, was substituted as soloist.

The program, as changed, was a peculiar mixture, and poorly arranged. Beginning with the Mendelssohn Symphony, in D minor, "Reformation," which typifies the triumph of right over wrong, followed by the Liszt Second Episode from Lenau's "Faust" (Mephisto Waltz), which has been termed by many as the typification of hell, then on to the McDowell Concerto and after these tacking on to what was a finished program the great tone poem of Glazounoff. It would have seemed more fitting to have begun with the Liszt number, then on through the Mendelssohn, closing with the Concerto, leaving the Glazounoff number for some future time.

It seemed hard to believe that this was the same orchestra which accompanied Mr. Rachmininoff and struggled through the program of the first of the season's series. Mr. Monteux has accomplished what seemed the impossible, having brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to the perfection of other days. It is a little saddening to think that Maj. Higginson is no longer here to enjoy with us the orchestra's return to its own.

Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Reformation" symphony brought out the similarity of the "Good Friday" motif of "Parsifal" in the first movement, the accompaniment giving the feelings of the war of evil forces against the right. The second movement, handled in a manner which conveyed the thought of numerous forces, each working without a particular purpose, led up to the third movement, built on Luther's hymn "A Mighty Fortress Is Our God." The whole symphony carried a wonderful sermon.

The Liszt selection was played no less brilliantly and with no less meaning, but, coming as it did, after the lesson which had been conveyed by the Symphony, struck a jarring note.

Mr. Ornstein was in the unenviable position of a substitute, but played the McDowell Concerto with a cleanness of technique, precision of expression and fire of realism.

The Glazounoff Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razine," which followed really seemed to belong to another concert, although it was beautifully played and its interpretation left nothing to be desired.

A. W. H.

B:

m EVENING SUN

dress New York City

e

At the season's third Boston Symphony concert, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 8, Pierre Monteux will conduct the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral," No. 6, and the rest of the programme Debussy's danced poem "Jeux" ("Play"), which Mr. Monteux is introducing to America, and Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine."

Sun

Baltimore, Md. JAN 8 1919

Gogorza To Be Soloist.

THE fact that Emilio de Gogorza, who is to be the soloist at the third Boston symphony concert of the season in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 7, is one of the most admired barytones on the concert stage may be in part attributed to his Spanish descent, which lends a peculiar charm to his interpretations, and in part to his American birth and affiliations, which bring him in closer touch with his audiences. But the prime reason for his popularity lies in the quality of his tones.

At this concert he will be heard to advantage in the opening aria from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," and the principal love song from Massenet's "King of Lahore." Pierre Monteux will provide a rich treasure for the purely symphonic portion of this concert in the eloquent symphony in B flat by Ernest Chausson, considered with Cesar Franck's as the highest and noblest achievement of the French school. Because the composer met an early death by an accident in the prime of his career his masterpiece is the more cherished. The remainder of the concert will be occupied by two works hitherto unheard here—Debussy's dance poem, "Jeux" (Play) and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine."

JAN 8 1920

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Leo Ornstein, Wizard of Piano, Occupies Solo Place on Program.

Leo Ornstein, with the MacDowell piano concerto in D minor, held the solo place in the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The usual capacity audience greeted the orchestra, and the young wizard Ornstein reiceived many recalls for his virtuoso performance of the brilliant concerto.

The orchestra ranged from Mendelssohn to a typical Russian sketch of Glazounoff, rich in orchestral texture, deep with the plaintive melody of national Russia, yet full of that mad abandon of the race.

It was given with most spirited impulse, holding deep tremulous feeling in the Russian "Song of the Volga Boatmen," then going into a tender pastorale in which the winds carried themes with rare perfection until in fine sound of the cymbals it fades into a vibrant silence—the nature painting of Russia. Its climax was splendidly wrought.

Whirlwind In Technique.

Ornstein, a slip of a lad, is a whirlwind in technique and tempos. His runs and trills amaze by their smoothness and fleetness, and he has poise in theme painting that is yet full of his pianistic facility. His tone is more exquisitely fine than broad and big; thus at times he is overshadowed by orchestra.

That insistent thing that captivates, his rhythm that is buoyant and sweeping, brings his playing to a virtuoso place that is bewildering. And in all his execution there is music—music, with the charm of caprice in biting figures or phrases of exquisite delicacy.

He gave the concerto with beauty, breadth and dynamic values that brought him spontaneous appreciation, while the orchestra held the atmosphere in bright color and at times in ominous shadows of tone that supplemented the artist.

"Reformation" Is Heavy.

The Mendelssohn Symphony, the "Reformation," was somewhat heavy in its big brass introduction. It carries the churchly sedateness of a Luther hymn, that hel da deep choral, but was most insistent in its precision.

Grace, however, characterized the bright allegro vivace, and the melody of the violins in the finale was given with a lovely simplicity.

The Liszt music for Lenau's "Faust" was the second orchestral offering. Not rich in musical content, it is yet descriptive of the rugged village dancing, but M. Monteux gave it little rhythmic lure in the "Mephisto Waltz." But Faust is immortalized by Gounod, and the comparison makes it suffer.

J. MacB.

Monitor Jan 17

STOJOWSKI SYMPHONY PLAYED IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on January 16, with a program made up as follows:

Stojowski—Symphony in D minor op. 21.

Songs by Brahms, Schumann, and Schubert.

Wagner—Excerpts from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist.

Stojowski's symphony was performed for the first time in Boston. Its first performance in its final version was in 1901. Yet it cannot be considered a youthful work. The fire, the dash and audacity of youth are strangely absent. The composer, educated for the most part at the Paris Conservatoire, seems to have assimilated few of the characteristics of the French school. A pupil of Delibes, who was a master of orchestration, he seems to have caught little of the delicacy of style and coloring of his teacher. It is remarkable that surrounded during the formative years by French influences he should have been so little moved by them, and no more does this symphony betray his nationality. In short, despite its seriousness of purpose, its careful working out, its learning, it is often dull. The scherzo and certain pages of the andante alone have charm.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with rare feeling and emotional power. Known chiefly as an operatic singer, it was an unexpected pleasure to find her so expert as an interpreter of "Lieder." The songs were given with great effect, yet she never resorted to the methods and tricks of the operatic stage. Such a dignified, restrained style is appropriate to a symphony concert and those who often justly argue that the presence of a soloist is a disturbing element at these concerts must have felt that their arguments have little force where such singing is concerned. The funeral music and the final scene from "The Dusk of the Gods" have been heard to better advantage. A certain thinness in the brass, a general uncertainty of attack were to be noticed, yet the performance of the symphony was brilliant, particularly the scherzo, which was beautifully colored and rhythmical.

WAGNER MUSIC CHARMS AT SYMPHONY

Jan 17

American

Mme. Matzenauer an Inspiring Soloist; Stojowski Piece Skillfully Interpreted

By FRED J. McISAAC.

"A good time was enjoyed by all," is the way a village journal might describe yesterday's Symphony concert. There was a symphony by Sigismonde Stojowski, a Pole living in New York, which was quite the most interesting symphonic novelty of the season. There was Margaret Matzenauer, a gorgeous looking person in a purple gown with a voice which compares favorably with the great Wagnerian singers of the past, and there was some wonderfully inspiring Wagner music.

That Stojowski symphony has a scherzo which for brilliancy and originality leaves you almost breathless and a finale which is noble, fine and satisfying. The first two movements are not so meritorious.

They are singing German songs again but in English. Before the war they told us they could not be competently translated. Goodness how many hours I have sat listening to the horrible German language, the worst tongue in which anybody ever tried to sing, and wondering how English could harm melodies which survived such a language.

Well they translate them all right. Matzenauer's translations of Brahms Schumann and Schubert were made by Krehbiel and they are musical and poetic. Unfortunately Matzenauer's diction leaves lots to be desired. However she owns a most marvelous voice and her declamation of the fire music from "Dusk of the Gods" was memorable.

Monteux conducted the Wagner music in a remarkable manner. I don't remember a grander climax than he achieved at the end of the immolation music.

GORDONS GIV...

Post

DAY, JANUARY 17,

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mme. Matzenauer Is Eloquent in Wagner Numbers

BY OLIN DOWNES

There is but one Richard Wagner. Exigencies of the war, the atrocious conduct of a Prussian government, necessarily made silent for a while, in concert halls, the great voice which was always raised, during Wagner's life-time, against Prussianism. But yesterday afternoon Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, put on his programme the music of Siegfried's death and the scene of Brunhilde's Immolation from Wagner's "The Twilight of the Gods," and the effect was little short of sublime.

It would not have been what it was lacking the presence of Margaret Matzenauer, a superb woman, a supremely dramatic singer, to deliver the lines of Brunhilde's sacrifice and atonement. In truth, it has been many years since this music has been sung in so grand a spirit, by an artist with a voice of such phenomenal capacities, a voice nobly equal to the task Wagner has set his soprano in this famous scene. The rehearing of this music, the inspired manner in which it was sung, made one of the most memorable moments of many seasons of Boston Symphony concerts.

IS A GREAT ARTIST

Mme. Matzenauer has long been known as the possessor of a voice of astonishing range, which has made it possible for her to sing both contralto and soprano roles in opera. In addition to its range—and the circumstance is indeed rare good fortune—the voice has the most uncommon resources of color and sonority throughout its registers. And finally Mme. Matzenauer has developed remarkably as a mistress of song and as an emotional interpreter until today she stands as one of the greatest operatic artists of this generation.

She is essentially of the operatic stage. Standards of concert deportment as established in cold roast Boston do not particularly commend her spontaneous gestures, though these gestures are always interpretive of the music and in the picture. Even when she sang songs of Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, she was an artist of the stage, albeit one who had carefully studied the art of song, the power of restraint and the finest shades of vocal interpretation. There are singers who bawl out the confidences of Schumann's bride-to-be as if they were soap-box orators on the Common.

Schumann's Bride's Songs

Mme. Matzenauer gave the two "Bride's Songs" the simplicity, the tenderness, the intimate appeal so characteristic of a certain side of the genius of Schumann, as well as of the subject. She gave voice to the bitter melancholy of Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber" with a discretion and poignant simplicity which made the end of the song especially unforgettable.

We personally liked least her singing of Schubert's "Erl-King." Not that it lacked intelligence, or failed to follow approved standards of interpretation. That was just the trouble, we get tired to death of hearing these imitations of the little boy's voice and the father's voice and the voice of the Erl-King. We would like to see more suggestion and less realism in the interpretation of this romantic song. We would like to have something left to the imagination of the hearer.

Looked the Part

It was in the music from "Die Gotterdamerung" that Mme. Matzenauer reached her full height and gave an overwhelming performance. It is not entirely irrelevant in this place to remark that since her last Boston appearances some seasons ago she has eaten and grown thin, or something of the sort, and has emerged from the process a very impressive and eloquent figure on the stage—in physique, the type of artist which Wagner would have acclaimed for his heroine. She stood the part, she looked it as she sang it, and she put the grandeur and the noble pathos of the music into her tones.

That glorious voice surged through or over the most tumultuous effects of the orchestra which was hymning the downfall of old gods, the rebirth of the world, the all-consuming triumph of love. Mighty music! Mr. Monteux conducted with all enthusiasm and sympathy, and he had a wondrous voice, and a woman who could sing, to crown his efforts.

Composer Brought Out

In retrospect of this concert, one recalls the first performance in Boston of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor, an ambitious work which won the Paderewski prize in a contest presided over by Arthur Nikisch. This symphony was also applauded to the echo, and the composer was brought out on the platform by Mr. Monteux.

It will seem crabbed and opinionated, in the face of the tremendous enthusiasm shown yesterday, for a mere humble reviewer to state that in his own honest and deliberate opinion the Stojowski symphony is one of the most conventional and unimportant works he has heard for some time. But that is the case, and the work of a reviewer of music calls for such frankness of statement.

Little Individuality

We think this symphony of little value, because in the first place the themes themselves have little force of individuality. The first theme of the first movement, it is true, has a certain rhythmic force which is helpful in its development. But it is mock vigor. The thing does not ring very true. The second theme is sugary and banal. There are yards and yards of development of the kind that hardworking German composers have turned out by the ton for 50 years.

The orchestration is full and sonorous, but it has little variety of color: it is orchestration in chunks. One chunk of instruments is used here, another there. Nearly everything is kept going most of the time. It sounds perfectly well. That is, it sounds sonorously, brilliantly, euphoniously as you will. But that is not necessarily enough to make original orchestration or original music. An orchestra is such a marvelous thing anyway that the composer with a few stock tricks up his sleeve can make it sound positively magical to the ears. It requires more than all that to make a great symphony.

Second Movement Best

The second movement of this symphony seems to us the best, because we think that Mr. Stojowski has a melodic vein which is not very virile, but is sweetly if somewhat innocuously melodious, and he has here written a kind of a song without words which is scarcely of symphonic calibre as regards the nature of the musical thought, while on the other hand it is pretty and pleasing. The scherzo is pretty, too. The finale is filled to the brim with outworn symphonic formulas.

As a glib talker often makes on first acquaintance an excellent impression which does not last, so we think that this symphony, applauded yesterday with the most genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm, representing a personal triumph which must have been—and may it continue to be—gratifying in the highest degree to the composer—will not hold a distinguished place in the symphonic repertory.

Globe Jan 17

MATZENAUER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

She Scores a Success in Program of Masterpieces

Wagner and Stojowski Pieces Complete the Program

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, her first appearance here with the orchestra. Her numbers were the same she has already sung with orchestras in New York and Philadelphia during the current season; four familiar German songs, with English words by H. E. Krehbiel, and orchestrated accompaniments by Leopold Stokowski; and the final scene from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods." She is to be thanked for choosing these masterpieces instead of second rate novelties.

Her "Brunnhilde" must be of admirable dramatic intensity and vocal opulence, to judge by her singing in the "Immolation" scene. The power of Wagner's music is so great that his operas are "fool proof," provided the singers have voice enough to make themselves heard above the orchestral climaxes. But Mme Matzenauer brought out the often ignored intrinsic force and beauty of the voice part and aided Mr Monteux in making the performance of this excerpt a memorable one.

With the lyrics by Brahms and Schumann she was less successful. She stressed the dramatic significance of the words and so missed much of the serene beauty of the music. Her singing of Schubert's "Erl-king" was appropriately vivid.

Mr Monteux missed, at times, repose in the Siegfried funeral music. He made the rhythm jerky and the entrances of the several motives ejaculatory. Dr Muck, who was exceptionally successful with this music, used to make the rhythm steady and almost ponderous in its inevitability and the motives solemn and massive.

Only so can this excerpt seem unified and complete in itself in the concert hall. Mr Monteux failed to convey the impression of inexhaustible reserve force behind the music which one always got from Dr Muck's interpretation of it.

The remaining item was the Symphony in D minor, op 21, by Sigismund Stojowski, the Polish composer and pianist, now resident in New York, played for the first time in Boston, though it is more than 20 years old. The pretty scherzo gave the audience especial pleasure and the composer was led out by Mr Monteux to acknowledge the applause at the end.

The themes are never banal, partly, one felt, because they are so fragmentary and so sedulously developed. But the work never attains the "grand manner," the power in repose, of the great models which its construction carefully follows. It is a little above the average of what has been dubbed "conductor's music," the work of a talented musician with considerable knowledge, taste and imaginative power, who lacks the indefinable something called genius.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Brahms violin concerto at the concerts next week, and Mr Monteux will give his promised revival of D'Indy's Second Symphony.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17,

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Paderewski Prize Piece by Stojowski Introduced to Boston

KREISLER SOLOIST FOR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Stojowski, symphony in D minor (first time in Boston), songs with orchestra; Brahms, Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber; Schumann bride's songs—Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less; Leave Me in His Arms Endearing; Schubert, Erlking, Wagner; Siegfried's funeral music; Bruennhilde's immolation scene.

Mr. Stojowski's name has long been known in Boston. He and Mr. Hess played his violin sonata 10 years ago; he and Mr. Schroeder played the violoncello sonata. His symphonic rhapsody for piano and orchestra was heard at the Boston Opera House seven years ago, when he was the pianist. A vocal composition of his was performed by the Boston Singing Club in 1906. His piano concerto was played by Mr. Paderewski at a Symphony concert in March, 1916.

But Mr. Stojowski was first known here as a pianist. He played with the Kneisel quartet in 1906, and in the same year gave a piano recital.

The symphony performed yesterday took some 20 years ago a prize in a composition founded by Mr. Paderewski for Polish composers. It is the work of a serious, high minded musician, but, with the exception of the Scherzo, it shows labor rather than inspiration. The opening of the first movement arrests attention and in this movement as in the finale there is some salient thematic material. It is in the development of this material that a paucity of invention is disclosed. The Scherzo is charming throughout, pleasingly fantastical, and deftly orchestrated, in which respect it is in strong contrast to the other movements. The Symphony was finely played; the performance of the difficult Scherzo was remarkably clear, light and graceful. Boston should be proud of its orchestra which has just returned from a trip, having won the enthusiastic praise of critics and audiences. And Boston may well be proud of Mr. Monteux, who has brought this orchestra to its high state of proficiency, whose interpretations of classic and romantic music are most eloquent.

Mme. Matzenauer, who for some time has been lustily proclaiming her undying devotion to the American flag—"the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light"—chose for her first appearance here at a Symphony concert songs by three Germans and one Austrian. Fortunately she sang them in English, translations made for her by Mr. Krehbiel. She sang the songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert with an orchestral accompaniment invented by Mr. Stokowski of Philadelphia. Berlioz years ago orchestrated the accompaniment of the "Erlking," and it is said that he had some skill in writing for an orchestra. Singers have been hitherto contented with his "Erlking." Liszt, also, orchestrated Schubert's accompaniment and he, too, had some talent in this field.

The songs of Brahms and of Schumann, being of a more intimate nature, are more effective in a small hall with the accompaniment of a piano. Mme. Matzenauer, with her beautiful voice, sang them expressively. She chose the ventriloquistic reading of the "Erlking" so that at the end one unavoidably thought of Mr. Fred Stone with his phrase of praise, "Very Good, Eddie."

Mr. Stokowski, after the performance of his symphony, was called upon the stage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B Flat, No. 2, and Brahms's Violin Concerto. Mr. Kreisler will be the violinist.

BUY 250,000 BARRELS

...om Republican
Springfield, Mas...

JAN 13 1920

MUSIC and MUSICIANS

BOSTON SYMPHONY PACKS AUDITORIUM

Hundreds Turned Away, and Twice 4000 Seats Would Have Been in Demand

PIERRE MONTEUX AN ABLE CONDUCTOR

New Director Promptly Wins Favor of Audience — Program Proves Well Adapted to Springfield's Tastes

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 26th concert in Springfield at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux as conductor. It was of course the star attraction of the excellent series of Sunday afternoon entertainments given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, and if the 4000 seats had been twice as many they would all have been in demand. When the doors closed the street was full of disappointed persons who had hoped that at the last there might be a chance to get in. The concert by the orchestra in the same series last year was an audacious venture, but the result was such as to encourage the management in repeating it, in the hope that a concert by the Boston orchestra might become an annual feature. In putting the case to the audience yesterday Kenneth Robbie explained that the concert was costing between $2200 and $2300, and that if everybody gave from 50 cents to $20 all would be well. The collection was taken during the intermission, and before the concert Rev James Gordon Gilkey, pastor of the South church, read from the scriptures and offered prayer. Other exercises were omitted to leave room for the musical program.

This was the first time that the orchestra had played here under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who promptly won the favor of the audience. This distinguished French musician is of a rather different type from any of the notable men who have preceded him during the 39 years of the orchestra's existence and who have differed notably from each other. Physically he is of a type commonest in the south of France and in Italy—compact, robust, swarthy, strong-necked, curly-haired, apple-cheeked, quick, quiet and energetic. He is notably free from mannerism in his conducting while strong and competent, never attracts attention to himself but should go to the music. Nor does he give in the least the effect, to which in some of his eminent predecessors of being bored at having to give a concert outside of Boston and New York. He gave of his best and with all the effect of taking pleasure in it, and the audience responded in the same spirit. That in itself goes far to make a concert a success.

The program, too, was quite what it should be—good in itself, and suited, as not all good programs are, to the orchestra on the avenue which, but once in 15 months on an average visits Springfield. In such an audience there will be many music-lovers who hear much good music, but not nearly so much orchestral music as they would like. Naturally, when they have a chance to hear America's most famous orchestra they want not merely good music but a full display of the resources of a great modern orchestra; what they hear will have to last some of them a long time. Their needs were amply met in the program given yesterday:—

Symphony No 6 ("Pathetic"), B minor, ... Tschaikowsky
"Stenka Razini," symphonic poem, opus 13 ..... Glazounoff
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Mephisto Waltz ..... Liszt

Nothing Tedious in Program

It contained nothing tedious, long-winded, colorless or dull, no outworn modes, no untried novelties; each item, moreover, had orchestral as well as musical interest, and could be listened to with pleasure, bar by bar, for the sheer beauty or the piquant expressions of what the instruments were saying.

The symphony, along with the fifth by the same composer, is one of the very few modern works in this form which have won with the general public a place with the few accepted favorites like Betthoven's fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished." Theodore Thomas, who had his ear as close to the ground as any conductor, used to say that the public readily warmed to Beethoven and Wagner, but that he found no third to put with them till the rise of Tschaikowsky. In listening to the famous symphony which was played yesterday it is not difficult to see why Tschaikowsky's music makes this strong and immediate appeal. Not only is it intensely emotional, but it wholly lacks the reticence of many masterpieces the emotional richness of which is more slowly appreciated. It may rise to a great climax, but it never holds back for a climax—there are weak, ...

...ess, even to the suggestion of atmosphere, this music is well nigh miraculous.

Of all the numbers on the program the Liszt Mephisto waltz perhaps made the slightest impression, and in general Lisszt's music is perhaps not so obvious at a first hearing as that of some composers, though it is well liked by the general public when made familiar as "Les Posludes" has been. But the performance yesterday was so spirited and the numerous solo bits were so exquisitely played that all were charmed, and nobody shared the opinion of Boston's famous critic, J. S. Dwight, who 50 years ago called it "positively devilish." A few delicious notes from the violin of the concert master, Frederick Franklin, suggested the hope that he may yet be heard here in a concerto. The orchestra also has a new principal violoncellist, J. Bedetti, whose brief solo passages indicated talent. ... there have been many changes ... orchestra in recent years, ... the old faces still appear. And it ... playing better than at any time ... things were upset by the ... of the world.

Monitor Jan 17

STOJOWSKI SYMPHONY PLAYED IN BOSTON

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on January 16, with a program made up as follows:

Stojowski—Symphony in D minor op. 21.

Songs by Brahms, Schumann, and Schubert.

Wagner—Excerpts from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist.

Stojowski's symphony was performed for the first time in Boston. Its first performance in its final version was in 1901. Yet it cannot be considered a youthful work. The fire, the dash and audacity of youth are strangely absent. The composer, educated for the most part at the Paris Conservatoire, seems to have assimilated few of the characteristics of the French school. A pupil of Delibes, who was a master of orchestration, he seems to have caught little of the delicacy of style and coloring of his teacher. It is remarkable that surrounded during the formative years by French influences he should have been so little moved by them, and no more does this symphony betray his nationality. In short, despite its seriousness of purpose, its careful working out, its learning, it is often dull. The scherzo and certain pages of the andante alone have charm.

Mme. Matzenauer sang with rare feeling and emotional power. Known chiefly as an operatic singer, it was an unexpected pleasure to find her so expert as an interpreter of "Lieder." The songs were given with great effect, yet she never resorted to the methods and tricks of the operatic stage. Such a dignified, restrained style is appropriate to a symphony concert and those who often justly argue that the presence of a soloist is a disturbing element at these concerts must have felt that their arguments have little force where such singing is concerned. The funeral music and the final scene from "The Dusk of the Gods" have been heard to better advantage. A certain thinness in the brass, a general uncertainty of attack were to be noticed, yet the performance of the symphony was brilliant, particularly the scherzo, which was beautifully colored and rhythmical.

WAGNER MUSIC CHARMS AT SYMPHONY

Jan 17 American

Mme. Matzenauer an Inspiring Soloist; Stojowski Piece Skillfully Interpreted

By FRED J. McISAAC.

"A good time was enjoyed by all," is the way a village journal might describe yesterday's Symphony concert. There was a symphony by Sigismonde Stojowski, a Pole living in New York, which was quite the most interesting symphonic novelty of the season. There was Margaret Matzenauer, a gorgeous looking person in a purple gown with a voice which compares favorably with the great Wagnerian singers of the past, and there was some wonderfully inspiring Wagner music.

That Stojowski symphony has a scherzo which for brilliancy and originality leaves you almost breathless and a finale which is noble, fine and satisfying. The first two movements are not so meritorious.

They are singing German songs again but in English. Before the war they told us they could not be competently translated. Goodness how many hours I have sat listening to the horrible German language, the worst tongue in which anybody ever tried to sing, and wondering how English could harm melodies which survived such a language.

Well they translate them all right. Matzenauer's translations of Brahms Schumann and Schubert were made by Krehbiel and they are musical and poetic. Unfortunately Matzenauer's diction leaves lots to be desired. However she owns a most marvelous voice and her declamation of the fire music from "Dusk of the Gods" was memorable.

Monteux conducted the Wagner music in a remarkable manner. I don't remember a grander climax than he achieved at the end of the immolation music.

GORDON'S [illegible]

Post DAY, JANUARY 17,

MEMORABLE CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Mme. Matzenauer Is Eloquent in Wagner Numbers

BY OLIN DOWNES

There is but one Richard Wagner. Exigencies of the war, the atrocious conduct of a Prussian government, necessarily made silent for a while, in concert halls, the great voice which was always raised, during Wagner's life-time, against Prussianism. But yesterday afternoon Mr. Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, put on his programme the music of Siegfried's death and the scene of Brunhilde's Immolation from Wagner's "The Twilight of the Gods," and the effect was little short of sublime.

It would not have been what it was lacking the presence of Margaret Matzenauer, a superb woman, a supremely dramatic singer, to deliver the lines of Brunhilde's sacrifice and atonement. In truth, it has been many years since this music has been sung in so grand a spirit, by an artist with a voice of such phenomenal capacities, a voice nobly equal to the task Wagner has set his soprano in this famous scene. The rehearing of this music, the inspired manner in which it was sung, made one of the most memorable moments of many seasons of Boston Symphony concerts.

IS A GREAT ARTIST

Mme. Matzenauer has long been known as the possessor of a voice of astonishing range, which has made it possible for her to sing both contralto and soprano roles in opera. In addition to its range—and the circumstance is indeed rare good fortune—the voice has the most uncommon resources of color and sonority throughout its registers. And finally Mme. Matzenauer has developed remarkably as a mistress of song and as an emotional interpreter until today she stands as one of the greatest operatic artists of this generation.

She is essentially of the operatic stage. Standards of concert deportment as established in cold roast Boston do not particularly commend her spontaneous gestures, though these gestures are always interpretive of the music and in the picture. Even when she sang songs of Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, she was an artist of the stage, albeit one who had carefully studied the art of song, the power of restraint and the finest shades of vocal interpretation. There are singers who bawl out the confidences of Schumann's bride-to-be as if they were soap-box orators on the Common.

Schumann's Bride's Songs

Mme. Matzenauer gave the two "Bride's Songs" the simplicity, the tenderness, the intimate appeal so characteristic of a certain side of the genius of Schumann, as well as of the subject. She gave voice to the bitter melancholy of Brahms' "Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber" with a discretion and poignant simplicity which made the end of the song especially unforgettable.

We personally liked least her singing of Schubert's "Erl-King." Not that it lacked intelligence, or failed to follow approved standards of interpretation. That was just the trouble, we get tired to death of hearing these imitations of the little boy's voice and the father's voice and the voice of the Erl-King. We would like to see more suggestion and less realism in the interpretation of this romantic song. We would like to have something left to the imagination of the hearer.

Looked the Part

It was in the music from "Die Gotterdamerung" that Mme. Matzenauer reached her full height and gave an overwhelming performance. It is not entirely irrelevant in this place to remark that since her last Boston appearances some seasons ago she has eaten and grown thin, or something of the sort, and has emerged from the process a very impressive and eloquent figure on the stage—in physique, the type of artist which Wagner would have acclaimed for his heroine. She stood the part, she looked it as she sang it, and she put the grandeur and the noble pathos of the music into her tones.

That glorious voice surged through or over the most tumultuous effects of the orchestra which was hymning the downfall of old gods, the rebirth of the world, the all-consuming triumph of love. Mighty music! Mr. Monteux conducted with all enthusiasm and sympathy, and he had a wondrous voice, and a woman who could sing, to crown his efforts.

Composer Brought Out

In retrospect of this concert, one recalls the first performance in Boston of Sigismund Stojowski's Symphony in D minor, an ambitious work which won the Paderewski prize in a contest presided over by Arthur Nikisch. This symphony was also applauded to the echo, and the composer was brought out on the platform by Mr. Monteux.

It will seem crabbed and opinionated, in the face of the tremendous enthusiasm shown yesterday, for a mere humble reviewer to state that in his own honest and deliberate opinion the Stojowski symphony is one of the most conventional and unimportant works he has heard for some time. But that is the case, and the work of a reviewer of music calls for such frankness of statement.

Little Individuality

We think this symphony of little value, because in the first place the themes themselves have little force or individuality. The first theme of the first movement, it is true, has a certain rhythmic force which is helpful in its development. But it is mock vigor. The thing does not ring very true. The second theme is sugary and banal. There are yards and yards of development of the kind that hardworking German composers have turned out by the ton for 50 years.

The orchestration is full and sonorous, but it has little variety of color: it is orchestration in chunks. One chunk of instruments is used here, another there. Nearly everything is kept going most of the time. It sounds perfectly well. That is, it sounds sonorously, brilliantly, euphoniously as you will. But that is not necessarily enough to make original orchestration or original music. An orchestra is such a marvelous thing anyway that the composer with a few stock tricks up his sleeve can make it sound positively magical to the ears. It requires more than all that to make a great symphony.

Second Movement Best

The second movement of this symphony seems to us the best, because we think that Mr. Stojowski has a melodic vein which is not very virile, but is sweetly if somewhat innocuously melodious, and he has here written a kind of a song without words which is scarcely of symphonic calibre as regards the nature of the musical thought, while on the other hand it is pretty and pleasing. The scherzo is pretty, too. The finale is filled to the brim with outworn symphonic formulas.

As a glib talker often makes on first acquaintance an excellent impression which does not last, so we think that this symphony, applauded yesterday with the most genuine and spontaneous enthusiasm, representing a personal triumph which must have been—and may it continue to be—gratifying in the highest degree to the composer—will not hold a distinguished place in the symphonic repertory.

Globe Jan 17

MATZENAUER SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY

She Scores a Success in Program of Masterpieces

Wagner and Stojowski Pieces Complete the Program

Margaret Matzenauer was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, her first appearance here with the orchestra. Her numbers were the same she has already sung with orchestras in New York and Philadelphia during the current season; four familiar German songs, with English words by H. E. Krehbiel and orchestrated accompaniments by Leopold Stokowski; and the final scene from Wagner's "Dusk of the Gods." She is to be thanked for choosing these masterpieces instead of second rate novelties.

Her "Brunnhilde" must be of admirable dramatic intensity and vocal opulence, to judge by her singing in the "Immolation" scene. The power of Wagner's music is so great that his operas are "fool proof," provided the singers have voice enough to make themselves heard above the orchestral climaxes. But Mme. Matzenauer brought out the often ignored intrinsic force and beauty of the voice part and aided Mr Monteux in making the performance of this excerpt a memorable one.

With the lyrics by Brahms and Schumann she was less successful. She stressed the dramatic significance of the words and so missed much of the serene beauty of the music. Her singing of Schubert's "Erl-king" was appropriately vivid.

Mr Monteux missed at times, repose in the Siegfried funeral music. He made the rhythm jerky and the entrances of the several motives ejaculatory. Dr Muck, who was exceptionally successful with this music, used to make the rhythm steady and almost ponderous in its inevitability and the motives solemn and massive.

Only so can this excerpt seem unified and complete in itself in the concert hall. Mr Monteux failed to convey the impression of inexhaustible reserve force behind the music which one always got from Dr Muck's interpretation of it.

The remaining item was the Symphony in D minor, op 21, by Sigismund Stojowski, the Polish composer and pianist, now resident in New York, played for the first time in Boston, though it is more than 20 years old. The pretty scherzo gave the audience especial pleasure, and the composer was led out by Mr Monteux to acknowledge the applause at the end.

The themes are never banal, partly one felt, because they are so fragmentary and so sedulously developed. But the work never attains the "grand manner," the power in repose, of the great models which its construction carefully follows. It is a little above the average of what has been dubbed "conductor's music," the work of a talented musician with considerable knowledge, taste and imaginative power, who lacks the indefinable something called genius.

Fritz Kreisler will play the Brahms violin concerto at the concerts next week, and Mr Monteux will give his promised revival of D'Indy's Second Symphony.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17,

11TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Paderewski Prize Piece by Stojowski Introduced to Boston

KREISLER SOLOIST FOR NEXT WEEK

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Stojowski, symphony in D minor (first time in Boston), songs with orchestra; Brahms, Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber; Schumann bride's songs—Mother, Can I Love Thee the Less; Leave Me in His Arms Endearing; Schubert, Erlking, Wagner; Siegfried's funeral music; Bruennhilde's immolation scene.

Mr. Stojowski's name has long been known in Boston. He and Mr. Hess played his violin sonata 10 years ago; he and Mr. Schroeder played the violoncello sonata. His symphonic rhapsody for piano and orchestra was heard at the Boston Opera House seven years ago, when he was the pianist. A vocal composition of his was performed by the Boston Singing Club in 1906. His piano concerto was played by Mr. Paderewski at a Symphony concert in March, 1916.

But Mr. Stojowski was first known here as a pianist. He played with the Kneisel quartet in 1906, and in the same year gave a piano recital.

The symphony performed yesterday took some 20 years ago a prize in a composition founded by Mr. Paderewski for Polish composers. It is the work of a serious, high minded musician, but, with the exception of the Scherzo, it shows labor rather than inspiration. The opening of the first movement arrests attention and in this movement as in the finale there is some salient thematic material. It is in the development of this material that a paucity of invention is disclosed. The Scherzo is charming throughout, pleasingly fantastical, and deftly orchestrated, in which respect it is in strong contrast to the other movements. The Symphony was finely played; the performance of the difficult Scherzo was remarkably clear, light and graceful. Boston should be proud of its orchestra which has just returned from a trip, having won the enthusiastic praise of critics and audiences. And Boston may well be proud of Mr. Monteux, who has brought this orchestra to its high state of proficiency, whose interpretations of classic and romantic music are most eloquent.

Mme. Matzenauer, who for some time has been lustily proclaiming her undying devotion to the American flag—"the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light"—chose for her first appearance here at a Symphony concert songs by three Germans and one Austrian. Fortunately she sang them in English, translations made for her by Mr. Krehbiel. She sang the songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert with an orchestral accompaniment invented by Mr. Stokowski of Philadelphia. Berlioz years ago orchestrated the accompaniment of the "Erlking," and it is said that he had some skill in writing for an orchestra. Singers have been hitherto contented with his "Erlking." Liszt, also, orchestrated Schubert's accompaniment and he, too, had some talent in this field.

The songs of Brahms and of Schumann, being of a more intimate nature, are more effective in a small hall with the accompaniment of a piano. Mme. Matzenauer, with her beautiful voice, sang them expressively. She chose the ventriloquistic reading of the "Erlking" so that at the end one unavoidably thought of Mr. Fred Stone with his phrase of praise, "Very Good, Eddie."

Mr. Stokowski, after the performance of his symphony, was called upon the stage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will comprise Vincent d'Indy's Symphony in B Flat, No. 2, and Brahms's Violin Concerto. Mr. Kreisler will be the violinist.

BUY 250,000 BARRELS

[illegible] JAN 15 1920

[illegible] Republican

Springfield, Mass.

MUSIC and MUSICIANS

BOSTON SYMPHONY PACKS AUDITORIUM

Hundreds Turned Away, and Twice 4000 Seats Would Have Been in Demand

PIERRE MONTEUX AN ABLE CONDUCTOR

New Director Promptly Wins Favor of Audience — Program Proves Well Adapted to Springfield's Tastes

The Boston symphony orchestra gave its 26th concert in Springfield at the Auditorium yesterday afternoon with Pierre Monteux as conductor. It was of course the star attraction of the excellent series of Sunday afternoon entertainments given under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian association, and if the 4000 seats had been twice as many they would all have been in demand. When the doors closed the street was full of disappointed persons who had hoped that at the last there might be a chance to get in. The concert by the orchestra in the same series last year was an audacious venture, but the result was such as to encourage the management in repeating it, in the hope that a concert by the Boston orchestra might become an annual feature. In putting the case to the audience yesterday Kenneth Robbie explained that the concert was costing between $2200 and $2300, and that if everybody gave from 50 cents to $20 all would be well. The collection was taken during the intermission, and before the concert Rev James Gordon Gilkey, pastor of the South church, read from the scriptures and offered prayer. Other exercises were omitted to leave room for the musical program.

This was the first time that the orchestra had played here under its new conductor, Pierre Monteux, who promptly won the favor of the audience. This distinguished French musician is of a rather different type from any of the notable men who have preceded him during the 39 years of the orchestra's existence and who have differed notably from each other. Physically he is of a type commonest in the south of France and in Italy—compact, robust, swarthy, strong-necked, curly-haired, apple-cheeked, quick, quiet and energetic. He is notably free from mannerism; his conducting while strong and competent, never attracts attention to himself, but always and only to the music. Nor does he give in the least the effect, to quote from some of his eminent predecessors, of being bored at having to give a concert outside of Boston and New York. He gave of his best and with all the effect of taking pleasure in it, and the audience responded in the same spirit. That in itself goes far to make a concert a success.

The program, too, was quite what it should be—good in itself, and suited, as not all good programs are, to the orchestra on the avenue which, but once in 15 months on the average visits Springfield, there will be. In such an audience [illegible] many music-lovers who hear much good music, but not nearly so much orchestral music as they would like. Naturally, when they have a chance to hear America's most famous orchestra they want not merely good music but a full display of the resources of a great modern orchestra; what they hear will have to last some of them a long time. Their needs were amply met in the program given yesterday:—

Symphony No 6 ("Pathetic"), B minor, Tschaikowsky

"Stenka Razini," symphonic poem, opus 13 ..... Glazounoff

Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy

Mephisto Waltz ..... Liszt

Nothing Tedious in Program

It contained nothing tedious, long-winded, colorless or dull, no outworn modes, no untried novelties; each item, moreover, had orchestral as well as musical interest, and could be listened to with pleasure, bar by bar, for the sheer beauty or the piquant expressions of what the instruments were saying.

The symphony, along with the fifth by the same composer, is one of the very few modern works in this form which have won with the general public a place with the few accepted favorites like Betthoven's fifth and Schubert's "Unfinished." Theodore Thomas, who had his ear as close to the ground as any conductor, used to say that the public readily warmed to Beethoven and Wagner, but that he found no third to put with them till the rise of Tschaikowsky. In listening to the famous symphony which was played yesterday it is not difficult to see why Tschaikowsky's music makes this strong and immediate appeal. Not only is it intensely emotional, but it wholly lacks the reticence of many masterpieces the emotional richness of which is more slowly appreciated. It may rise to a great climax, but it never holds back for a climax—there are weak, [illegible] scrambled spots in most of [illegible]

[illegible]ess, even to the suggestion of atmosphere, this music is well nigh miraculous.

Of all the numbers on the program the Liszt Mephisto waltz perhaps made the slightest impression, and in general Lisszt's music is perhaps not so obvious at a first hearing as that of some composers, though it is well liked by the general public when made familiar as "Les Posludes" has been. But the performance yesterday was so spirited and the numerous solo bits were so exquisitely played that all were charmed, and nobody shared the opinion of Boston's famous critic, J. S. Dwight, who 50 years ago called it "positively devilish." A few delicious notes from the violin of the concert master, Frederick Franklin, suggested the hope that he may yet be heard here in a concerto. The orchestra also has a new principal violoncellist, J. Bedetti, whose brief solo passages indicated talent. While there have been many changes in the orchestra in recent years many of the old faces still appear, and it is playing better than at any time [illegible] things were upset by the [illegible] of the world.

Jan. 17

The Figure That Matches the Song

Margaret Matzenauer (Photograph by Georg)

At Last Received Into the Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

GERMAN SONGS AND FRAGMENTS OF WAGNER

Brahms, Schumann and Schubert to English Texts and in the Beauty of Mme. Matzenauer's Tones—Siegfried's Death-Music Strangely Still and Pale, but Brynhild's Monologue Carried to High Eloquence—Also Mr. Stojowski's Symphony

IT is not necessary to return to Mr. Stojowski's symphony which began the Symphony Concert of yesterday and which was heartily applauded, as all sonorous music is, by the audience of Friday afternoon. A second hearing did not materially alter the impressions received from the first performance at Cambridge on Thursday and already recorded in these columns. Again Mr. Monteux spared no pains with the piece and if it still sounded tiresomely heavy handed and thick voiced he was blameless for such tedium. For most listeners, moreover, the interest of the concert sprang from the second half of the programme divided between four classic German songs sung with orchestra by Mme. Matzenauer and two fragments of Wagner's opera. "The Gloaming of the Gods"—the orchestral interlude that recalls and glorifies the dead Siegfried and Brynhild's long last speech before she mounts her pyre.

For the first time since the end of the late war, classic German songs were sung at a Symphony Concert, though classic German symphonies, overtures and tone-poems have been steadily played at them. For the first time, likewise, since the end of the war excerpts from an opera by Wagner—preludes aside—appeared on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra. For a fortnight these pieces had been announced, but no voice of intolerance had protested with either conductor or manager; while to actual performance the audience returned no signs but those of pleasure. Fewer than usual were the departures that familiarly intersperse the final items of a Symphony Concert; while at the end of Brynhild's monologue, nearly the whole listening company, plainly stirred by the conductor's and the singer's eloquence, lingered to applaud them. If the music of the dead Siegfried was less clapped, there was reason in a strangely colorless and passionless performance.

As for the classic German songs, which were warmly received, there is not a reason why they should not be sung at Symphony Concerts, so long as classic German symphonic pieces stand firm in the active repertory. As little is there reason for the "banning" of the operatic music of a German composer who set his last note to paper nearly forty years ago. His share in what the unforgetting and the unforgiving like to call "German guilt" seems negligible. Reason, however, is one thing and prejudice and petulance are others. Yet of these human infirmities there was not the smallest sign in the demeanor of the audience of yesterday. Rather, it seemed well and wisely content that Mr. Monteux—man and musician of open and liberal mind, if there ever was one, an honor thereby to his race and his profession—had restored the Symphony Concerts to the catholicity that these twenty years has not been the least of their glories. Thanks to him, thanks to the trustees of the orchestra, the hateful bigotries and malevolences of the hour have not penetrated the Symphony Concerts. There a liberal art, as the old phrase was, is still cultivated liberally; there the pleasure of the making and the hearing of music still runs free. As freely, the few who would deny the concerts such liberty and catholicity may quit them.

Of course Mme. Matzenauer sang her songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert and declaimed her monologue out of Wagner in English. She used for that purpose translations made at her instance last summer by Mr. Krehbiel, reviewer in opera house and concert-hall for The New York Tribune, versed in both languages, skilled to mate the accents of new texts to the ordained accents of the music. In these "odd jobs," so to say, he has done no less laudable work than in his translation of the whole "book" of "Parsifal" for the immient reproduction of that opera at the Metropolitan. His English verse pleases the mind, the taste, the ear; it conveys the course, substance and spirit of the German text into a new tongue; it mates all three closely to the music; it is heedful of the serviceable rhetoric of opera house and concert hall; it is at opposite pole from the bathetic and ridiculous "English versions" that sprawl between staves of song or snigger down the columns of an "opera-book."

Now, if these things can be done by one man for a few German texts, they can be done by other men, more or less ably, for many more. Our song-recitals are the poorer for lack of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms and Wolf. The current formula of old airs, "French group," "Russian group," "Anglo-American group" has become as persistent, tedious, barren, as were some of the superfluous German prescriptions and proscriptions of the past. It is high time that classic and contemporary German song in its best estate returned to our concert-halls. It may most advisedly and desirably do so in such translations of texts as Mme. Matzenauer commissioned of Mr. Krehbiel, as other singers, as publishers of music, should make speed to command of him and other hands as fit. It is high time, also, that the music of Wagner should come back to the concert-hall, as it has in "stricken France," and to the opera house, as it has in much-enduring England. Again, for the purposes of song, such translations as Mr. Krehbiel's open the easy path of wisdom. As soon challenge his American loyalties as question his devotion to the arts of music.

Called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, Mme. Matzenauer, far more slender than of old, grave of face, sombre of glance, not without a dark beauty richly set in the coloring of her gown, was a quietly impressive figure. Once and again in Schumann's "bride-songs" from the songbook, "Myrthen," she betrayed the singing-actress in claspings of the hands, in upturnings of the head; but in Brynhild's monologue, though her whole being plainly stirred to the intensities of the music, she held herself within firm control. Using but half-voice in Brahms's song of the introspections and the longings of the dying girl—"Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"—she sang with a strange, dark beauty of tone, in texture like to the pile of some thick, warm, velvet, steadily sustained and moulded to the contours of the music, as steadily pulsing with low rhythmic beat. With Mr. Stokowski's half simple, half subtle instrumentation to aid, with Mr. Monteux alert and adept with it, the gentle loveliness, the tender sentiment of Brahms's song have seldom stood clearer. Akin in measure are Schumann's songs of the longing, eager bride to the tremulous mother, questioning ever so little, doubting—but rather for herself than for her daughter. Yet underneath glows the rhapsodic note. With like beauty of tone, discretion of means, fineness of feeling for music, text and the art of song, Mme. Matzenauer sang them. As life and work through recent years have mellowed her, so she has refined upon herself. As such artist, who designs and measures her own intensity of song, who hears and guides her own beauty and significance of tone, she sang Schubert's "Erl-King." She was no singing-actress mistakenly inflating a ballad into a tragedy upon the stage of a theatre. Rather, she was the narrator, whose voice takes color, whose accents gain emotion from the progress of the tale in tones. Astutely she preserved the musical unity of the song, differentiated the voices that are strands of illusion within it. As truly keyed to Schubert was Mr. Stokowski's orchestral part. Not once did he storm or rant.

So Mme. Matzenauer passed to Brynhild's monologue and to a larger manner of music-drama and the opera house. Stately, almost imperious, yet how rich of tone, how spacious of phrase and period, was her declamation of the Valkyr's commands to the folk. The eye visioned the abstracted figure; the ear heard the voice accustomed to bid its will. To Brynhild looking upon the dead Siegfried, visioning the high gods, reading the runes of destiny, Mme. Matzenauer brought a dusky beauty of tone, a sombre beauty of eloquence that sunk deep into hearing mind and imagination. In these measures, austere and plangent, Wagner wrote no rhetoric of the theatre, Mr. Shaw to the contrary notwithstanding. His voice, like Mme. Matzenauer's, was the voice of tragedy illumined. Rhetoric there is and rhetoric of the theatre in Brynhild's final apostrophe to Siegfried, but through it Mme. Matzenauer swept in tones of dark and mounting fire. Hardly at all did these acquired tones miss fullness or lose intensity of utterance. Not within long memory has singing-actress in or out of the opera house declaimed Brynhild's monologue with such sustained beauty of song, with such depth and heighth of tragic passion. With reason, Mme. Matzenauer's hearers lingered to release in applause their answering emotion.

Little less well fared Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with their part in this final scene from "The Gloaming of the Gods." In their tones glowed the harmonic and the instrumental vesture of the music; in their accents spoke the passion or the rhetoric; out of Wagner's close-twined texture the significant, the imaging, the compelling motivs stood clear; apt throughout was Mr. Monteux's adjustment of the symphonic current to the singing voice. Best of all, there was no moment of musical and emotional descent, no suggestion of anti-climax, when Brynhild's tones are stilled; firmly, largely, the orchestra swept forward and upward to the end.

"Das Ewig-Weibliche
Zieht uns hinan."

The more the wonder, then, that Mr. Monteux, keen-minded, imaginative and practised operatic conductor, with such an orchestra as now answers to his will, should have fallen short of the tonal splendors, the heroic exaltation, the retrospective sweep, the might and majesty of sound that fill the glorification of the dead Siegfried. As it seemed, his pace was too slow; his hand too light, almost timid; his accents too gentle; his colorings too pale; his meagre climaxes without breadth and clangor. Out of such performance barely rose Siegfried, the fated Volsung and Siegfried the hero, smiting with his sword. Only the chords of doom in the death motiv crashed black and harsh. Measure to measure Mr. Monteux knitted the music, yet hardly once did he drive it forward in irresistible voice of mingled woe and glory. The great thrill was become a little thrill; yet not the less are these pages the music of genius.

H. T. PARKER

From
Star
New York City

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT

Boston, Jan. 28—Pierre Monteux, who under arrangement, not a permanent one, has been conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been permanently engaged and will conduct the orchestra through the season of 1922.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

In the Limelight

By George Perry Morris

Local admirers of Pierre Monteaux, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be glad to know that the trustees have negotiated with him for his services through the season of '21-'22. Slowly but surely he has been salvaging and reconstructing an organization that during the controversy over Dr. Muck and the substitution of non-German for German and Austrian musicians had lost much of its morale and artistry. He is proving to have more versatility and depth than had been predicted, and as a person he is likeable. Dr. Muck was as frigid and "touch me not" as an icicle, even in the days of his highest favor and renown. At the last, of course, he became "impossible" in his ill-concealed contempt for "the swine," as he was pleased to call his audiences.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON RETAINS MONTEAUX

Special Telegram to Public Ledger

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteaux, its conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteaux conducted the opening Boston symphony in the autumn of 1918, for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

SOUNDING GRACE

Items and Announcements

For reasons best known to himself, Kreisler will play Beethoven's instead Brahms's Concerto for violin at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. For long, the piece has been worn threadbare by almost annual repetition in Symphony Hall; while twice or thrice within easy memory, the violinist has played it here. No doubt this time he can refine upon a sixteenth-note in the eighty-fifth measure of the first Allegro and so warrant a repetition.

Apropos Bruch, whose music for the violin some would "ban" from the Symphony Concerts, because he spoke much folly during the war, it is worth noting that M. Thibaud is often playing one of his Concertos in recitals of his own. And for two years the violinist was a soldier of France.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Orchestra Retains Monteaux

Boston, Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteaux, its conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteaux conducted the opening Boston symphony in the autumn of 1918, for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Jan 19 Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WAGNER, MONTEUX AND A SECOND AUDIENCE

An Eloquent Conductor and Applausive Hearers—Mr. Werrenrath in a Round of Songs, Abilities and Pleasures — Mr. Kreisler as a Pachmann of the Violin Before a Record Audience—The People's Choral Union Under a New Conductor—Paderewski's Plans

AS the audience of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts received the fragments of Wagner's opera, "The Gloaming of the [illegible]," so also did the more exacting company of Saturday evening, by which double [illegible] added to other signs from the [illegible] composer's music seems now [illegible] established in the active repertory [illegible] orchestra. It has now played [illegible] "Siegfried Idyl" for one of [illegible] pieces, the prelude [illegible] of his overtures and more; and the music for Siegfried, dead, and for Brynhild, about to die, for operatic excerpts. As soon as a programme affords convenient place, Mr. Monteux will undertake also the prelude to "Parsifal," played already in New York and in other cities of regular or occasional visit. To all of these numbers except that which mourns Siegfried, audiences have responded with every sign of pleasure, without a single token of reluctance or dissent, with evidence, indeed, as after Brynhilde's monologue and the symphonic epilogue to "The Ring" of more than usual satisfaction and exhilaration. It is likely to be long before a whole opera of Wagner is heard again in Boston—not until in some distant future the Metropolitan Company returns hither. Meanwhile, the Wagnerian fare of old is outspread at Symphony Hall by catholic minds and liberal judgments, to be, as there was every reason to expect, as heartily and as liberally received.

Mr. Monteux, moreover, is proving himself an interesting and, on occasion, eloquent conductor in Wagner's music. Hearers and reviewers rose in New York to his version of the prelude to "Parsifal"; while here in Boston two audiences were not less stirred by orchestra and conductor in the postlude to Brynhilde's "last dying speech." They swept the music forward in mighty stride, and upswelling sonorities of tone; they deepened power and warmed glow; the music sounded epical; soared high and full. The more the reason, then, to wonder at the comparative tameness of Mr. Monteux, and the band in Siegfried's music. They were fuller and freer-voiced with it on Saturday than on Friday; rose nearer to heroic clang and fervor; but not once did they brush away intruding memories of other performances, as they did in their sweeps of power through the symphonic epilogue aforesaid. Possibly, too slow a pace on Mr. Monteux's part stayed the surge of the music—and therein is food for the students of mental processes in conductors. Time and again a German conductor playing French music, even if he is as sensitive to pace as Dr. Muck or Mr. Weingartner, will take a French piece too slowly. No less often, as intelligent French conductors as Mr. Monteux is, as Mr. Colonne was, will similarly and mistakenly "slow down" a German piece. Why?

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.
JAN 31 1920

PIERRE MONTEUX

Signed for Two Years

Boston, Jan. 24.—The new governing board of nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that an agreement has been reached with Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, to continue his directorship during [illegible] Mr. Monteux has

KREISLER TO PLAY BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Contrary to the original announcement Fritz Kreisler, as soloist at this week's pair of Symphony concerts to be given on Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, instead of Brahms' Concerto. This change has been made in compliance with Mr. Kreisler's wish. Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat will be played at the same concerts, as announced.

Jan. 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

GERMAN SONGS AND FRAGMENTS OF WAGNER

Brahms, Schumann and Schubert to English Texts and in the Beauty of Mme. Matzenauer's Tones—Siegfried's Death-Music Strangely Still and Pale, but Brynhild's Monologue Carried to High Eloquence—Also Mr. Stojowski's Symphony

IT is not necessary to return to Mr. Stojowski's symphony which began the Symphony Concert of yesterday and which was heartily applauded, as all sonorous music is, by the audience of Friday afternoon. A second hearing did not materially alter the impressions received from the first performance at Cambridge on Thursday and already recorded in these columns. Again Mr. Monteux spared no pains with the piece and if it still sounded tiresomely heavy handed and thick voiced he was blameless for such tedium. For most listeners, moreover, the interest of the concert sprang from the second half of the programme divided between four classic German songs sung with orchestra by Mme. Matzenauer and two fragments of Wagner's opera. "The Gloaming of the Gods"—the orchestral interlude that recalls and glorifies the dead Siegfried and Brynhild's long last speech before she mounts her pyre.

For the first time since the end of the late war, classic German songs were sung at a Symphony Concert, though classic German symphonies, overtures and tone-poems have been steadily played at them. For the first time, likewise, since the end of the war excerpts from an opera by Wagner—preludes aside—appeared on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra. For a fortnight these pieces had been announced, but no voice of intolerance had protested with either conductor or manager; while to actual performance the audience returned no signs but those of pleasure. Fewer than usual were the departures that familiarly intersperse the final items of a Symphony Concert; while at the end of Brynhild's monologue, nearly the whole listening company, plainly stirred by the conductor's and the singer's eloquence, lingered to applaud them. If the music of the dead Siegfried was less clapped, there was reason in a strangely colorless and passionless performance.

As for the classic German songs, which were warmly received, there is not a reason why they should not be sung at Symphony Concerts, so long as classic German symphonic pieces stand firm in the active repertory. As little is there reason for the "banning" of the operatic music of a German composer who set his last note to paper nearly forty years ago. His share in what the unforgetting and the unforgiving like to call "German guilt" seems negligible. Reason, however, is one thing and prejudice and petulance are others. Yet of these human infirmities there was not the smallest sign in the demeanor of the audience of yesterday. Rather, it seemed well and wisely content that Mr. Monteux—man and musician of open and liberal mind, if there ever was one, an honor thereby to his race and his profession—had restored the Symphony Concerts to the catholicity that these twenty years has not been the least of their glories. Thanks to him, thanks to the trustees of the orchestra, the hateful bigotries and malevolences of the hour have not penetrated the Symphony Concerts. There a liberal art, as the old phrase was, is still cultivated liberally; there the pleasure of the making and the hearing of music still runs free. As freely, the few who would deny the concerts such liberty and catholicity may quit them.

Of course Mme. Matzenauer sang her songs of Brahms, Schumann and Schubert and declaimed her monologue out of Wagner in English. She used for that purpose translations made at her instance last summer by Mr. Krehbiel, reviewer in opera house and concert-hall for The New York Tribune, versed in both languages, skilled to mate the accents of new texts to the ordained accents of the music. In these "odd jobs," so to say, he has done no less laudable work than in his translation of the whole "book" of "Parsifal" for the immient reproduction of that opera at the Metropolitan. His English verse pleases the mind, the taste, the ear; it conveys the course, substance and spirit of the German text into a new tongue; it mates all three closely to the music; it is heedful of the serviceable rhetoric of opera house and concert hall; it is at opposite pole from the bathetic and ridiculous "English versions" that sprawl between staves of song or snigger down the columns of an "opera-book."

Now, if these things can be done by one man for a few German lyrics, they can be done by other men, more or less ably, for many more. Our song-recitals are the poorer for lack of the songs of Schubert, Schumann, Franz, Brahms and Wolf. The current formula of old airs, "French group," "Russian group," "Anglo-American group" has become as persistent, tedious, barren, as were some of the superfluous German prescriptions and proscriptions of the past. It is high time that classic and contemporary German song in its best estate returned to our concert-halls. It may most advisedly and desirably do so in such translations of texts as Mme. Matzenauer commissioned of Mr. Krehbiel, as other singers, as publishers of music, should make speed to command of him and other hands as fit. It is high time, also, that the music of Wagner should come back to the concert-hall, as it has in "stricken France," and to the opera house, as it has in much-enduring England. Again, for the purposes of song, such translations as Mr. Krehbiel's open texture, the significant, the imaging, the compelling motivs stood clear; apt throughout was Mr. Monteux's adjustment of the symphonic current to the singing voice. Best of all, there was no moment of musical and emotional descent, no suggestion of anti-climax, when Brynhild's tones are stilled; firmly, largely, the orchestra swept forward and upward to the end.

"Das Ewig-Weibliche
Zieht uns hinan."

The more the wonder, then, that Mr. Monteux, keen-minded, imaginative and practised operatic conductor, with such an orchestra as now answers to his will, should have fallen short of the tonal splendors, the heroic exaltation, the retrospective sweep, the might and majesty of sound that fill the glorification of the dead Siegfried. As it seemed, his pace was too slow; his hand too light, almost timid; his accents too gentle; his colorings too pale; his meagre climaxes without breadth and clangor. Out of such performance barely rose Siegfried, the fated Volsung and Siegfried the hero, smiting with his sword. Only the chords of doom in the death motiv crashed black and harsh. Measure to measure Mr. Monteux knitted the music, yet hardly once did he drive it forward in irresistible voice of mingled woe and glory. The great thrill was become a little thrill; yet not the less are these pages the music of genius.

H. T. PARKER

The Figure That Matches the Song

Margaret Matzenauer (Photograph by Georg)

At Last Received Into the Symphony Concerts

the easy path of wiscom. As soon challenge his American loyalties as question his devotion to the arts of music.

Called for the first time to the Symphony Concerts, Mme. Matzenauer, far more slender than of old, grave of face, sombre of glance, not without a dark beauty richly set in the coloring of her gown, was a quietly impressive figure. Once and again in Schumann's "bride-songs" from the songbook, "Myrthen," she betrayed the singing-actress in claspings of the hands, in upturnings of the head; but in Brynhild's monologue, though her whole being plainly stirred to the intensities of the music, she held herself within firm control. Using but half-voice in Brahms's song of the introspections and the longings of the dying girl—"Ever Lighter Grows My Slumber"—she sang with a strange, dark beauty of tone, in texture like to the pile of some thick, warm, velvet, steadily sustained and moulded to the contours of the music, as steadily pulsing with low rhythmic beat. With Mr. Stokowski's half simple, half subtle instrumentation to aid, with Mr. Monteux alert and adept with it, the gentle loveliness, the tender sentiment of Brahms's song have seldom stood clearer. Akin in measure are Schumann's songs of the longing, eager bride to the tremulous mother, questioning ever so little, doubting—but rather for herself than for her daughter. Yet underneath glows the rhapsodic note. With like beauty of tone, discretion of means, fineness of feeling for music, text and the art of song, Mme. Matzenauer sang them. As life and work through recent years have mellowed her, so she has refined upon herself. As such artist, who designs and measures her own intensity of song, who hears and guides her own beauty and significance of tone, she sang Schubert's "Erl-King." She was no singing-actress mistakenly inflating a ballad into a tragedy upon the stage of a theatre. Rather, she was the narrator, whose voice takes color, whose accents gain emotion from the progress of the tale in tones. Astutely she preserved the musical unity of the song, differentiated the voices that are strands of illusion within it. As truly keyed to Schubert was Mr. Stokowski's orchestral part. Not once did he storm or rant.

So Mme. Matzenauer passed to Brynhild's monologue and to a larger manner of music-drama and the opera house. Stately, almost imperious, yet how rich of tone, how spacious of phrase and period was her declamation of the Valkyr's commands to the folk. The eye visioned the abstracted figure; the ear heard the voice accustomed to bid its will. To Brynhild looking upon the dead Siegfried, visioning the high gods, reading the runes of destiny, Mme. Matzenauer brought a dusky beauty of tone, a sombre beauty of eloquence that sunk deep into hearing mind and imagination. In these measures, austere and plangent, Wagner wrote no rhetoric of the theatre, Mr. Shaw to the contrary notwithstanding. His voice, like Mme. Matzenauer's, was the voice of tragedy illumined. Rhetoric there is and rhetoric of the theatre in Brynhild's final apostrophe to Siegfried, but through it Mme. Matzenauer swept in tones of dark and mounting fire. Hardly at all did these acquired tones miss fullness or lose intensity of utterance. Not within long memory has singing-actress in or out of the opera house declaimed Brynhild's monologue with such sustained beauty of song, with such depth and heighth of tragic passion. With reason, Mme. Matzenauer's hearers lingered to release in applause their answering emotion.

Little less well fared Mr. Monteux and the orchestra with their part in this final scene from "The Gloaming of the Gods." In their tones glowed the harmonic and the instrumental vesture of the music; in their accents spoke the passion or the rhetoric; out of Wagner's close-twined

From
Star
New York City

MONTEUX TO CONDUCT

Boston, Jan. 28—Pierre Monteux, who under arrangement, not a permanent one, has been conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been permanently engaged and will conduct the orchestra through the season of 1922.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date

In the Limelight

By George Perry Morris.

Local admirers of Pierre Monteaux, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be glad to know that the trustees have negotiated with him for his services through the season of '21-'22. Slowly but surely he has been salvaging and reconstructing an organization that during the controversy over Dr. Muck and the substitution of non-German for German and Austrian musicians had lost much of its morale and artistry. He is proving to have more versatility and depth than had been predicted, and as a person he is likeable. Dr. Muck was as frigid and "touch me not" as an icicle, even in the days of his highest favor and renown. At the last, of course, he became "impossible" in his ill-concealed contempt for "the swine," as he was pleased to call his audiences.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON RETAINS MONTEAUX

Special Telegram to Public Ledger

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteaux, its conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteaux conducted the opening Boston symphony in the autumn of 1918, for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

SOUNDING GRACE

Items and Announcements

For reasons best known to himself, Mr. Kreisler will play Beethoven's instead of Brahms's Concerto for violin at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. For long, the piece has been worn threadbare by almost annual repetition in Symphony Hall; while twice or thrice within easy memory, the violinist has played it here. No doubt this time he can refine upon a sixteenth-note in the eighty-fifth measure of the first Allegro and so warrant a repetition.

Apropos Bruch, whose music for the violin some would "ban" from the Symphony Concerts, because he spoke much folly during the war, it is worth noting that Mr. Thibaud is often playing one of his Concertos in recitals of his own. And for two years the violinist was a soldier of France.

From
Evening Public Ledger
Philadelphia, Pa.

Orchestra Retains Monteaux

Jan. 24.—The trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteaux, whereby he is to continue in his post during 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Monteaux conducted the opening Symphony in the autumn period in which he obtained release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Jan 19

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WAGNER, MONTEUX AND A SECOND AUDIENCE

An Eloquent Conductor and Applausive Hearers—Mr. Werrenrath in a Round of Songs, Abilities and Pleasures — Mr. Kreisler as a Pachmann of the Violin Before a Record Audience—The People's Choral Union Under a New Conductor—Paderewski's Plans

AS the audience of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts received the fragments of Wagner's opera, "The Gloaming of the Gods," so also did the more exacting company of Saturday evening, by which double token, added to other signs from the east, the composer's music seems now definitely reëstablished in the active repertory of the orchestra. It has now played both the "Siegfried Idyl" for one of the symphonic pieces; the prelude [illegible] from "Tristan," for one of his overtures and more; and the music for Siegfried, dead, and for Brynhild, about to die, for operatic excerpts. As soon as a programme affords convenient place, Mr. Monteux will undertake also the prelude to "Parsifal," played already in New York and in other cities of regular or occasional visit. To all of these numbers except that which mourns Siegfried, audiences have responded with every sign of pleasure, without a single token of reluctance or dissent, with evidence, indeed, as after Brynhilde's monologue and the symphonic epilogue to "The Ring" of more than usual satisfaction and exhilaration. It is likely to be long before a whole opera of Wagner is heard again in Boston—not until in some distant future the Metropolitan Company returns hither. Meanwhile, the Wagnerian fare of old is outspread at Symphony Hall by catholic minds and liberal judgments, to be, as there was every reason to expect, as heartily and as liberally received.

Mr. Monteux, moreover, is proving himself an interesting and, on occasion, eloquent conductor in Wagner's music. Hearers and reviewers rose in New York to his version of the prelude to "Parsifal"; while here in Boston two audiences were not less stirred by orchestra and conductor in the postlude to Brynhilde's "last dying speech." They swept the music forward in mighty stride, and upswelling sonorities of tone; they deepened power and warmed glow; the music sounded epical; soared high and full. The more the reason, then, to wonder at the comparative tameness of Mr. Monteux, and the band in Siegfried's music. They were fuller and freer-voiced with it on Saturday than on Friday; rose nearer to heroic clang and fervor; but not once did they brush away intruding memories of other performances, as they did in their sweeps of power through the symphonic epilogue aforesaid. Possibly, too slow a pace on Mr. Monteux's part stayed the surge of the music—and therein is food for the students of mental processes in conductors. Time and again a German conductor playing French music, even if he is as sensitive to pace as Dr. Muck or Mr. Weingartner, will take a French piece too slowly. No less often, as intelligent French conductors as Mr. Monteux is, as Mr. Colonne was, will similarly and mistakenly "slow down" a German piece. Why?

From
Bill Board
Cincinnati, O.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Signed for Two Years

Boston, Jan. 24.—The new governing board of nine trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that an agreement has been reached with Pierre Monteux, the conductor of the orchestra, to continue his directorship during the [illegible] and 1922 seasons. Mr. Monteux has

KREISLER TO PLAY BEETHOVEN CONCERTO

Contrary to the original announcement Fritz Kreisler, as soloist at this week's pair of Symphony concerts to be given on Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, will play Beethoven's Violin Concerto in D major with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, instead of Brahms' Concerto. This change has been made in compliance with Mr. Kreisler's wish. Vincent d'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat will be played at the same concerts, as announced.

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR THROUGH 1922

For Two Seasons More the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Renew His Appointment — The Flonzaleys in High Feather Through an Interesting Programme—Mr. Casals and Mme. Sundelius at Lengths — Items, Incidents and Prospects

BY arrangement newly concluded between Mr. Monteux and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, he will continue as conductor of the band for at least two seasons more—through the spring of 1922. Since no Toscanini, no Mengelburg, no Nikisch may be summoned to Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux amply deserves such reappointment, the sense of good work appreciated that it brings, the scope and security for the future that it assures. It is well, moreover, for the reorganized orchestra that an established conductor should lead it through three consecutive years. Admittedly Mr. Rabaud was no more than a conscientious locum tenens, coming hither for a season, departing hence when it was done. Through the past four months, however, Mr. Monteux has lead the band and ordered the concerts as though they were to be his for a term, and now his desire and his ambition are justly fulfilled. The more confidently and diligently can he go forward to fuse the orchestra into a sensitive, responsive, wide-ranging and manifold instrument—player to player, men to conductor, and both to the music undertaken. Not a few of the glories of the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time were due to year upon year of intimacy between a permanent conductor and a permanent orchestra. Mr. Monteux, and in measure his forces, will now be such. Already he and they have come to understand each other; of late he has refined upon them with happy outcome. For both, for the standards of the concerts, for the pleasure of the audiences, the future stretches wide and promising.

By many a title, besides, Mr. Monteux deserves his present reward. No conductor of the Symphony Concerts, it is safe to say, has made more interesting and stimulating programmes. None has shown a more liberal, a more catholic mind or has striven more to widen his own and his hearers' acquaintance with symphonic music. Of nothing has he made an overshadowing cult—no not even of his cherished dance-pieces; to nothing has he shown a seated dislike. Better still, while he has not overlooked the classics and, indeed, has often sought among them for neglected pieces, he has shown a clear and grateful tendency to lift his programmes out of the easy rut of "standard numbers" and to give them modern and contemporary voice. "The ancients were the ancients," said wise little Agnes in one of Molière's comedies, "but we are persons of today." By like token, the classics are the classics, but the music for 1920 is the music of our own generations. It is not too much to say that more than any conductor before him, Mr. Monteux has modernized the Symphony Concerts, while at home and abroad audiences have responded gladly. As for quality of performance, there are some who still mistrust him. It is for them to think backward and contrast the heavy-handed Monteux, too strenuous of voice in the concerts of last autumn, with the plastic and luminous Monteux of Debussy's "Jeux," of Balakirev's "Thamar," of the middle movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor on more recent programmes. They should recall also the graphic, the dramatizing Monteux of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," of the final scene of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." The new conductor, the permanent conductor, as he now is, of the Symphony Concerts, does not stand still.

Post Jan 24 5

MONTEUX AS PERMANENT CONDUCTOR

Symphony Trustees Engage Him For Two Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

SUCCESS IN OTHER CITIES

In those cities of New England, the near South and the West which the orchestra has visited a crowded patronage has expressed the same high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 as the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Record Jan 23

PIERRE MONTEUX WILL STAY WITH SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for a brief period. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

MELROSE BENEFITS

Globe Jan 25

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concerts For Young People

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced several weeks ago that it would give on Thursday afternoon of this week a concert for young people. Seats were to be offered first through the public schools and settlement houses in Greater Boston, and later those untaken were to be placed on public sale. The program promised includes Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, and Delibes' suite from "Sylvia." There will be little to distinguish this concert from one of the regular series except the nature of the audience, and the comparative brevity of the program.

The management was immediately besieged with applications for tickets which are sold at the nominal price of 25 and 50 cents. Last Thursday every place had been taken, not only for this week's concert, but also for a second one to be given on Feb 26. No one who secured tickets for the first concert was allowed tickets for the second one, and there was no public sale. The full schedule of the orchestra for the remainder of the current season will prevent it from undertaking more of these young people's concerts this year. This leaves thousands of disappointed applicants and would-be applicants.

The previous history of the Symphony Orchestra has been a little like that of the so-called "Public Schools" in England, which were originally meant for poor scholars in need of schooling and unable to pay for what we would call private tutoring. Just as Eton, Harrow, Rugby and the rest fell in time completely into the hands of the well to do classes, so that no poor boy is able to attend them, our Symphony Concerts have been monopolized by those who can afford to pay from $15 to $72 for a season ticket, or who have the time and patience to wait in line several hours for the 505 second balcony rush seats on Fridays, in order to get in for a quarter. The few seats not sold for the season have usually cost from $1.50 to $2.50 for a single concert, and the audience has been so well dressed that only people with extra good clothes have felt at home in it.

The plain people have not had much chance to hear the concerts, and the boys and girls in our High Schools, who will form the future public for music in Boston, have never gotten in the way of going to them.

The Bolsheviki, autocrats though they are, have at least done better than we here in Boston in providing equal opportunity for every one to hear good music well performed at a nominal price. In Moscow and Petrograd there have been overflowing popular audiences for classical concerts in the past few years, since "the people have ruled."

Fortunately a revolution has not been necessary to bring the beginning of democracy, which means equal opportunity, at Symphony Hall. Those of little faith in the desire for good music among the plain people hereabouts will be hard put to it to explain the instant and overwhelming response to the new opportunity offered by these young people's concerts. The trustees of the orchestra are to be thanked for this innovation, which will probably not tend to reduce the annual deficit. It is to be hoped that another year the season will be lengthened or the concerts in other cities cut down so that not only the young people, but everyone in the city may have a chance to hear the orchestra, and come to realize that it is the "Boston Symphony," and not the "Back Bay Symphony." Maj Higginson meant it to be ours, but never fully realized his first intentions.

Globe Jan 23

MONTEUX TO CONTINUE AS CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he will continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

PIERRE MONTEUX
To Remain as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the Autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following Spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

HARVARD-PRINCETON

Adv Jan 25

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

At the "Young People's Concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia." All tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements. Applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert but for a second, to be given Thursday, February 26.

genius.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

For the "Young People's Con... be given in Symphony Hall nex... day afternoon at 4 o'clock by ... ton Symphony Orchestra, a... Pierre Monteux will conduct Bee... Overture to "Egmont," Schuber... finished" Symphony and Delibes... "Sylvia," all tickets have be... tributed through the schools an... ments of Greater Boston. So gr... been the demand for tickets tha... cations already received will fill... available seats not only for t... concert, but for another, to be g... Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, ... o'clock. The distribution has be... arranged that the second audience... be entirely different from the first. ... further school pupils may not cou... vain on obtaining seats, the hea... the schools have been informed b... ters that further applications cann... filled. On account of the full sch... of regular symphony concerts, no ... than these two Young People's Con... can be undertaken this year.

Herald Jan 2...

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPL...

For the "young people's concert" t... given in Symphony Hall next Th... day afternoon at 4 o'clock by the ... ton Symphony orchestra, at which ... Monteux will conduct Beethoven's ov... ture to "Egmont," Schuberts "Un... ished" symphony and Delibes's ba... "Sylvia," all tickets have been distr... uted through the schools and sett... ments of Greater Boston. So great h... been the demand for tickets that ap... cations already received will fill al... available seats, not only for the ... concert, but for another to be give... Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'c... On account of the full schedule of ... ular Symphony concerts, no more ... these two young people's concerts ... be undertaken this year.

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Specially for The Christian Science Mo...

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The ... agement of the Boston Symphony ... chestra has announced that the pre... conductor, Pierre Monteux, will ... main for two more years after ... present season is ended. This set... rest rumors as to the position wh... have variously named Toscanini, ... Henry Wood, Mengelberg, and Al... Coates as possibilities. Follow... Henri Rabaud, Mr. Monteux had n... rally a difficult place to fill and ... trustees of the orchestra by his ... contract have signified their appr... of his efforts.

MONTEUX TO CONTINUE WITH BOSTON ORCHEST...

Symphony Conductor Will C... tinue in Post During Season ... of 1920-21.

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of ... Boston Symphony Orchestra have c... to an agreement with Pierre Mont... its conductor, whereby he is to cont... in his post during the seasons of ... 1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his leadership the present ... son, now half over, has had a su... almost without precedent. Crowded ... ences in this and all cities where ... orchestra has visited have manif... high enthusiasm, both as regards the ... quality of the performances and the in... terest of the programs.

From Press, Philadelphia, Pa.

RECORD

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 24 1920 E

BOSTON KEEPS MONTEUX

He Will Continue to Conduct Symphony Orchestra Three Years.

Special to "The Record."

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteaux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1881

From EVENING POST, New York City

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From Times New York City

VARIOUS MUSIC EVENTS.

For the season's last visit but one of the Boston Symphony, on Feb. 5 and 7, Mr. Monteux will present d'Indy's Symphony 2 at the evening concert, and at the matinée a new symphony in C minor by Frederick Converse.

Lily Meagher As Soloist With Boston Symphony Orchestra

Lily Meagher who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city on February 29, was born in Dublin, Ireland, and obtained a classical education at the Dominican Academy, Kingston County, Dublin. She began her first vocal studies with Vincent O'Brien, also the distinguished teacher of John McCormick. Throughout Ireland, Lily Meagher, though but "a slip of a girl in her teens," met with tremendous success in her concert work and everywhere enthusiastic audiences greeted her with glowing fervor.

The exquisite voice of Lily Meagher goes straight to the heart of the audior; her bewitching personality is irresistible. Comely and modest, dainty and refined, this new soprano is everywhere greeted by crowded audiences.

Owing to the fact that her home and property were destroyed in the Dublin revolution of 1916, her mother having died a few days previous, she and two sisters came to America. It was at this time John McCormack heard her sing and predicted a brilliant future for the little refugee. Straightway he accepted her as his only pupil, and indeed the true art of "bel canto" was admirably taught. Lily Meagher made her first American appearance with Mr. McCormack in the New York Hippodrome on May 13th, 1917, before an audience of six thousand people. The beautiful limpid clarity of her head tones reached to the last chairs in this huge auditorium. Her singing combined sheer beauty of tone with a keen sense of poetic values. This engagement led to many appearances with the great Irish tenor. Again at Carnegie Hall, Sept. 30th, 1917, she was heard with Mr. McCormack. All the great New York papers commended her, and declared that John McCormack had indeed "discovered" a remarkable voice and admirably trained it to a point well nigh perfection.

Numerous engagements came and Lily Meagher was Mr. McCormack's assisting artist when he toured the country for the Knights of Columbus, and raised $100,000 for them. This afforded her an opportunity to be heard under especially fine auspices, and brought many return engagements. Among her most important appearances with the great tenor were before audiences in Boston, Chicago, Washington, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Baltimore and Worcester. Singing with him at the Baltimore Musical in New York on Dec. 20th, 1918, she was heard and appreciated by a most distinguished audience.

Miss Meagher's debut with the Symphony was made in Lynn and was a brilliant success.

From JAN 24 1920 E
Evening Star
Baltimore, Md.

MONTEUX ENGAGED FOR TWO SEASONS

Trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra Prolong His Conductorship.

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the season of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922," the orchestra announces in a dispatch to The Star, dated January 23.

"Under his inspired leadership," the dispatch continues, "the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programs."

JAN 24 1920

From Morning Telegraph
New York City

For Boston Children.

The Boston Symphony has announced two concerts for young people on January 29 and February 26 after school hours. Concerts of about an hour's duration will be given by the full orchestra conducted by Mr. Monteux. The prices will be within the reach of all children who will have an opportunity to secure tickets in advance of the general public.

Travler Jan 23

PIERRE MONTEUX RENEWS CONTRACT

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced that they had secured the services of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, for two more seasons, those of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteux, in his first season with the orchestra, has achieved success beyond the fondest hopes of all interested in the welfare of the great Boston institution. His re-engagement, therefore, is cause for congratulation. Wherever the orchestra has played this season it has been usually a case of capacity audiences and its playing has met with widespread praise.

American Jan 23

MONTEUX TO REMAIN AS SYMPHONY HEAD 3 YEARS

Pierre Monteux has contracted to remain as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1920-1921 and 1921-1922 seasons, it was announced today. Mr. Monteux has been in the United States since 1916, coming as head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra. He made his reputation as conductor of the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR THROUGH 1922

For Two Seasons More the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Renew His Appointment — The Flonzaleys in High Feather Through an Interesting Programme—Mr. Casals and Mme. Sundelius at Lengths — Items, Incidents and Prospects

BY arrangement newly concluded between Mr. Monteux and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, he will continue as conductor of the band for at least two seasons more—through the spring of 1922. Since no Toscanini, no Mengelburg, no Nikisch may be summoned to Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux amply deserves such reappointment, the sense of good work appreciated that it brings, the scope and security for the future that it assures. It is well, moreover, for the reorganized orchestra that an established conductor should lead it through three consecutive years. Admittedly Mr. Rabaud was no more than a conscientious locum tenens, coming hither for a season, departing hence when it was done. Through the past four months, however, Mr. Monteux has lead the band and ordered the concerts as though they were to be his for a term, and now his desire and his ambition are justly fulfilled. The more confidently and diligently can he go forward to fuse the orchestra into a sensitive, responsive, wide-ranging and manifold instrument—player to player, men to conductor, and both to the music undertaken. Not a few of the glories of the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time were due to year upon year of intimacy between a permanent conductor and a permanent orchestra. Mr. Monteux, and in measure his forces, will now be such. Already he and they have come to understand each other; of late he has refined upon them with happy outcome. For both, for the standards of the concerts, for the pleasure of the audiences, the future stretches wide and promising.

By many a title, besides, Mr. Monteux deserves his present reward. No conductor of the Symphony Concerts, it is safe to say, has made more interesting and stimulating programmes. None has shown a more liberal, a more catholic mind or has striven more to widen his own and his hearers' acquaintance with symphonic music. Of nothing has he made an overshadowing cult—no not even of his cherished dance-pieces; to nothing has he shown a seated dislike. Better still, while he has not overlooked the classics and, indeed, has often sought among them for neglected pieces, he has shown a clear and grateful tendency to lift his programmes out of the easy rut of "standard numbers" and to give them modern and contemporary voice. "The ancients were the ancients," said wise little Agnes in one of Molière's comedies, "but we are persons of today." By like token, the classics are the classics, but the music for 1920 is the music of our own generations. It is not too much to say that more than any conductor before him, Mr. Monteux has modernized the Symphony Concerts, while at home and abroad audiences have responded gladly. As for quality of performance, there are some who still mistrust him. It is for them to think backward and contrast the heavy-handed Monteux, too strenuous of voice in the concerts of last autumn, with the plastic and luminous Monteux of Debussy's "Jeux," of Balakirev's "Thamar," of the middle movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor on more recent programmes. They should recall also the graphic, the dramatizing Monteux of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," of the final scene of Wágner's "Götterdämmerung." The new conductor, the permanent conductor, as he now is, of the Symphony Concerts, does not stand still.

Post Jan 24 5

MONTEUX AS PERMANENT CONDUCTOR

Symphony Trustees Engage Him For Two Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

SUCCESS IN OTHER CITIES

In those cities of New England, the near South and the West which the orchestra has visited a crowded patronage has expressed the same high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 as the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Globe Jan 25

MONTEUX TO CONTINUE AS CONDUCTOR OF SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he will continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

PIERRE MONTEUX
To Remain as Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the Autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following Spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Travler Jan 23

PIERRE MONTEUX RENEWS CONTRACT

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today announced that they had secured the services of Pierre Monteux, conductor of the orchestra, for two more seasons, those of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Mr. Monteux, in his first season with the orchestra, has achieved success beyond the fondest hopes of all interested in the welfare of the great Boston institution. His re-engagement, therefore, is cause for congratulation. Wherever the orchestra has played this season it has been usually a case of capacity audiences and its playing has met with widespread praise.

American Jan 23

MONTEUX TO REMAIN AS SYMPHONY HEAD 3 YEARS

Pierre Monteux has contracted to remain as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the 1920-1921 and 1921-1922 seasons, it was announced today. Mr. Monteux has been in the United States since 1916, coming as head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra. He made his reputation as conductor of the Colonne Concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris.

PIERRE MONTEUX WILL STAY WITH SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for a brief period. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

MELROSE REPUBLICAN

Globe Jan 25

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concerts For Young People

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced several weeks ago that it would give on Thursday afternoon of this week a concert for young people. Seats were to be offered first through the public schools and settlement houses in Greater Boston, and later those untaken were to be placed on public sale. The program promised includes Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, and Delibes' suite fro "Sylvia." There will be little to distinguish this concert from one of th regular series except the nature of th audience, and the comparative brevit of the program.

The management was immediately besieged with applications for tickets which are sold at the nominal price o 25 and 50 cents. Last Thursday ever place had been taken, not only for thi week's concert, but also for a secon one to be given on Feb 26. No one wh secured tickets for the first concert wa allowed tickets for the second one, an there was no public sale. The ful schedule of the orchestra for the re mainder of the current season will pre vent it from undertaking more o these young people's concerts this year This leaves thousands of disappointed applicants and would-be applicants.

The previous history of the Symphony Orchestra has been a little like that of the so-called "Public Schools" in England, which were originally meant for poor scholars in need of schooling and unable to pay for what we would call private tutoring. Just as Eton, Harrow, Rugby and the rest fell in time completely into the hands of the well to do classes, so that no poor boy is able to attend them, our Symphony Concerts have been monopolized by those who can afford to pay from $15 to $72 for a season ticket, or who have the time and patience to wait in line several hours for the 505 second balcony rush seats on Fridays, in order to get in for a quarter. The few seats not sold for the season have usually cost from $1.50 to $2.50 for a single concert, and the audience has been so well dressed that only people with extra good clothes have felt at home in it.

The plain people have not had much chance to hear the concerts, and the boys and girls in our High Schools, who will form the future public for music in Boston, have never gotten in the way of going to them.

The Bolsheviki, autocrats though they are, have at least done better than we here in Boston in providing equal opportunity for every one to hear good music well performed at a nominal price. In Moscow and Petrograd there have been overflowing popular audiences for classical concerts in the past few years, since "the people have ruled."

Fortunately a revolution has not been necessary to bring the beginning of democracy, which means equal opportunity, at Symphony Hall. Those of little faith in the desire for good music among the plain people hereabouts will be hard put to it to explain the instant and overwhelming response to the new opportunity offered by these young people's concerts. The trustees of the orchestra are to be thanked for this innovation, which will probably not tend to reduce the annual deficit. It is to be hoped that another year the season will be lengthened or the concerts in other cities cut down so that not only the young people, but everyone in the city may have a chance to hear the orchestra, and come to realize that it is the "Boston Symphony," and not the "Back Bay Symphony." Maj Higginson meant it to be ours, but never fully realized his first intentions.

Adv. Jan 25

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

At the "Young People's Concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, and Delibes' ballet, "Sylvia." All tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements. Applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert but for a second, to be given Thursday, February 26.

genius.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

For the "Young People's Concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Delibes' Ballet "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert but for another, to be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock. The distribution has been so arranged that the second audience will be entirely different from the first. That further school pupils may not count in vain on obtaining seats, the heads of the schools have been informed by letters that further applications cannot be filled. On account of the full schedule of regular symphony concerts, no more than these two Young People's Concerts can be undertaken this year.

Herald Jan 25

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

For the "young people's concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at which Mr. Monteux will conduct Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Schuberts "Unfinished" symphony and Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats, not only for the first concert but for another to be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock. On account of the full schedule of regular Symphony concerts, no more than these two young people's concerts can be undertaken this year.

BOSTON'S CONDUCTOR

Specially for The Christian Science Monitor

BOSTON, Massachusetts—The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the present conductor, Pierre Monteux, will remain for two more years after the present season is ended. This sets at rest rumors as to the position which have variously named Toscanini, Sir Henry Wood, Mengelberg, and Albert Coates as possibilities. Following Henri Rabaud, Mr. Monteux had naturally a difficult place to fill and the trustees of the orchestra by his new contract have signified their approval of his efforts.

MONTEUX TO CONTINUE WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Symphony Conductor Will Continue in Post During Season of 1920-21.

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring, he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From Philadelphia, Pa. Press, JAN 24 1920 E

RECORD

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

JAN 24 1920 E

BOSTON KEEPS MONTEUX

He Will Continue to Conduct Symphony Orchestra Three Years.

Special to "The Record."

Boston, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has been a success almost without precedent.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

ESTABLISHED 1801

JAN 3 0

From EVENING POST, New York City

Pierre Monteux has been made permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

From D JAN 24 19

Tribune New York City

Monteux Signs for Three Years

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—Pierre Monteux, former conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, has signed articles of agreement with the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to continue as conductor here for the next three seasons, it was announced to-night.

ESTABLISHED JAN 24 1920 E

From North American Philadelphia, Pa

Boston Orchestra Keeps Monteux

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux whereby he is continued as conductor during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent.

From JAN 24 1920 E News Baltimore, Md.

Monteux To Stay With Boston.

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922. Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programs.

From Inquirer JAN 24 192 E Philadelphia, Pa.

HEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteur Engaged as Conductor Until 1922

BOSTON, Jan. 23.—The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm, both as regards the quality of the performances, and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring, he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

From JAN 24 1920 E Evening Star Baltimore, Md.

MONTEUX ENGAGED FOR TWO SEASONS

Trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra Prolong His Conductorship.

"The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the season of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922," the orchestra announces in a dispatch to The Star, dated January 23.

"Under his inspired leadership," the dispatch continues, "the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Crowded audiences in this and all cities where the orchestra has visited have manifested high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programs."

JAN 25 1920

From Morning Telegraph New York City

For Boston Children.

The Boston Symphony has announced two concerts for young people on January 29 and February 26 after school hours. Concerts of about an hour's duration will be given by the full orchestra conducted by Mr. Monteux. The prices will be within the reach of children who will have an opportunity to secure tickets in advance of the general public.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Music

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

MONTEUX AS CONDUCTOR THROUGH 1922

For Two Seasons More the Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra Renew His Appointment — The Flonzaleys in High Feather Through an Interesting Programme—Mr. Casals and Mme. Sundelius at Lengths — Items, Incidents and Prospects

BY arrangement newly concluded between Mr. Monteux and the trustees of the Symphony Orchestra, he will continue as conductor of the band for at least two seasons more—through the spring of 1922. Since no Toscanini, no Mengelburg, no Nikisch may be summoned to Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux amply deserves such reappointment, the sense of good work appreciated that it brings, the scope and security for the future that it assures. It is well, moreover, for the reorganized orchestra that an established conductor should lead it through three consecutive years. Admittedly Mr. Rabaud was no more than a conscientious locum tenens, coming hither for a season, departing hence when it was done. Through the past four months, however, Mr. Monteux has lead the band and ordered the concerts as though they were to be his for a term, and now his desire and his ambition are justly fulfilled. The more confidently and diligently can he go forward to fuse the orchestra into a sensitive, responsive, wide-ranging and manifold instrument—player to player, men to conductor, and both to the music undertaken. Not a few of the glories of the Symphony Concerts in Dr. Muck's time were due to year upon year of intimacy between a permanent conductor and a permanent orchestra. Mr. Monteux, and in measure his forces, will now be such. Already he and they have come to understand each other; of late he has refined upon them with happy outcome. For both, for the standards of the concerts, for the pleasure of the audiences, the future stretches wide and promising.

By many a title, besides, Mr. Monteux deserves his present reward. No conductor of the Symphony Concerts, it is safe to say, has made more interesting and stimulating programmes. None has shown a more liberal, a more catholic mind or has striven more to widen his own and his hearers' acquaintance with symphonic music. Of nothing has he made an overshadowing cult—no not even of his cherished dance-pieces; to nothing has he shown a seated dislike. Better still, while he has not overlooked the classics and, indeed, has often sought among them for neglected pieces, he has shown a clear and grateful tendency to lift his programmes out of the easy rut of "standard numbers" and to give them modern and contemporary voice. "The ancients were the ancients," said wise little Agnes in one of Molière's comedies, "but we are persons of today." By like token, the classics are the classics, but the music for 1920 is the music of our own generations. It is not too much to say that more than any conductor before him, Mr. Monteux has modernized the Symphony Concerts, while at home and abroad audiences have responded gladly. As for quality of performance, there are some who still mistrust him. It is for them to think backward and contrast the heavy-handed Monteux, too strenuous of voice in the concerts of last autumn, with the plastic and luminous Monteux of Debussy's "Jeux," of Balakirev's "Thamar," of the middle movements of Brahms's symphony in C minor on more recent programmes. They should recall also the graphic, the dramatizing Monteux of Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," of the final scene of Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." The new conductor, the permanent conductor, as he now is, of the Symphony Concerts, does not stand still.

Post Jan 24 5

MONTEUX AS PERMANENT CONDUCTOR

Symphony Trustees Engage Him For Two Years

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920-1921 and 1921-1922.

Under his inspired leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. In Boston, the audiences invariably fill Symphony Hall and manifestly enjoy the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and the special concerts as well.

SUCCESS IN OTHER CITIES

In those cities of New England, the near South and the West which the orchestra has visited a crowded patronage has expressed the same high enthusiasm both as regards the quality of the performances and the interest of the programmes.

It will be remembered that Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for the brief period in which he could obtain his release from an existing engagement as conductor of French opera at the Metropolitan Opera House. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra. He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 as the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Record Jan 25

PIERRE MONTEUX WILL STAY WITH SYMPHONY

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have come to an agreement with Pierre Monteux, its eminent conductor, whereby he is to continue in his post during the seasons of 1920, 1921 and 1922.

Under his leadership the present season, now half over, has had a success almost without precedent. Mr. Monteux conducted the opening Boston Symphony concerts in the autumn of 1918 for a brief period. In the following spring he was engaged at the first opportunity as the regular conductor of the orchestra.

He began his career by conducting opera and ballet in the larger cities of Europe, and made his particular mark presiding over the Colonne concerts and the "Concerts Monteux" in Paris. He first came to the United States in 1916 at the head of the Russian Ballet Orchestra.

Post Jan 25

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY

For the "Young People's Concert" to be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at which Pierre Monteux will conduct Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Delibes' Ballet "Sylvia," all tickets have been distributed through the schools and settlements of Greater Boston. So great has been the demand for tickets that applications already received will fill all the available seats not only for the first concert, but for another, to be given on Thursday afternoon, Feb. 26, at 4 o'clock. The distribution has been so arranged that the second audience will be entirely different from the first. That further school pupils may not count in vain on obtaining seats, the heads of the schools have been informed by letters that further applications cannot be filled. On account of the full schedule of regular symphony concerts, no more than these two Young People's Concerts can be undertaken this year.

Globe Jan 25

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concerts For Young People

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announced several weeks ago that it would give on Thursday afternoon of this week a concert for young people. Seats were to be offered first through the public schools and settlement houses in Greater Boston, and later those untaken were to be placed on public sale. The program promised includes Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, and Delibes' suite from "Sylvia." There will be little to distinguish this concert from one of the regular series except the nature of the audience, and the comparative brevity of the program.

The management was immediately besieged with applications for tickets which are sold at the nominal price of 25 and 50 cents. Last Thursday every place had been taken, not only for this week's concert, but also for a second one to be given on Feb 26. No one who secured tickets for the first concert was allowed tickets for the second one, and there was no public sale. The full schedule of the orchestra for the remainder of the current season will prevent it from undertaking more of these young people's concerts this year. This leaves thousands of disappointed applicants and would-be applicants.

The previous history of the Symphony Orchestra has been a little like that of the so-called "Public Schools" in England, which were originally meant for poor scholars in need of schooling and unable to pay for what we would call private tutoring. Just as Eton, Harrow, Rugby and the rest fell in time completely into the hands of the well to do classes, so that no poor boy is able to attend them, our Symphony Concerts have been monopolized by those who can afford to pay from $15 to $72 for a season ticket, or who have the time and patience to wait in line several hours for the 505 second balcony rush seats on Fridays, in order to get in for a quarter. The few seats not sold for the season have usually cost from $1.50 to $2.50 for a single concert, and the audience has been so well dressed that only people with extra good clothes have felt at home in it.

The plain people have not had much chance to hear the concerts, and the boys and girls in our High Schools, who will form the future public for music in Boston, have never gotten in the way of going to them.

